The khalifate is only valid for the Perfect Man, whose exterior form comes from the realities of the universe and its forms, and whose inner form is based on His form, may He be exalted! For that reason, Allah has said of him, "I am his hearing and his sight." (14) He did not say, "his eye and his ear." So He differentiated between the two forms. It is the same for every existent in the universe which appears according to what the reality of that existent demands of it. Nonetheless no one totally comprehends what the khalif has. One only surpasses others by this comprehensiveness. If it were not for the diffusion of Allah into the existents by the form, the universe would not have any existence. Similarly, were it not for these universal intelligible realities, no principle would have appeared in individual existent things. From this reality the universe depends on Allah for its existence. So all is in need, and nothing is independent.

This is the truth and we have not spoken metaphorically.
If I speak of a something independent without any need, you will know Who I mean by it.

The whole is tied to the whole and cannot be separated from it, so understand what I have said!

Now, you have learnt of the formation of the body of Adam his outer form and the formation of his spirit, his inner form, so he is the Real and a created being. Now you have learnt of the formation of his rank which is the comprehensiveness by virtue of which he is worthy of the khalifate. Adam is the unique self from which the perfect human species was created according to His words, "O mankind, be fearful of your Lord who created you from a single self, and created its mate from it, and disseminated many men and women from the two of them." (4:1)

His words, "Be fearful of your Lord," mean to make of what has appeared from you a safeguard for your Lord and make what is concealed of you, which is your Lord, a safeguard for yourselves. The matter consists of blame and praise, so be His safeguard in the blame and your safeguard in the praise, so that you will be among those of knowledge and adab. Then He showed him what He had placed in him, and He put that in His two hands - one handful contained the universe and the other handful contained Adam and his descendants - and He showed them their ranks in Adam.

Then Allah informed me in my inner heart (sirr) of what He placed in this Imam, the great progenitor. I have put in this book some of what was allotted to me but not all of what I realised. A book could not contain that and not even the present existent universe could contain it. I have put some of what I have witnessed in this book, as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, defined it. It was the divine wisdom in the word of Adam, that is, this chapter.

Then there is the wisdom of the breath of angelic inspiration in the word of Shith (Seth), the wisdom of divine inspiration in the word of Nuh (Noah), the wisdom of purity in the word of Idris, the wisdom of being lost in love in the word of Ibrahim (Abraham), the wisdom of truth in the word of Ishaq (Isaac), the wisdom of the elevation of the word in the name of Isma'il (Ishmael), the wisdom of the spirit in the word of Yusuf (Joseph), the wisdom of unity in the word of Hud, the wisdom of revelation in the word of Salih, the wisdom of the heart in the word of Shu'ayb, the wisdom of the power of the word of Lut (Lot), the wisdom of the decree in the word of 'Uzayr (Ezra), the wisdom of prophethood in the word of 'Isa (Jesus), the wisdom of mercy in the word of Sulayman (Solomon), the wisdom of existence in the word of Da'ud (David), the wisdom of the soul in the word of Yunus (Jonah), the wisdom of the unseen in the word of Ayyub (Job), the wisdom of majesty in the word of Yahya (John the Baptist), the wisdom of possession in the word of Zakariya (Zachariah), the wisdom of intimacy in the word of Ilyas (Elias), the wisdom of benevolence in the word of Luqman, the wisdom of the Imam in the word of Harun (Aaron), the wisdom of sublimity in the word of Musa (Moses), the wisdom of what one turns to in the word of Khalid, and the wisdom of uniqueness in the seal of Muhammad.

There is a seal for each wisdom. So I have condensed these wisdoms according to what is established in the Mother of the Book, and I complied with what was written out for me, and stopped at what was set as a limit for me. Even if I had desired to do more than that, I would not have been able to do so. Indeed, the Presence forbids that, and Allah is the One who grants success. There is no Lord but Him.

Notes to Chapter 1:

1. al-Insân al-Kâmil, the Perfect Man.
2. Nafkh, Qur'an 32:9, etc.
3. Insan, as well as meaning human being, also means the pupil of the eye.
4. The form chosen by Allah for the human being.
5. Qur'an 2:30-33.
6. 'Ibada: All the acts of worship: giving, praying, fasting, etc..
7. Adab: Manners. Here meaning the much deeper quality of spiritual manners, that is a courtesy engendered in the ritual acts of worship, the prostrations of the prayer, the fast, and giving gifts to the needy. Such a quality is imbued with awareness that you are the dependent, and the Real is the independent. You are poor, He is rich.
8. Qur'an 41:53, "We will show them Our signs on the horizons and in themselves..."
9. i.e. the Prophets.
10. Qur'an: 57:3.
11. Qur'an 38:75, "What I created with My two hands."
12. Hadith: "Allah has 70,000 veils of light and darkness. If they were to be removed, the splendour of His face would consume."
13. Hadith: "Allah created Adam on His form."
14. ref. to hadith qudsî via Abu Hurayra, "My slave does not draw near Me with anything I love more than what I have made obligatory for him. My slave continues to draw near me with superogatory actions until I love him. When I love him, I am his hearing with he hears, his sight by which he sees, his hand with which he strikes, and his foot with which he walks." (Sahih al-Bukhari, 81:38:2)

2) The Seal of Wisdom of the Breath of Angelic Inspiration (1) in the Word of Shith (Seth)

Know that the gifts and favours which appear in phenomenal being through human beings or without them fall into two categories: the gifts of the Essence and the gifts of the Divine Names. These two categories are distinct among the people of tasting according to whether as they come from a specific request for a specific thing, from a general request, or without any request. This applies whether they are gifts of the Essence or gifts of the Divine Names. They are specific when someone says, "O Lord, give me such-and-such a thing," and specifies something which occurs to him. They are general when someone says, "Give me what You know is good for all my parts, subtle and gross," without specifying it.

The askers fall into two groups - one group makes the request from a natural impulse to hasten its attainment, "for man is impetuous;" (17:11) and the other group asks because they know that there are matters with Allah which, in the foreknowledge of Allah, are only obtained after a request. They say, "Perhaps what I ask of Him is something of that sort." Their request takes into consideration this possibility. They do not know what is in the knowledge of Allah, nor what their capacity to receive will grant them. This is because it is one of the most difficult things to know capacity at any moment, for it refers to the capacity of the individual at that time. Furthermore, had he not been disposed by his capacity to make the request, he would not have made that particular request.

The goal of the people of presence, (2) who do not possess such a knowledge, is to know it in the moment in which they find themselves. They know by their state of presence what Allah has given them in that moment. and they only receive it by their predisposition for it. They are of two sorts: one group knows their predisposition from what they have already received, and the other group knows what they are going to receive based on their predisposition. This latter group has the most perfect recognition of predisposition.

Among this group are those who make a request, neither to hasten it nor for the possibilities of favour, but rather to comply with the command of Allah when He says, "Call on Me and I will answer you." (40:60) This sort of person is the pure slave and when he asks, his aspiration (himma) is not attached to what he asks for, be it specific or not, rather his aspiration is merely in or not, rather his aspiration is merely in obedience to his Lord's command. When his state requires, he asks for slavehood, and when it requires entrustment [to Allah] and silence, he is silent. So Ayyub and others were tried, and they did not ask Allah to remove their affliction from them. Then at another moment, their state required that they ask that it be removed, and Allah removed it from them.

The immediate granting of a request, or its deferment, depends on the decree which has been determined for it by Allah. If the request coincides with the moment, the answer comes quickly, and if the moment is deferred - either in this world or the next, the answer is also deferred except for the answer from Allah which is, "At your service" (3) - so understand this well!

As for the second category, it is received without making a request, and by "without request" we mean verbal expression of it. In actuality, there must always be a request - be it articulated, or by a state, or from a predisposition. Similarly, unrestricted praise only takes place through verbal expression. The state determines the meaning, for that which induces you to praise Allah is determined for you by a Name of Action (4) or a Name of Disconnection. (5) In the case of the predisposition of the slave, its possessor is not conscious of it, but he is aware of his state because he knows both what his motive is and the state itself. Predisposition is the most hidden form of making requests.

That which prevents some people from asking is their knowledge that Allah has predetermined their destiny, so they have prepared themselves to receive whatever comes from Him, and they have withdrawn from their selves and their desires.

Among these people are those who know that the knowledge which Allah has of them in all their states is their basic constitution in the state of their permanent source-form from before existence. They know that Allah will only give them what their source allows them according to Allah's knowledge of it when they were in their permanent source-forms. Thus these people know that Allah knows the way they will obtain anything.

There is no higher, nor more unveiled group among the People of Allah than this group, who understand on the secret of the Decree. They, in turn, fall into two sorts: those who know it in general and those who know it in particular. Those who know it in particular are higher and nearer perfection than those who know it in general. Such a person knows what is in the knowledge of Allah for him - be it by Allah informing him of the knowledge his own source has accorded to Him, or be it by direct unveiling to him from his permanent source-form whose unfolding states are endless. So he, in his knowledge of himself, is in the position of having Allah's knowledge of him, because it is derived from the same source. In respect of the slave, concern from Allah is predestined for him, and it is constituted by the sum of the states of his source which the possessor of this unveiling perceives when Allah allows him to perceive it, i.e. the states of his source. When Allah informs him of the states of his permanent source-form upon which the form of his existence depends, it is not in the capacity of the creature in this state to perceive what Allah perceives of his permanent source-form upon which the form of his existence depends, it is not in the capacity of the creature in this state to perceive what Allah perceives of these permanent sources in the state of their non-existence, since they are but essential relations without any form. In this respect, we say that divine concern precedes the slave's need because of this equivalence in the communication of knowledge.

In this way Allah speaks so that we will know, and it is an expression which is completely specific - not as is imagined by those who do not drink from this source. The goal of disconnection is to make that in-timeness in knowledge belong to Knowledge. It is the highest aspect of this question which the mutakallim (6) can comprehend with his intellect - unless he considers knowledge to be distinct from the Essence. If he does this, he ascribes relativity to knowledge, and not to the Essence, and because of this, he sets himself apart from the realised ones among the People of Allah, who are endowed with unveiling and real existence.

Let us return to those gifts which are either the gifts proceeding from the Essence or the Names. As for the favours, gifts and graces of the Essence, they only come by means of divine tajalli. (7) Tajalli only comes from the Essence by means of the form of the predisposition of the one to whom the tajalli is made. It never occurs otherwise. The one who receives the tajalli will only see his own form in the mirror of the Real. He will not see the Real, for it is not possible to see Him. At the same time, he knows that he sees only his own form. It is the same as a mirror in the Visible world inasmuch as you see forms in it or your own form but do not see the mirror. At the same time, however, you know that you see the forms, or your own form, only by virtue of the mirror. Allah manifests that as a model (8) appropriate to the tajalli of His Essence, so that the one receiving the tajalli knows that he does not see Him. There is no model nearer or more appropriate to vision and tajalli than this. When you see a form in a mirror, try to see the body of the mirror as well - you will never see it. It is true that some people who perceive this say that the reflected form is imposed between the vision of the seer and the mirror. This is the most that it is possible to say, and the matter is as we have mentioned. We have clarified this in the The Makkan Revelations.

If you wish to taste this, then experience the limit beyond which there is no higher limit possible in respect of the creature. Neither aspire to, nor tire yourself out in trying to go beyond this degree, for in principle, there is only pure non-existence after it.

Thus Allah is your mirror in which you see yourself, and you are His mirror in which He sees His Names. His Names are not other than Himself, as you know. The matter is confusing. One of us implied ignorance of the matter as part of knowledge and said, "The incapacity to achieve perception is perception." (9) Some of us know but do not express it in this way, even though it is the highest of words. Knowledge does not give incapacity to know as the first one said, but rather knowledge gives him the same silence which incapacity gives. This is the highest level of those who have knowledge of Allah.

This knowledge only belongs to the Seal of the Messengers and the Seal of the Awliyâ'. The Messengers and Prophets only see it from the niche of the Messenger who is the Seal. The awliyâ' only see it from the niche of the walî who is the Seal. Even the Messengers only see it to the extent that they see it from the niche of the Seal of the Awliya', for Message and Prophethood - by which I mean the Prophethood of bringing the Sharî'a and its message - ceases, but wilâya never ceases. Thus the Messengers, in much as they are awliya', see what we have mentioned only from the niche of the Seal of the Awliya'. How could it be different for other awliyâ'? Although the Seal of the Awliyâ' is subject to the judgement which the Seal of the Messengers brought through the Sharî'a, that does not diminish his station nor does it detract from what we have said, for something which is lower from one point of view can be higher from another. Confirmation of this occurred in the history of our Sharî'a in the excellence of the judgement of 'Umar regarding the prisoners of Badr (10) and their treatment, and in the story of fertilization of the date-palms. (11) It is not necessary that the perfect have precedence in everything and in every rank. The Rijâl (12) regard precedence as being in the degrees of knowledge of Allah. Here is their goal. As for the things which are in-time, they do not attach their thoughts to them, so realise what we have mentioned!

Al-Khidr said to Musa, "I have knowledge which Allah has taught me, and which you do not know, and you have knowledge which Allah has taught you and which I do not know." (13)

It is like the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, in relation to a brick wall which was complete except for one brick, (14) and the Prophet was that one brick although he himself only saw the place for the single brick. The Seal of the Awliyâ' must also have this sort of vision. He sees the same as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, saw, but he sees a place for two bricks in the wall, and that the bricks are made of gold and silver. He sees that there are two bricks missing in the wall, and he sees that they are a silver brick and a gold brick. He must see himself as being disposed by nature to fill the place of these two bricks. The Seal of the Awliyâ' is these two bricks by which the wall is completed. The necessary reason for which he sees himself as two bricks is that he follows the Shari'a of the Seal of the Messengers outwardly - which is the place of the silver brick. This means the outward Sharī'a with all that pertains to it of ordinances which are taken from Allah by the secret, according to the outward form which conforms to the secret because he sees the matter for what it really is. He must see the matter in this manner, for it is the place of the golden brick in the inwardly hidden. It is taken from the source from which the angel brought it, the same angel who brought the revelation to the Messengers. If you have understood what I have alluded to, then you have indeed acquired useful knowledge!

All the Prophets, from Adam to the last of the Prophets, take their light from the niche of the Seal of the Prophets, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. Even though the existence of his clay was deferred, the last Prophet was nevertheless present in his reality, according to his statement, "I was a Prophet when Adam was between water and clay." (15) Every other Prophet only became a Prophet by being described by divine qualities inasmuch as Allah is described as the Praiseworthy Wali.(16)

The Seal of the Messengers, in respect to his wilāya, is connected to the Seal of the Awliyā' in the same way in which Prophets and Messengers are connected to it. He is a walī, Messenger, and Prophet. The Seal of the Awliyā' is a walī and the heir who takes directly from the source, contemplating the ranks. He is the most beautiful of the beauties of the Seal of the Messengers, Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, the overseer of the community, and the master of the sons of Adam by reason of opening the door of intercession. He specified a particular state which is not universal. (17) In this special state, he has precedence over the Divine Names. So the All-Merciful only mediates with the Avenger for the people of affliction through the intercession of the mediators. Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, obtained mastery in this special station. Whoever understands the ranks and the stations does not find this discourse difficult.

As for the gifts of the Names, know that Allah bestows mercy on His creation which is wholly from the names. Either it is a pure mercy, like the excellence of the provision which they have in this world or on the Day of Rising which is bestowed by that name, the Merciful, and so is a gift of mercy, or it is a mixed mercy like the taking of a disagreeable remedy which is followed by relief - it is still a divine gift. Divine gifts can only possibly be given through the intermediary of the guardians of the Names. Sometimes Allah gives it to the slave by means of the All-Merciful, and so the gift is pure from any adulteration which would be contrary to the nature of the moment, otherwise he would not receive the object and what would resemble it. Sometimes He gives by means of the the Boundless, so it is general - or by the Wise, so He looks at what is fitter at the moment, or by the Giving, who gives what is good without those who receive it having to compensate for it by gratitude or deed. He gives by the Compeller, and so He looks at the environment and what is necessary to it. He gives by the Forgiving and so He looks to the environment and what is happening to the individual. If he is in a state which merits punishment, He veils him from it, and if he is in a state which does not merit punishment, He protects him from a state which would merit it. He is "protected from wrong action", "safeguarded", and other descriptions of that sort. The Giver is Allah in the sense that He is the Treasurer of all that is in His treasury, and Allah only brings forth from it according to a predestined decree through the intermediary of a name particular to that matter. So He gives everything its created form (18) according to the name, the Just, and its brothers.

The Names of Allah are endless because they are known by what comes from them, and what comes from them is endless, even though they can be traced back to the limited roots which are the matrices of the Names or the presences of the Names. In reality, there is but one of the Names or the presences of the Names. In reality, there is but One Reality which assumes all these relations and aspects which are designated by the Divine Names. The Reality grants that each of the Names, which manifest themselves without end, has a reality by which it is distinguished from another Name. It is that reality by which it is distinguished which is the Name itself - not that which it shares.

It is the same with the gifts - every gift is distinct from another by personal nature, although they come from a single source. It is evident that this one is not that one. That is because the Names are distinct. Because of its boundlessness, in the Divine Presence there is nothing at all which repeats itself. This is the truth which is determined.

This was the knowledge of Shith, peace be upon him, and its spirit aids every spirit which discusses the like of this, except for the spirit of the Seal who receives replenishing knowledge directly from Allah, not from any spirit. No, rather it is from his spirit that his substance flows to all spirits, although he may not perceive that of himself at the time when his elemental body existed. However, in respect to his reality and his rank, he knows all of that essentially, just as he is ignorant of the composition of the elements (of his body). So he has knowledge and is ignorant, and he is capable of being described by contrary attributes even as the Origin admits of description with opposites such as the Majestic and the Beautiful, the Outward and the Inward, the Last and the First - and they are the same, and not other than Him. Therefore, he knows and does not know, and he perceives and does not perceive, and he sees and does not see. It is by this knowledge that Shith received his name because it means "the gift". In His hand is the key to the gifts in their various types and relationships So Allah gave him to Adam, and he was the first gift, and He only gave it from Himself.

This was the knowledge of Shith, peace be upon him, and its spirit aids every spirit which discusses the like of this, except for the spirit of the Seal who receives replenishing knowledge directly from Allah, not from any spirit. No, rather it is from his spirit that his substance flows to all spirits, although he may not perceive that of himself at the time when his elemental body existed. However, in respect to his reality and his rank, he knows all of that essentially, just as he is ignorant of the composition of the elements (of his body). So he has knowledge and is ignorant, and he is capable of being described by contrary attributes even as the Origin admits of description with opposites such as the Majestic and the Beautiful, the Outer and the Inner, the Last and the First - and they are the same, and not other than Him. Therefore, he knows and does not know, and he perceives and does not perceive, and he sees and does not see. It is by this knowledge that Shith received his name because it means "the gift". In His hand is the key to the gifts in their various types and relationships So Allah gave him to Adam, and he was the first gift, and He only gave it from Himself.

All gifts in phenomenal being are manifested in this fashion - so no one receives anything from Allah and no-one receives anything which does not come from himself. Not everyone recognises this. Only a few of the people of Allah know it. When you see one who recognises that, rely on him, for that one is the source of the purest purity and the elite of the elite of the Men of Allah. Whenever a person of unveiling sees a form which communicates to him gnosis which he did not have and which he had not been able to grasp before, that form is from his own source, no other. From the tree of himself he gathers the fruits of his cultivation, as his outer form opposite the reflected body is nothing other than himself, even though the place of the presence in which he sees the form of himself presents him with an aspect of the reality of that presence through transformation. The large appears small in the small mirror and tall in the tall, and the moving as movement. It can reverse its form from a special presence, and it can reflect things exactly as they appear, so the right side of the viewer is his right side, while the right side can be on the left. This is generally the normal state in mirrors, and it is a break in the norm when the right side is seen as the right and inversion occurs. All this is from the gifts of the reality of the Presence in which it is manifested and which we have compared to the mirror.

Whoever recognises his predisposition, recognises what he will receive. Not everyone who knows what he will receive, knows his predisposition, unless he knows it after receiving it, and this one knows it in a general way. Some people who are weak of intellect think that since it confirmed with them that Allah does what He wills, they deem it admissible that He could contradict wisdom and what the matter is in itself. (19) Because of this, some of them go so far as to deny the possibility and affirm that which is necessary by essence and by other. The man who has achieved realisation, however, admits the possibility and knows its presence and knows what is possible and how it is possible, since in its source it is necessarily existent because of something other-than-it. From where is the name of other, which determines its necessity, valid for it? No one knows this distinction except those with particular knowledge of Allah.

It is in the footsteps of Shith that the last of this human species will be born, and he will carry his secrets. There will none of this species born after him, so he will be the Seal of the Begotten. A sister will be born with him, and she will emerge before him, and he will follow her with his head at her feet. He will be born in China, and he will speak the language of his country. Sterility will spread in men and women, so there will be much cohabitation without conception. He will call people to Allah, but will not be answered. When Allah takes him and the believers of his time, those who remain will be like beasts, not knowing what is lawful (halâl) from what is unlawful (harâm). They will act according to their natural instincts with lust, devoid of reason and law. Upon them the Last Hour will occur.

Notes to to Chapter 2:

1. Nafth, to puff, blow or spit, hence inspiration. Hadith, "He (Jibril) inspired or put (nafatha) into my heart..." Hence poetry is called the nafth of Shaytan.
2. The people of the presence are those who see everything as coming to them from Allah and everything as effected by Allah.
3. Labbayk.
4. Like the Giving, the Provider.
5. Tanzih, making Allah free of any connection to His creation. Names like the Absolutely Pure (al-Quddûs).
6. The people of words - theologians and philosophers. They are unable to enter the realm of reflection and meditation that is the Sufic domain, and thus some of them oppose the Sufic teaching - mistaking the doctrine's meanings since they cannot intellectually identify them with a specific set of physical practices and direct inner experience.
7. A manifestation by which something is made clear and unobscured, as the bride is displayed to the husband or the rust removed from a sword or mirror so that it shines. The tajalli is the unveiling of a spiritual reality in the realm of vision. It is a direct-seeing into the nature of existence, a showing forth of the secrets of the One in the celestial and terrestrial realms.

8. Mithâl, a Qur'anic term which indicates learning not by logical but by analogical method. It is simply the ACCESS to the parable and not the parable or any idea that the "metaphor" equals its interpretation. It has no specificity. Mithal is grasped "on the wing" so to speak. It cannot be explored or analysed or extended. That is to say it must not be approached rationally but emphatically with direct and clear seeing-into.
9. Abu Bakr as-Siddiq.
10. After Badr, Abu Bakr asked the Prophet to either forgive or allow the prisoners to be ransomed. 'Umar said that they should be killed. Eventually, the Muslims reached a consensus that the captives should be ransomed and they were. Later the verse was revealed, "It is not for a Prophet to take captives..." (8:67)
11. When the Prophet had been asked about whether palm-trees should be pollinated and then later said, "You have the best knowledge of these things of your world."
12. Rijal (sing. rajul): The men. Meaning the men of gnosis and illumination. Those who know - that is - who know how-it-is, and not the veiled fantasy experience of so-called ordinary sensory perception which is, as we now know, in direct contradiction to the physical reality of matter according to high-energy physics.
13. cf. Qur'an 18:65.
14. Hadith in al-Bukhari (2815) and Muslim.
15. Hadith in at-Tirmidhi and Musnad Ibn Hanbal.
16. Qur'an 42:28, "It is He who sends down abundant rain after they have lost all hope, and He unfolds His mercy; He is the Praiseworthy, the Wali."
17. He only can open the door of intercession because it is a special gift to him alone.
18. Qur'an 20:50: "Our Lord is He who gives each thing its created form and then guides it."
19. i.e. they permit that He do the impossible, like making existence non-existence or non-existence existence.

3) The Seal of the Wisdom of the Breath of Divine Inspiration (1) In the Word of Nuh (Noah)

Know that disconnection (tanzîh) among the people of realities in respect to Allah is the same as limitation and qualification, so the one who disconnects is either ignorant or ill-mannered if he only applies disconnection to Him and believes that about Him. (2) When the believer who follows the Shari'a disconnects and stops at that, and does not see anything else, he displays ill manners and slanders Allah and the Messengers - may the blessings of Allah be upon them! - although he is not aware of it. He imagines that he has reached the target and yet he has missed it, so he is like the one who believes in part and rejects part. (3)

One especially knows that when the language of the various Shari'as speaks about Allah as they do, they speak to the common people in the first sense, and to the elite in every sense which can be understood from the various aspects of that expression in any language in the usage of that language.

Allah manifests Himself in a special way in every creature. He is the Outwardly Manifest in every graspable sense, and He is the Inwardly Hidden from every understanding except the understanding of the one who says that the universe is His form (4) and His He-ness (huwiyya), and it is the name, the Outwardly Manifest. Since He is, by meaning, the spirit of whatever is outwardly manifest, He is also the Inwardly Hidden. His relation to whatever is manifested of the forms of the world is the relation of the governing spirit to the form. The definition of man, for example, includes both his inward and outward; and it is the same with every definable thing. Allah is defined in every definition, yet the forms of the universe are not held back and He is not contained by them. One only knows the limits of each of their forms according to what is attained by each knower of his form. For that reason, one cannot know the definition of Allah, for one would only know His definition by knowing the definition of every form. This is impossible to attain, so the definition of Allah is impossible. Similarly, whoever connects without disconnection has given limits to Allah and does not know Him. Whoever combines connection and disconnection in his gnosis, and describes Allah with both aspects in general - because it is impossible to conceive in detail because we lack the ability to encompass all the forms which the universe contains - has known Him in general and not in particular, as he knows himself generally and not in particular. For that reason, the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, linked knowledge (ma'rifa) of Allah to knowledge of oneself and said, "Whoever knows himself knows his Lord." Allah says, "We will show them Our signs on the horizons (what is outside of you) and in themselves (what is your source) until it is clear to them (the contemplators) that it is the Truth," (41:53) inasmuch as you are His form and He is your spirit. You are to Him as your body-form is to you, and He is to you as the spirit which governs the body.

The definition contains your inwardness and outwardness, for the form remains when the spirit which governs it departs, and it is no longer man, but one can speak of it as resembling the form of man. There is no difference between it and the form made of wood or stone, upon which the name of man is only applied by metaphor and not by reality. Allah cannot vanish from the forms of the universe, as His definition of His divinity is by reality, not metaphor, as the definition of man applies only so long as he is alive. As the exterior of the form of man praises both his spirit, and the self governed by it, with his tongue, similarly Allah made the forms of the universe which glorify His praise, but we do not understand their glorifying. (5) We do not embrace all forms in the universe. All are tongues of Allah uttering the praise of Allah and for that reason He said, "Praise be to Allah, the Lord of all the worlds," (1:1) i.e. all types of praise refer to Him. He is the Praiser and the One praised.

If you speak of disconnection, you limit Him, and if you speak of connection, you define Him.
If you speak of the two together, then you are free of error and you are an Imam and a master in knowledges of gnosis.

He who affirms duality, falls into shirk, and whoever speaks of uniqueness is a unifier. (6)
Take care lest you be a dualist by connection, and take care lest you be a isolator by disconnection.

You are not Him, rather you are Him and you see Him in the source of thing, absolute and limited at the same time.

Allah says, "There is nothing like Him," and so He disconnects, "and He is the Hearing, the Seeing," (42:11) so He connects. Allah says, "There is nothing like Him," so He connects and doubles it, (7) and "He is the Hearing, the Seeing." Then He uses disconnection and makes Himself Unique.

If Nuh had combined these two calls for his people, they would have answered him. He called them openly (71:8), and he called them secretly (71:9). Then he said to them, "Ask forgiveness of your Lord. Truly He is Endlessly Forgiving." (71:10) He said, "I have called my people night and in the day, but my calling has only made them more evasive" (71:5-6) because they knew what they had to do in answering his call.

So the knowledge of those who know Allah is what Nuh indicated in respect to his people by praising them through blame. He knew that they would not answer his call because of the furqân (8) it contained. The command is the Qur'an, not the Furqân. Whoever is established in the Qur'an does not incline to the Furqân. Even if the Furqân is in the Qur'an, the Qur'an contains the Furqân but the Furqân does not contain the Qur'an. For this reason, no one was favoured by the Qur'ân except Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and this community which is the "best community ever to be produced before mankind." (3:110)

So "there is nothing like Him" unified several matters in one single matter. If Nuh had articulated something like of this âyat, his people would have responded to him, because it contains connection and disconnection in a single âyat, rather in half an âyat.

Nuh, peace be upon him, peace be upon him, called on his people at night in respect to their intellects and spirituality (rûhânîyya), which are unseen; and by day he called on them in respect to their outer forms and arrival. In his call, he did not unify with anything, like "there is nothing like Him." So their inward had a distaste for this separation, and it increased them in evasion. Then he said of himself that he called upon them that He might forgive them, not that He be unveiled to them. They understood that from him. That is why "they put their fingers in their ears and wrapped themselves in their clothes," (71:7) and this is the form of veiling to which he called them. So they answered his call by action, not by saying, "At your service."

There is both the confirmation of likeness and its negation in "There is nothing like Him." For this reason, the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said of himself, "I have been given all the words." (9) Muhammad, peace be upon him, did not call on his people by night and day, but rather he called upon them by night in the day and by day in the night. Nuh said in his wisdom to his people, "He will send heaven down on you in abundant rain," (71:11) which is intellectual gnosis in meanings and metaphorical speculation, and "He will reinforce you with wealth," i.e. by what comes to you from Him.

Thus it is your wealth in which you have seen your form. So whoever among you imagines that he has seen Him, does not have gnosis, and whoever of you knows that he has seen himself, he is the gnostic. For this reason people are divided into those who know Allah and those who do not know. "And sons" is what results from their logical speculation while the knowledge of the business (to which Nuh called them) is based upon contemplation which is far from the results of thought. Their trade did not profit them, (10) so what they had in their hands, which they only imagined they possessed, vanished from them.

The kingdom belongs to the people of Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, for Allah says "Give of that to which He has made you successors." (11) (57:7) For the people of Nuh it is, "Do not take anyone besides Me as a guardian." (17:2) The kingdom was confirmed for the people of Muhammad, and the guardianship in it belongs to Allah. The people of Muhammad are the khalîfs in it. The kingdom belongs to Allah and He is their guardian, and that is the kingdom of being appointed khalîf. For this reason, Allah is the "King of the kingdom" (12) as at-Tirmidhi says. "They have hatched a mighty plotting," (71:22) because calling to Allah is the plotting of the the One called; since He does not lack the beginning, He is called to the end, so they call to Allah. This is the source of devising according to inner sight. Nuh said, "The affair belongs entirely to Him," so they answered Him with plotting as He called them.

The people of Muhammad came and knew what the call to Allah was in respect of its He-ness, rather what it is in respect to His Names. Allah says, "The day those who are godfearing are gathered to the All-Merciful." (13) So He used the "particle of the end" (ilâ - to) and joined it to that Name, and we recognise that the universe is under the care of a Divine Name which requires them to be among the "godfearing". The reality of taqwâ (14) is that man avoids ascribing blessings, perfections and praiseworthy attributes to himself or to others, except for Allah. He fears Allah through His acts and attributes. These things are evils from the spring of possibilities. They said in their plotting, "Do not abandon your gods. Do not abandon Wadd or Suwa' or Yaghuth or Ya'uq or Nasr." (71:22) Then they abandoned them ignorant of the Truth according to what they left of the idols. Allah has an aspect in every worshipped thing. Whoever recognises it, recognises, and whoever is ignorant of it is ignorant among the people of Muhammad. Your Lord decreed that you should worship only Him that is the judgement of your Lord.

The one who possesses knowledge knows who the slave is and in what form he is manifested as far as he is a slave. Separation and multiplicity are like the limbs of the sensory form and like faculties of meaning (15) of the spiritual form. He only worships Allah in every worshipped object. The lowest one is the one who imagines that godness is contained in it. Were it not for this illusion, stones and other things would not have been worshipped. This is why He said, "Say: Name them!" (13:33) If they had named them, they would have named stone, tree, or star. If they had been asked, "Who do you worship?" they would have replied, "God". They would not say "Allah" or "the god".

The highest knower does not use this imagination, (16) but rather he says that this is a divine tajalli which one must exalt, and he does not restrict himself. The lowest one is the one possessed of fantasy: "We only worship them so that they bring us nearer to Allah." (39:3) The highest knower says, "Your god is One God, so submit to Him," (22:34) wherever He is manifest, "and give good news to the humble-hearted" who humble the fire of their nature. They spoke to it (the fire), and did not say "nature". "They have misguided many people," (71:24) i.e. they perplexed many in the multiplicity of the One by aspects and relations. "Do not increase not the wrongdoers" because their selves are from the totality of the chosen ones who inherited the Book and they are the first of the three, (17) which precedes the ambivalent and the outdoer, "in anything but misguidance", except in the perplexity of the man of Muhammad who says, "Increase me in perplexity." (18) "Every time it shines on them, they walk in it. When the darkness comes over them, they stop." (2:20) So the perplexed one turns about, and the circular movement is about the axis which he does not leave.

The one who has a stretched-out path is inclined to leave the goal, seeking what the possessor of imagination has in it, and his end is that imagination. He has "from" and "to" and what is between them. The one who has a circular movement has no beginning, "from", which clings to him, and no end, "to", is judged of him. Thus he has the most perfect existence. He "is given all the words" (19) and wisdoms. "And because of their errors" which is that which is recorded for them, "they were drowned" in the seas of the knowledge of Allah which is perplexity among the men of Muhammad. When the seas were heated up, (20) "they were put into a fire" in the source of water, "and they found no one to help them besides Allah." (71:25) Allah is the source of their helpers, and so they were destroyed in it for time without end. If He had brought them out to the shore, the shore of nature, He would have brought them down from this high degree. All belongs to Allah and is by Allah, rather it is Allah.

Nuh said, "My Lord!" and he did not say, "My God," for the Lord has immutability, and "God" differs according to the Names. So "every day He is engaged in some affair." (55:29) By Lord, he meant something with an immutable quality. "Do not leave upon the earth" and he called on them to go into its Muhammadan interior. "If you let down a rope, it would fall on Allah," (21) "to Him belongs what is in the heavens and what is in the earth." When you are buried in it, you are in it and it is your container, and "We will return you into it and We will bring you forth from it again," (20:55) by the difference of existence. "...of the unbelievers" who wrap themselves in their garments and put their fingers in their ears, seeking veiling because he called on them that He might forgive them. Forgiveness is the veiling of wrong actions, "not even one" so that the benefit will become universal like the call. "If You leave any," i.e. if You call them and then leave them, "they will misguide Your slaves," i.e. confuse them and so bring them out of their service to what they have of the secrets of lordship. They will think themselves lords after they were slaves in themselves. Thus they are slaves and lords. "They will spawn nothing" i.e. they will not have any result or manifest anything except their being shameless that is, the manifestation of what veils the unbelievers is that they were veiled from what appeared after their manifestation. They manifested that which veils, so they were veiled after their appearance.

The thinker is confused and does not recognise the goal of the shameless in shamelessness, (22) or the unbeliever in his disbelief, yet the person is but one. "My Lord, forgive me," i.e. veil me and that which concerns me so that my rank and station are unknown, as the rank of Allah are unknown in His statement, "They do measure Allah with His true measure"; (23) "and my parents" of whom I am a result, and they are the intellect and nature; "and all who enter my house," i.e. my heart, "as believers" believing in what it contains of divine reports, and it is what their selves occasioned, "And all the believers, men (the intellects) and women (the selves)."

"Do not increase the wrongdoers (dhâlimîn)" who are from the darkness (dhulumât), the people of the unseen, hiding behind the veils of darkness, "except in ruin" i.e. in destruction. Thus, they do not recognise themselves because they see the Face of Allah outside of them. Among the men of Muhammad, "All things are passing except His Face." (28:88) Ruin is destruction. Whoever wishes to understand the secrets of Nuh must rise into the sphere of Nuh. (24) It is in our book, at-Tanazzulat al-Mawsuliyya.

Notes to to Chapter 3:

1. Subbûh, name applied to Allah, the All-Perfect, disconnected from imperfections.
2. If he does not go on to include tashbih, connection.
3. cf. Qur'an 4:149: "Those who reject Allah and His Messengers and desire to make division between Allah and His Messengers, saying, 'We believe in some and reject some.'"
4. By manifesting His attributes and Essence since everything is a proof and indication of Him.
5. Ref. to Qur'an 17:44, "There is nothing which does not glorify Him with praise, but you do not understand their glorification."
6. In this case, ignorant of the multiplicity of His Names and Attributes.
7. "Like Him" = "ka-mithlihi", the word "like" occurs twice: "ka" and "mithl", so like negates like, like a double negative.
8. Furqan: One of the names of the Qur'an, meaning a "discrimination" that which separates or distinguishes. Here presented as an opposite in a dyad: Qur'an/furqan, that is, discrimination/gathering.
9. Hadith in al-Bukhari and Muslim.
10. Reference to Qur'an, 2:16, "Those are the people who have sold guidance for misguidance. Their trade has brought no profit. They are not guided."
11. Khalifs.
12. Since He answers His slave who is the "kingdom". Technical term used by al-Hakim at-Tirmidhi and Abu Madyan, discussed by Ibn al-'Arabi in the Futuhat al-Makkiyya, Chapter 24, vol. I, p. 182.
13. ref. Qur'an 19:85.
14. Fearfulness of Allah which is reflected in one's behaviour.
15. Meaning. Meaning does not carry the ordinary connotative significance that it has in the science of semantics. In the Sufic science meaning is not allied, but inseparable from the experience of the recognition of meaning. In other words, it is not a "thing" which can be apprehended with the qualities of thingness. It is a mode of experiencing which takes places in a zone of awareness that is in itself a realm of the inward reality cognised in the waking state. Meaning/sensory, ma'na/hiss.
16. Khayal: An important term. Khayal means imagination, but in the special technical language of Ibn al-'Arabi the khayal contains an outer and inner meaning. Its outer (not inner) meaning is imagining in the ordinary sense of a "tangible reality" which is experienced mentally yet remains unreal, that is, untouchable and non-physical. Its inner meaning, however, is that faculty by which we solidify the objects - which are according to unveiling basically "not-there" - spatiality itself. There is much resistance to this in "rational" and programmed intellects as there is of the hand to the rock in "common sense" experience. The rock is there, it does not budge. There is, it must not be forgotten, a threshold situation where this is not so, for if the subject were brain-damaged, subjected to a hallucinogen, or hypnotic trance, then the object would experientially melt away. That is still not the same as seeing in which things are seen as-they-as in one unified field without differentiation, while alert within that condition of experiencing. And this state brings with it wisdom beyond the recognition of how-it-is at that moment - in other words a new understanding is established by the experience.

17. Ref to Qur'an 35:32, "...but some of them wrong themselves, some are ambivalent, and some outdo each other in good."

18. Hayra: Bewilderment. A Key term. Hayra is not a negative situation - it is the condition in which the seeker finds every intellectual channel blocked, every pathway of reason clashing against the other in contradiction so that it induces in the seeker a state of intensity. This intensity by virtue of its inner tension creates a condition we call hayra. It is a collapse of separation - a kind of "white hole" - which results in gatheredness. That is, the hayra creates a new condition which is its result and that result is a breakthrough into an illumination of the Real.

19. Meaning the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, who was given all the words.

20. By the oven (from which the water gushed out of the earth in the Flood.)

21. Hadith.

22. The manifestation of lordship.

23. 6:91, 22:84, 39:67.

24. The Sphere of the Sun.

4: The Seal of the Wisdom of Sanctification (Quddûs) in the Word of Idris

Elevation has two references - one of place and one of rank. Elevation of place is "We raised him up to a high place," (19:57) and the highest of places is that upon which the mill of the world of the spheres revolves. It is the sphere of the sun and in it is the station of the spirituality of Idris, peace be upon him! There are seven heavens under it and seven heavens above it, and it is the fifteenth. That which is above it is the red heaven, i.e. Mars, the heaven of Jupiter, Saturn, the heaven of fixed stars, the Starless Heaven and the heaven of the constellations, the heaven of the Kursi and the heaven of the 'Arsh. That which is below it is the heaven of Venus, Mercury, the Moon, the circle of ether, the circle of air, the circle of water, and the circle of earth. It is the axis of the heavens, and it is a "high place".

As for the elevation of rank, it is for us, the people of Muhammad. Allah said, "When you are uppermost and Allah is with you" (47:35) in this height. He exalts Himself above place, not above rank. When the selves of those among us who do deeds are afraid, He follows the mention of "being with" with His words, "He would not cheat you of your deeds." The deed demands place and knowledge demands rank. So He joined the two heights for us - elevation of place by deed and elevation of rank by knowledge. Then to disconnect the association of being with, He said, "Glorify the name of your Lord, the Most High," (87:1) above this association in meaning.

It is one of the most wondrous of matters that man is the highest of existent things - I mean the Perfect Man, and elevation is only attributed to him by subordination either to place or rank which is a degree. So he is not high by his essence, he is high by the height of place and the height of rank, for these possess height. Height of place is like the All-Merciful settling on the throne, (1) and it is the highest of places. Height of rank is "All things are passing except His Face," (28:88) and "the whole affair will be returned to Him," (11:123) and nothing has existence along with Allah.

When Allah said, "We raised him up to a high place," He made high an adjective for place. Since your Lord said to the angels, "I am putting a khalif in the earth," (2:30) this is height of rank. He said about the angels, "Were you overcome by arrogance, or are you one of the exalted?" (38:75) so He gave elevation to the angels. If the angels had possessed that elevation by simple virtue of the fact that they are angels, then all the angels would have been included in this elevation. It was not common to them in the definition of angel. We recognise that this is elevation of rank with Allah. It is the same for the khalifs of the people. If their elevation with the khalifate had been an elevation by essence, every man would have it. It is not general and so we know that that elevation is by rank.

One of His names is the High. Over whom, when there is nothing except Him? So He is the High by His Essence. Is He is High over that which is particular, when there is no He except Him? His elevation is by virtue of Himself, and He, in respect to existence, is the source of existents. Those in-time things which He calls high in themselves are not other than Him. He was the High when there was no height of relativity because the source-forms in non-existence had not smelt the scent of existence. They remain in their state in spite of the multiplicity of forms in existents, but the source is the same from the whole in the whole. The existence of multiplicity lies in the names which are the relationships, and they are non-existent matters. There is only the source which is the Essence. He is High through Himself, not by any ascription to another. From this standpoint, there is no height of relative relation in the universe, but the aspects of existence which are distinct. The height of relativity exists in the one Source in respect of the many aspects. For that reason, you say of Him, Him and not Him, and you and not you.

Al-Kharraz, (2) may Allah have mercy on him, who is one of the aspects of Allah and one of His tongues with which He speaks of Himself, said that one only has gnosis by joining opposites together in respect of Him. "He is the First and the Last, the Outwardly Manifest and the Inwardly Hidden." (57:3) He is the source of what appears and the source of what is hidden in the state of its manifestation. There is none who sees Him other than Him and there is none who is hidden from Him. So He is manifest to Himself and hidden from Himself. He is called Abu Sa'id al-Kharraz and other than that from the names of things in-time.

The Hidden says "No" while the Manifest says, "Me," and the Manifest says, "No" while the Hidden says, "Me". This is found in every opposite, yet the speaker is one, and he is the same as the hearer in the statement of the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, about what their selves say, (3) for they speak and hear what they say, and know what their selves say. The source is but one, even if the judgements are different. There is no way that anyone can be ignorant of this sort of thing. Every man knows from himself, and it is the form of the Real.

So things are mixed and numbers appear by the one in the known ranks. Thus "one" brought number into existence, and number divides the One. The principle of number only appeared through the numbered. Part of the numbered is non-existent, and part is existent. The thing is non-existent in relation to the senses while it is existent in relation to the intellect. There must be number and numbered. That must grow from one and it grows because of it. Every rank of the numbers has one reality like 9, for example, and 10 and down to 2, and upwards without end, and its reality is not a sum.

A name is not perceived by the addition of ones. 2 is one reality, and 3 is one reality, and so on until the end of these ranks. Even though the source [of numbers] is one, the source of one of them is not the source of the others. Addition encompasses them all, and it speaks of them from them and judges them by them. Twenty ranks (4) appeared in this statement, so composition entered into them. You will continue to affirm the source of what you deny in itself. Whoever recognises what we have related of the numbers, and that negation is the same as their affirmation, knows that the Real, who is disconnected by disconnection, is creature by connection, even though the creature is distinct from the Creator. The matter is the creature/Creator and it is the Creator/creature. That is from one source, rather is is the One source and it is many sources. Look at what you see!

Ibrahim's son told him, "My father, do what you are ordered." (37:102) The child is the same as his father, so he only saw himself sacrificing himself, "and He ransomed him with an immense sacrifice." (5) That which was manifested as a ram was manifested in the form of a human, and manifested in the form of a son. Rather, it is by the principle of the son being the same as the father. "He created from (one self) his mate." (4:1) He (6) married his own self, and from him are both his companion and his child. The matter is one in number. It is the same for nature and what is manifested from it. We do not see it diminishing by what appears from it nor increasing by the lack of what other than it manifests. That which is manifested is not other than it, nor is it the same as what is manifested according to the variety of forms in principle. This one is cold and dry, and that one is hot and dry. They are joined by dryness, and distinct by another quality. The common source is nature, and the world of nature is composed of forms in one mirror. Rather, it is one form in different mirrors.

There is only bewilderment (hayra) by the dispersal of perspectives. Whoever knows what we have said is not bewildered. If he increases in knowledge, it is only from the principle of place, and place is the same as the source-form in which the Real varies in the locus of His tajalli. Conditions vary, so He assumes every condition. There is no condition except for the source in which He make tajalli of Himself, and there is nothing except this.

By this aspect, Allah is creature, so interpret!
And by this aspect, He is not creature, so remember!
The inner sight of whoever understands what I have said is not confused, and only the one who perceives it possesses sight.
The source of joining and separating is the same,
and it is multiplicity which never remains or departs.

The One who is High in Himself is the One who possesses the perfection in which all matters of existence are absorbed, as are all non-existent relations, inasmuch as it is not possible that any of these attributes be lacking from Him, be they praiseworthy by custom, logic, or law, or blameworthy by custom, logic or law. That belongs only to the One named Allah. As for what is named other-than-Allah, it is either a locus of His tajalli or a form which is in it. If it is the locus of His tajalli, it contains distinction. Be-cause of that, there must be distinction between the One who makes tajalli and the place of tajalli; if it is a form in it, that form is the source of the essential perfection because it is the same as what is manifested in it. That which belongs to Allah belongs to that form. However, it is not said that it is Him nor that it is other-than-Him.

Abu-l-Qasim ibn Qasi (7) indicated this in his book, The Removal of the Sandals, and he said, "Each Divine Name is qualified by all the Divine Names, and described by their description." It is so. Each Name indicates the Essence and the meaning which is set out for it and which demonstrates it. In respect to its indication of the Essence, it possesses all the names, and in respect to its indication of the meaning which is singular to it, it is distinct from others, such as the Lord, the Creator, the Fashioner, etc. The Name is the same as the Named in respect to the Essence, and the Name is other than the Named in respect to the meaning which is particular to it.

If you have understood that the "high" is as we have mentioned, you know that it is neither place nor height of rank, for height of rank is particular to the administration of authority, like the Sultan and the judge, wazirs and qadis, and all who have rank, be they worthy of that rank or not. Height is by attributes which are not like that. The most knowledgeable of people can be ruled by the person with the position of power, even if that person is the most ignorant of people. This is the height of rank according to the principle of what he has over me in himself. When he retires, his high rank vanishes. The one with knowledge is not like that.

Notes to Chapter 4:

1. Qur'an 7:54, "...then He settled Himself firmly on the Throne."
2. Abu Sa'id Ahmad ibn 'Isa al-Kharraz, died in Cairo 286/899. He said, "I only knew Allah by joining the opposites," and then recited, "He is the First and the Last, the Outward and the Inward."

3. Hadith, "Allah forgives my people what their selves say to then as long as they do not act upon that."

4. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 20, 30, 40, 50, 60, 70, 80, 90, 100, 1000.

5. "And We ransomed him with an immense sacrifice." Qur'an: 37:107.

6. Adam.

7. Sufi leader of rebellion against the Murabitun in the Algarve.

5: The Seal of the Wisdom of Being Lost in Love (1) in the Wisdom of Ibrahim (Abraham)

Ibrahim is called the intimate friend, and he was an intimate friend (khalîl), because he was penetrated (takhallal) and gathered all the qualities of the Divine Essence. The poet says:

You pervaded the course of my spirit, and that is why the intimate friend is called the intimate friend.

It is like the colour which permeates the coloured, so it is a non-essential matter ('arad) in respect to its essential substance (jawhar), and it is not like the place and that which it occupies. Or it means the penetration of the Real into the existence of the form of Ibrahim. Each of these two principles is true as was mentioned, for each points to an aspect which appears without overstepping it.

Do you not see that the Real is manifest in the qualities of beings in-time and He gives news of that from Himself, and He is even manifest in the attributes of imperfection and the attributes of blame? Do you not see that the creature is manifest with the qualities of the Real from first to last, and all of them belong to him as the attributes of in-time things belong to the Real? "Praise belongs to Allah," so the results of praise from every praiser and one praised go back to Him, and "the whole affair will be returned to Him," (11:132) It includes what is blameworthy and praiseworthy, and there is only one or the other.

Know that when something is penetrated by something the first is contained by the second, so the penetrating is the name of the actor veiled by the penetrated, which is the name of the one acted upon, and it is the Outwardly Manifest. The name of the actor is the Veiled, the Inwardly Hidden. It is its food, as water permeates wool and so makes it expand. If the Real is the Outwardly Manifest, then the creature is veiled within Him, and creation is all the Names of the Real, His hearing and seeing, and all His ascriptions and discernments. If the creature is outwardly manifest, then the Real is veiled and hidden in him, and so the Real is the hearing of the creature, and his seeing, hand and foot, and all his faculties as it related in sound hadith. (2)

If the Essence were exempt from these relations, it would not be divinity. These relations are made by our sources, so we make Him god by our dependence on His godness. He is not recognised until we are recognised. The Prophet, peace be upon him, said, "Whoever knows himself knows his Lord." Such a person is the creature with the most knowledge of Allah. Some sages, especially Abu Hamid al-Ghazali, claim that one can have gnosis of Allah through disregarding the world. This is false. Indeed, the non-time pre-time is not recognised as god until that which depends on its being God is known. Thus it is a proof of Him. Then after this, in the second state, (3) unveiling accords you that the Real Himself is the source of the proof of Himself and His godness. The universe is but His tajalli in the forms of their source-forms whose existence is impossible without Him. He assumes various forms and modes according to the realities of these sources and their states, and this is after our knowledge of Him that He is our God.

Then the last unveiling comes, so our forms appear to you in Him, and some of us appear to others in the Real, and then some of us recognise each other and some of us are distinct from one another. Among us are those who recognise that our recognition of ourselves occurs in the Real, and some of us are unaware of the presence in which this recognition of ourselves takes place. "I seek refuge with Allah from being one of the ignorant." (2:67)

By the two unveilings together, He only judges us by ourselves, rather we judge ourselves by ourselves, but through Him. That is why He says, "Allah's is the conclusive argument," (6:149) meaning against those who are veiled when they say to the Real, in conformity with their desires, "Why did you do this or that to us?", thinking that it was not in conformity with their desires. "On the Day when the legs are bared," (68:42) means the matter which the gnostics unveil here. They see that the Real did not do to them what they allege that He did, but that it was from themselves. For He only lets them know what they are in themselves. From this their argument will dissolve, and the decisive proof of Allah will remain.

If you say, what is the benefit of His words, "If He had willed, He could have guided every one of you," (6:149; 16:9) we say in If He willed "if (law)" is a particle of impossibility showing impossibility. He only willed the matter as it is. But the source of possibility accepts the thing and its opposite in the principle of logical proof, and it is the same with any two logical principles. That which occurs is that which the possibility implies in the state of its immutability. The meaning of "If We had guided you" is, had He shown you the Truth. Allah does not open the inner eye of every possibility in the universe to the perception of the matter as it is. There are those who know and those who are ignorant. Allah did not so will, so He did not guide all of them, and He will not will it, and it is the same as if He had willed it. How would He will this which is not? His volition is unified in its connections. It is a relationship dependent on the known, and the known is you and your states. Knowledge does not have an effect on the known, rather the known has an effect on knowledge, and so it accords from itself what it is in its source.

Divine discourse relates according to what agrees with the ones addressed and what logical reflection accords it. It does not come according to what unveiling gives. For that reason, there are many believers, but the gnostics who possess unveiling are few. "There is not one of us who does not have a known station," (37:164) and it is what you are in your state of immutability which you manifest in your existence. This is if it is confirmed that you have existence. If existence is confirmed to the Real and not to you, the judgement is yours without a doubt in the existence of the Real. If it is confirmed that you are existent, then the judgement is yours without a doubt, even if the judge is the Real. It is only the overflowing of existence on you.

You only praise yourself and you only blame yourself, and praise is only due to Allah for the overflowing of existence, for that is His, not yours. You are His nourishment by conditions, and He is your nourishment by existence. He is specified by what specifies you. The command comes from Him to you, and from you to Him, even though you are called obligated, a passive name (mukallaf), and He is not called obligated since there is no imposition upon Him.

He praises me, and I praise Him.
He serves me and I serve Him.
In one state I draw near to Him, and in sources I deny Him.
So He knows me and I do not know Him, and I know Him and I witness Him.
Where is independence

when I help Him and assist Him?
 That is why the Real brought me into existence.
 Then I knew Him and manifested His existence.
 Hadith (4) brought us that,
 and in me He achieved His goal.

Then the intimate friend, Ibrahim, peace be upon him!, possessed this rank by virtue of which he was called the intimate friend. For that reason, he made hospitality to guests a sunna. Ibn Masarra (5) associates him with the angel Mika'il in respect to provisions. Provision is that which nourishes those provided for: when provision permeates the essence of the one provided for until nothing remains in it except permeation and nourishment flows in all the parts of the one nourished. There are no parts in divinity, so all the divine stations are penetrated which are designated by the Names, and by which His Essence is manifested.

We are His as our proofs confirm, and we are ours.
 Only my being belongs to Him, and we are His as we are ours.
 I have two aspects: Him and me,
 but He does not have "me" through me.
 However, His place of manifestation is in me, so we are His - like me.
 "Allah speaks the truth, and He guides to the Way." (33:4)

Notes to Chapter 5:

1. Huyûm is the intense love and passion which causes bewilderment and distraction.
2. ref. to hadith qudsî via Abu Hurayra, "My slave does not draw near Me with anything I love more than what I have made obligatory for him. My slave continues to draw near me with superogatory actions until I love him. When I love him, I am his hearing with he hears, his sight by which he sees, his hand with which he strikes, and his foot with which he walks." (Sahih al-Bukhari, 81:38:2)
3. The first unveiling was annihilation (fanâ') and the second is going-on (baqâ').
4. "I created existence so that I might be known."
5. Muhammad ibn Masarra al-Jabali, Andalusian Sufi and thinker, born in Granada 269 /883 and died near there in 319/931.

6: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Real in the Word of Ishaq (Isaac)

The ransom of a Prophet by an animal's sacrifice as an offering!
How can the bleating of a ram be equal to the voice of a man?
Allah Almighty magnified the ram out of concern for us or for it, but I do not see by what measure.
There is no doubt that the bodies of cows and camels are larger, but they relinquished the rank of sacrifice to the offering of the ram.
Would that I knew how a ram replaced the khalif of the All-Merciful with its small body!
Do you not see that the command to sacrifice implies correspondence and promises gain and diminishes loss?
There is no creature higher than the mineral, and after it comes the plant according to its ranks and measures.
The animal comes after the plant, and each one had gnosis of its Creator by unveiling and evident proof.
As for the one named Adam, he is limited by intellect, thinking, and the conventions of belief.
It is that which Sahl (at-Tustari) (1) and the realizer said as we do (2) - because we and they are in the degree of Ihsan.
Whoever witnesses the matter I have witnessed will say what I have said, both secretly and openly.
Do not pay any attention to words which contradict our words and do not sow grain in the land of the blind!
They are the "deaf and dumb" in the text of the Qur'an which the one protected from wrong action brought for our ears.

Know, may Allah support us and you! that Ibrahim, the intimate friend, peace be upon him, told his son, "I saw in a dream that I must sacrifice you." (37:102) He did not interpret it although the dream is the presence of the imagination (khayâl). It was a ram which appeared in the form of Ibrahim's son, and Ibrahim confirmed the vision. So his Lord ransomed his son from Ibrahim's illusion with the "mighty sacrifice", which was the interpretation of the vision with Allah, but Ibrahim was not aware of it.

The tajalli of form in the presence of the imagination requires another knowledge by which one can perceive what Allah means by that form. The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said to Abu Bakr when he interpreted a dream, "You have guessed part of it rightly, and you have missed part of it." Abu Bakr asked him to inform him of what was right in it and what was wrong, but the Prophet did not do so.

Allah said to Ibrahim when He called him, "Ibrahim, you have discharged your vision." (37:105) He did not say to him, "You have confirmed the vision that it is your son" because he did not interpret it. He took what he dreamt literally, whereas dreams require interpretation. That is why the 'Aziz, the ruler of Egypt, said, "...if you can interpret dreams."

(12:43) The meaning of interpretation is the transposition from the form of what one dreamt to another form. The cattle represented the hard years and the fertile years. If Ibrahim had been faithful to the dream, he would have sacrificed his son, since he believed in the dream that it really was his son, whereas with Allah it meant the "mighty sacrifice" in the form of his son. He ransomed him by what occurred in Ibrahim's mind, but it was not ransomed in actuality with Allah.

There is a common form to the sensory form of the sacrifice and the imaginary form of Ibrahim's son. If he had seen a ram in his imagination, he would have interpreted it as his son or something else. Then Allah said, "This was a most manifest trial," (37:106) i.e. his clear test, meaning his experience in knowledge - whether or not he knew what the perspective of the dream required in the way of interpretation. He knew that the place of the imagination required interpretation, but he neglected it and the condition inherent in it, and for this reason he believed in the vision.

Taqi ibn Mukhallad, the transmitter of traditions, did so too, having heard in a tradition he was sure of, that the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Whoever sees me in a dream, sees me when awake, for Shaytan cannot assume my form." (3) So Taqi ibn Mukhallad saw the Prophet in a dream in which the Prophet gave him milk to drink. Taqi ibn Mukhallad believed his dream, but he made himself vomit and threw up the milk. If he had interpreted the dream, he would have known that milk means knowledge, equal to the quantity that he drank. Do you not see that the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, received a goblet of milk in a dream and he said, "I drank it until satiety came out of my nails, and then I gave the surplus to 'Umar." It was said, "Messenger of Allah, what do you interpret it as?" He replied, "Knowledge." (4) He did not leave it as milk in its dream form since he had knowledge of the state of dreams and how they must be interpreted. It is known that the form of the Prophet, peace be upon him, which the senses see, is buried in Madina, and that the form of his spirit and his subtle form have never been seen by anyone nor by himself. For this reason, the spirit of the Prophet takes on material existence in the form of his body as he died, and nothing is missing from it. So it is Muhammad, peace be upon him, who appears in dreams through his spirit in a bodily form which resembles his buried body, for Shaytan cannot assume the form of his body, (5) may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and Allah protects the one who sees him. For this reason, whoever sees this form takes from it all that it orders or prohibits or gives good news of, even as he takes judgements from him in the life of this world - according to what they indicate from text, immediate or implicit. If he gives him something, that thing is subject to interpretation, unless it is manifest in the senses as it is in the imagination, and so does not require interpretation. It is based on this aspect that Ibrahim, the intimate friend, relied, even as Taqi ibn Mukhallad did. The vision has these two aspects. (6)

Allah taught us adab in what He did with Ibrahim and what He said to him when He gave him the station of prophethood. We know that when we see Allah in a form which logical reason rejects, we must interpret that form according to the Shari'a, whether it is in the state of the one who sees Him, or in the place in which He is seen, or the two together. If logical reason does not refute it, then we take it as we saw it, just as when we see Allah in the Next World.

So the One, the All-Merciful, has forms in every place from what is hidden and what is manifest.
If you said, "This is the Real!" you spoke truly;

and if you said, "It is something else," you interpreted.
 His principle is not in one place rather than another, but it brings the Real to the creatures.
 When He manifests Himself to the eyes, the intellects deny him by insistent proofs.
 He is accepted in the tajalli to the intellects, and in that which is called the imagination (khayâl).
 That which is sound is the seeing.

Abu Yazid, (7) may Allah be pleased with him, says of this station, (8) "Had the Throne, and all it contains a hundred million times over, been in one of the corners of the heart of the gnostic, he would not have felt it." This is the magnitude of Abu Yazid in the world of bodies, but I say, "If the limitlessness of that which exists could be conceived of as being limited, and had it been contained as an existent source in one of the corners of the heart of the gnostic, he would not have been aware of it in his knowledge." For it is confirmed that the heart contains Allah, although it is not described by satiety. Had it been filled, it would have saturated.

Abu Yazid also said, "We have pointed to this station, saying:
 O Creator of things in Yourself,
 You encompass all You have created!
 You create that whose being has no end in You, for You are narrow and vast!
 Had that which Allah created shone in my heart, this shining dawn would not have shone.
 But that which contains Allah does not exclude creation.
 How is that, O Hearing?"

Anyone can create by illusion in his imagination that which has no existence save in the imagination. This is a common matter. By aspiration (himma), the gnostic creates that which has an outside existence in his aspiration. However, it continues only as long as the aspiration continues to preserve it without being tired by preserving what it created. (9)

When it happens that the gnostic neglects to preserve what he created by concentration, that creature ceases to exist, unless the gnostic has mastered all the presences and does not neglect anything. Rather, he must witness at least one of these presences. If the gnostic creates something by his aspiration and possesses this encompassment, that creature's form will appear in every presence, and the form will preserve itself. If the gnostic neglects a presence or many presences while seeing one of the presences, and while preserving the form of what he created in the presence he is in, all the forms will be preserved by the preservation of that form in the presence which he does not neglect. For neglect is never universal, either among the common or the elite. I have exposed a secret here which the People of Allah have guarded jealously, for it contains a refutation of their allegation of being the Real. For the Real is never unconscious of anything, and the slave must be unconscious of something in favour of something else. Inasmuch as he preserves that which he has created, he says, "I am the Real," (10) but he does not maintain it the way the Real maintains it that is the difference. Inasmuch as he is unconscious of any form and its presence, the slave is distinguished from the Real. He must be distinct, although all the forms are maintained by his preservation of a single one of these in the presence of which he is conscious. This is preservation by inclusion, and the preservation of the Real of what He created is not like that. Rather, His preservation is of each form in particular. This matter which I have just communicated has never been written about by anyone - neither by me nor by any others - except in this book. It is unique in time. Take care lest you forget it!

The presence which you remain conscious of, with the form which resembles it, is like the Book about which Allah said, "We have not omitted anything from the Book." (6:38) It therefore integrates the tangible and the intangible. None will recognise what we have said except the one who is himself a Qur'an. (11) The one who fears Allah will have a furqân, (12) which is, as we mentioned, this matter in which the slave is distinct from the Lord. This furqân is the highest furqân.

At one moment, the slave is the Lord without a doubt, and at another the slave is most certainly the slave.
If he is the slave, he is vast by Allah, and if he is the Lord, he is in a restricted life.
Insofar as he is the slave, he sees the source of himself, and without a doubt his hopes expand from him.
Inasmuch as he is a lord, he sees all of creation, from the presence of angels and the kingdom, demanding from him,
And he is unable to answer their demands by his essence.
For this reason, some of the gnostics weep.
Be the slave of a Lord, and do not be the lord of His slave, so you will not be suspended and tested in the fire.

7: The Seal of the Wisdom of Elevation in the Word of Isma'il (Ishmael)

Know that the one called Allah is Unique (Ahad) by Essence and by all His names, and every existent thing is only attached to Allah by its own lord exclusively, for it is impossible for an existent to possess the whole. As for Divine Unity (ahadiyya), no existent possesses any of it because one cannot have one part of it while another has another part. Unity does not admit of divisibility. His Unity integrates all of Him by potentiality.

The happy one is the one who is the one "who was pleasing to his Lord." (19:55) There is no one who is not pleasing to his Lord because it is by him that lordship (rububiyyah) (1) is sustained. He is pleasing to Him, and so he is happy. This is why Sahl at-Tustari said, "Lordship has a secret, and this secret is you." He was addressing every source. "Had the secret been disclosed, lordship would have been invalidated." He used the word "law" (2) which is the particle of impossibility - so it is never manifested, and lordship is never invalidated - for the source has no existence except by its Lord. The source is always existent, therefore lordship is never invalidated.

He who is pleasing is beloved, and all that the beloved does is beloved, so everything is pleasing, because the source could not act unless the act belonged to its Lord. The source is made tranquil by having an act attributed to it, but it is content with what appears in it and from it of the acts of its Lord, and is pleased with these acts, because every doer and producer is pleased with his act and product. He completes his act and product according to its basis. "He gives each thing its created form and then guides it," (20:50) that is, He revealed to it that He gave everything its creation, so it does not admit of decrease.

Isma'il, peace be upon him, by his discovery of what we mentioned "was pleasing to his Lord." In the same way, every existent thing who is pleasing to its Lord is also pleasing to the Lord of another, because lordship is only obtained from each of the names, not from the One of Unity. What is specific to it from the whole is only what is attributed to it. So He is its Lord. None is attached to Him in respect of His Unity. For this reason, the people of Allah are forbidden tajalli in the Unity. If you look at Him by Him, He is the One who is looking at Himself, and He continues to be Himself looking at Himself by Himself. If you look at Him by yourself, unity vanishes because of you. If you look at Him both through Him and through you, Unity also vanishes because the pronoun of the second person implies that there is something else besides that which is regarded. There must be some relationship which necessitates the duality of the regarder and regarded, and so Unity vanishes, even though there only exists the One who sees Himself by Himself. It is known that in this description, He is the Regarder and the Regarded.

It is not possible that the one who is pleasing be totally pleasing, unless all that he manifests comes from the act of the One who is pleased with him. Isma'il was distinguished from other individuals by how Allah described him, namely, that "he was pleasing to his Lord."

It is the same for every "self at peace" to which it is said, "Return to your Lord." He only commanded it to return to its Lord who called it, and so it recognised Him among the totality, "well-pleasing and well-pleased. Enter among My slaves!" (89:28) to the degree that they have this station. The slaves mentioned here refer to every slave who has gnosis of his Lord, who is content with Him, and does not turn to the Lord of another while preserving the unity of the source which is necessary. "Enter My Garden," which is My veil, (3) and My Garden is not other than you, so you veil Me by your essence. There is only gnosis of Me by you and you only exist by Me, so whoever has gnosis of you has gnosis of Me, and there is no gnosis of Me, for there is no gnosis of you. If you enter into the Garden, you enter into yourself, so you will know yourself by a gnosis other than the gnosis by which you had knowledge when you knew your Lord. You will have two sorts of gnosis: gnosis of Him in respect of yourself, and gnosis of yourself and Him in respect of Him, not in respect of you.

You are a slave and you are a lord to whomever you are a slave in respect of.
And you are a lord and you are a slave to whoever possesses the covenant in speech.
Every knot has a person over it who unravels it by one who has another knot.

Allah is pleased with His slaves, and "they are well-pleasing and well-pleased with Him." He is pleasing, so the two presences confront each other and accept likes, and the likes are opposites because the two likes are a single reality which does not unify them since they would not then be distinct. There is only the distinct, so there is no like. There is no like in existence, and so there is no opposite in existence. Existence is one reality, and the thing is not opposite to itself.

Only the Real remains,
no phenomenal being remains.
There is nothing connected, nothing distinct.
For that reason, the proof of the eye-witness came, so I only see His source with my eye when I see!

That is for "the one who fears his Lord" lest He makes distinction by his knowledge. By that distinction, we indicated the ignorance of sources in existence according to what the knower brought, so distinction occurs among the slaves, and distinction occurs among the lords. If distinction had not occurred, one divine name would have been interpreted in all its aspects by that by which another name is interpreted. The explanation of the Exalter is not that of the Abaser, and so on, but from the aspect of unity, as we said, every name indicates the Essence and its reality in respect to what it is. The One Named is but One. The Exalter is the Abaser in respect to the Named. It is not the Abaser in respect to itself and its reality. That which is understood differs in the understanding in respect to each of them.

Do not look at the Real.
Free Him from creation.
Do not look at creation, and garb it in other than the Real.
Disconnect Him and connect Him, and stand in a seat of honour. (4)
Stay in the state of gatheredness (jam') if you wish, and, if you wish, in the forms in separateness (farq).
You will win all,
even if all set out to carry the day.
You will not be annihilated and you will not have going-on and the forms will not be annihilated and will not have going-on.

Revelation will not be given to you in respect to another, and you will not receive it.

Praise is by the truth of the promise, not the truth of the threat. The Divine Presence demands praise which is praiseworthy in itself. So one extols the Divine Presence by the truth of the promise, not the truth of the threat, for one goes beyond it, "and do not imagine that Allah break His promise to His Messengers." (14:47) He did not say, "and his threat", rather He said that He will pass over their wrong actions even though he threatens not to. He praised Isma'il because "he was true to his promise." (19:54) Possibility vanishes in respect to the Real, since in it is that which demands the probable.

Nothing remains except the One who is true to His promise alone, and an eye does not remain seeing the threat of the Real.
If they enter the abode of misery, in it they are in possession of delight, and a different bliss.
Than the bliss of the gardens of endless-time, but the matter is the same.
The difference between them occurs in the tajalli.
It is called punishment ('adhab) from the sweetness ('udhuba) of its food, that is like the husk of it, and the husk protects it.

Notes to Chapter 7:

1. Rububiyah: Lordship, the quality of being a lord. A term derived from the Qur'anic descriptions of Allah's lordship over creation. One might say the ecology of natural existence. It is an essential element in Sufic cosmology and is a most sophisticated concept which surpasses the crude specificity and mechanistic views of evolutionist biology. It is an energy system of relationships in constant change and altering dynamics. It functions through the different realms, the atomic, the mineral, the plant, and so on. It relates the levels of living organisms from the uni-cellular up to man, and the interpenetrations of organism and environment. It re-defines "event" from crude historicity to a picture of organism/event in a unified field. It is the underlying concept which allows us to abandon the dead mind/body split of the dying culture. It permits us to utilise and develop the energy concepts of Islamic/Chinese medicine - which hold a common energy concept at base. Rububiyya permits us to observe ONE PROCESS at work throughout every level of the creation realities.
2. "Law" (if, but probably not) expresses an unlikely condition, while "in" (if, but probably yes) expresses a probable condition.
3. Garden, Janna, also carries the connotation of veiling, concealing.
4. Qur'an 54:53-55, "The fearfully aware will be amid Gardens and Rivers on seats of honour in the presence of an All-Powerful King."

8: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Spirit (Rûh) in the Word of Ya'qub (Jacob)

The Din (1) is two Dins: the Din with Allah and with the one whom the Real knows, and who has recognition of the fact that the Real knows him; and the Din with creation; and Allah takes account of it since its goal is conformity with what Allah has willed of the Shari'a set down with Him. Allah said, "Ibrahim directed his sons to this, as did also Ya'qub, 'My sons! Allah has chosen this Din for you, so do not die except as Muslims'" (2:132) that is obeying Him. The Din brought the alif and the lam (2) of definition and acquaintance. It is the recognised Din. It is His words, "The Din with Allah is Islam," (3:19) and it is submission. So the Din is an expression of your obedience. That which is from Allah is the road which leads you to Him. Din is submission and the law (namus) is the road which Allah has set down.

Anyone who is described by submission to what Allah has prescribed for him is the one who has based himself on the Din, and it raises him up and establishes him as does the prayer. The slave is the product of the Din. Allah sets down judgements, and thus submission is the source of your action, and so Din is from your action. You will only achieve happiness by what comes from you. As happiness is established for you by your actions, so the Divine Names are only established by His actions, which are you and which are in-time. As He is called god by His effects, so you are called happy by your effects.

Allah bestowed His rank upon you since you established the Din and obeyed what He prescribed for you. I will enlarge on that, if Allah wills, in a useful manner, after we have clarified the Din which creation has which Allah takes account of when He says, "The Din is Allah's alone," (8:39) and all of it is from you, and not from Him except in respect to origin. Allah says, "They invented monasticism," (57:27) and monasticism consists of arbitrary esoteric rules (an-nawâmis al-hikmiya) which the known Messenger did not bring to the people from Allah by the traditional Prophetic method. When wisdom and clear benefit corresponded to these rules regarding the divine decision about the goal of the Shari'a of Allah, (3) Allah took it into account according to what He Himself prescribed. Allah did not prescribe it for them. Then Allah opened between Himself and their hearts the door of divine concern and mercy while they were not aware of it, and in their hearts He made them esteem their rules by which they seek "the pleasure of Allah" beyond the Prophetic method known by Divine definition. Allah says, "They did not observe it" those people who devised these rules and what was prescribed for them "as it should have been observed" - "unless it was purely out of the desire to gain the good pleasure of Allah." That was what they believed about it.

"To those of them who believed We gave their reward, but many of them are deviators." (57:27) "Many of them," i.e. those who have this worship prescribed for them, "are deviators," that is, do not submit to it and observe it properly. Allah does not accord to the one who does not obey it, a law which pleases Him, but the command requires submission. Its proof is that the one who is obligated either obeys with agreement or opposes it. The one who agrees and is obedient has no need of any discourse on it to prove it. The one who opposes it is seeking one of two matters from Allah to be judged regarding him: either overlooking of wrong actions and forgiveness, or being taken to task for that. One of the two is necessary because the command is true in itself. In any state, it is true that Allah guides His slave by his actions whatever state he is in, and so the state is the influencing factor.

Thus the Din is a reward, that is, the exchange for what is easy and for what for is not easy. "Allah is pleased with them, and they are pleased with Him" (97:8, 58:22) is the easy reward, and "As for any one of you who has done wrong, We will make him suffer great punishment" (25:19) is the reward of what is not easy. He passes over their wrong actions and this is their reward. It is proven that the Din is the reward. As the Din is Islam, and Islam is the same as being led, it leads to what is easy (the reward) and what is not easy (the punishment), and so it is the repayment. This is the language of the people of outwardness.

As for its secret and inwardness, it manifests itself in the mirror of the existence of Allah, so it does not refer to possibilities from Allah other than what their essences in their states accord. They have a form in every state, and their forms differ according to the difference of their states. The tajalli differs according to the difference of the state. The effect occurs in the slave according to what he is. None gives him good except himself, and none gives him the opposite of good except himself. Thus he gives bliss to his essence, and he also punishes it. He only blames himself and only praises himself. "Allah's is the conclusive argument" (6:149) in His knowledge of them since knowledge depends on the known.

The secret which is above this in this sort of question is that possibilities are based on their origin from non-existence. The existence of the created reality is only by the forms of the states on which the possibilities are based in themselves and their sources. Thus you know who has pleasure and who has pain, and from each of these states you know what follows ('aqaba); and since it follows, you derive punishment ('uquba) and penalty ('iqab) from it. It permits good and evil as two opposites which custom calls the good reward, and the evil punishment.

For this reason, He designates and elucidates the Din by custom because He relates to it what is necessary and what his state demands. Din is custom or habit, and the poet said, "Like your habit (Din) with the mother of little Harith...," that is, like your custom. What is understood by custom or habit is that the matter itself recurs. This is not the case in Din. Custom is repetition, but custom is only one intelligible thing while resemblance in forms exists. We know that Zayd is the same as 'Amr in respect to humanness, but humanness does not recur since, had it done so, it would have multiplied. It is but one reality, and the one does not multiply itself. We know that Zayd is not the same as 'Amr in respect to personality. The person of Zayd is not the person of 'Amr in spite of the realisation that personality is common to both. In the sensory, we say that humanness recurs because of this resemblance, and we say in sound judgement that it does not. From one aspect, there is no habit in reward, and from another aspect, there is habit even as there is reward by one aspect and no reward by another aspect. Thus reward is also a state in the possible. This is a question about which those who know this matter are unaware, and it is part of the secret of the Decree which governs creatures. Know that it is as if it were said of the doctor that he is the servant of nature - in the same way, it is said of the Messengers and heirs 4 that they are the servants of the Divine Command among people. In the heart of the matter, they serve the states of possible things, and their service derives from the sum of their own states on which they are based in the state of the immutability of their sources. See how wondrous this is!

Is not the the desired servant here the one who performs what is commanded by the one who is served, either by state or by word? So it is valid that the doctor be called the servant of nature if he acts according to the principle of assisting it. Nature produces in the body of the one who is ill a special state of being by which he is called "ill". If the doctor were to assist nature by service, he would also increase the magnitude of the illness by it when he wants to repel the illness, seeking health. Health is also a part of nature by the growth of another state of being which differs from this state of being. Then the doctor is not the servant of nature, and yet he serves it inasmuch as he only heals the body of the one who is ill and changes that aspect, not the general one, for generalities are not valid in this sort of question. Thus the doctor is both a servant and is not a servant of nature.

In the same way, the Messengers and their heirs are in the service of the Real, and the Real has two aspects of judgement in respect to the states of the obligated. The matter proceeds from the slave according to what the will of Allah demands of it, and the will of Allah is attached to it according to what the knowledge of Allah demands of it. The knowledge of Allah is attached to it according to what the known accords it of its essence. The known only appears in its form. The Messenger and the heir serve the divine command by will, and yet they do not serve the will. The Messenger answered it seeking the happiness of the one who is under obligation. Had he served the Divine Will, he would not have given counsel, and yet he only gave counsel by it, i.e. the will. The Messenger and the heir are the doctors of the selves for Next life, obedient to the command of Allah when He commands them. So he looks at Allah's command, and sees that He has commanded him to do that which opposes His will. The command is only what He wills, and for this reason, it is the command.

He wills the command and it occurs, and He did not will the occurrence of what He commanded the commanded one to do, and so it did not occur from the commanded one therefore it is called opposition and rebellion. The Messenger conveys the news, and this is why he said, "The Sura of Hud (and its like) made me white-haired," when they came to him from His words, "Go straight as you have been commanded." (11:112) He did not know whether he was commanded to what complies with the will, so that it occurs, or to what does not comply with the will, so that it does not occur.

No one recognises the judgement of the will except after what is willed takes place, unless he is one whose inner eye has been unveiled by Allah. If he is, he will perceive the source-forms of the possibilities in their fixed state for what they really are. Then he judges according to what he sees. This belongs to certain people at certain moments, but they do not have it all the time. The Messenger said, "I do not know what He will do with me or with you." (5) So he made the veil clear, and he only meant that it emerges in a particular command, and no more.

Notes to Chapter 8:

1. Din: The life transaction, literally the debt or exchange situation between two parties, in this usage the Creator and the created, or as some say between the conditioned and the unconditioned, the limited and the limitless, or the many and the One.
2. The definite article.
3. Which is the achievement of human perfection through knowledge and actions.
4. Hadith, "The people of knowledge are the heirs of the Prophets."
5. Hadith in al-Bukhari.

9: The Seal of the Wisdom of Light in the Word of Yusuf (Joseph)

This luminous wisdom spreads its light on the presence of the imagination (khayal), and it is the first of the beginnings of divine revelation in the people of divine concern. 'A'isha, may Allah be pleased with her, said, "The first of what the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, had of revelation was the true dream. Then he only saw dreams which came like the breaking of dawn, and there was nothing hidden in it," (1) and her knowledge only extended to this. This lasted for six months, and then the angel came to him. She did not know that the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, had said, "People are asleep, and when they die, they waken up." Everything seen in the state of wakefulness is of that sort, although states differ. She spoke of six months, but all his life in this world was like that, as a dream in a dream.

Everything reported of this nature is called the world of the imagination (khayal), and for this reason, there must be interpretation: the matter which has a form in itself appears in a form other than it. The interpreter passes from these forms which the sleeper sees to the form upon which the matter is based. If he is correct, as in knowledge appearing in the form of milk, then he interprets the source of the form of knowledge from the form of milk. He discovers the source and says, "This form of milk refers to the form of knowledge."

When the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, received revelation, he was taken from the ordinary sensory world. He was covered and withdrew from those who were present with him. When that left him, he returned, and he only received revelation in the "presence of the imagination", although it could not be said of him that he had been asleep.

It was the same when the angel appeared to him as a man. That was also from the presence of the imagination, for it was not a man, but rather an angel who had entered into the form of a man. The gnostic onlooker interpreted it until he reached its form in reality. Then he said, "This is Jibril who came to teach you your deen." (2) He told them, "Answer the greeting of the man," so he called him a man in respect to the form in which he appeared to them. Then he said, "This is Jibril," and he looked at the form to which this imaginary man would return. He spoke the truth both times, with the truth of the vision of the physical eye, and the truth in that this was Jibril without a doubt.

Yusuf, peace be upon him, said, "I saw eleven stars and the sun and the moon prostrate themselves in front of me." (12:4) He saw his brothers in the form of the stars and his father and mother in the form of the sun and moon. This is from the point of view of Yusuf. Had it been from the point of view of what was seen, the appearance of his brothers in the form of stars and the appearance of his father and mother in the form of the sun and moon would have been from their volition. Since they had no knowledge of what he saw, that which Yusuf perceived was in the repository of his imagination.

Ya'qub knew that when he related it to him, so he said, "O my son, do not tell your vision to your brothers in case they should devise some scheme to injure you." (12:5) Then he absolved his sons of deceit and ascribed it to Shaytan, who is the source of deceit. He said, "In truth, Shaytan is a clear-cut enemy to man," i.e. he manifests enmity. Then Yusuf said at the end of the affair, "This is now the interpretation of the dream that I had. My Lord has made it all come true," (12:100) that is, that He manifested it in the world of senses after it was in the form of the imagination.

The Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said about it, "People are asleep". Yusuf spoke of what his Lord had rendered true in the status of one who dreams that he has awakened from his dream and interprets it, and does not know that he is still asleep. Then later when he wakes up, he says, "I dreamt such-and-such a thing, and then I dreamt that I woke up and interpreted in such-and-such a way." This is similar to that. Look at how great the difference of perception is between Muhammad, peace be upon him, and Yusuf, peace be upon him, at the end of the affair when Yusuf said, "This is the interpretation of my dream of long ago which my Lord has rendered true," that is, made sensory or sensed. It was always sensed, since the imagination only gives out sensed things, and it has nothing other than that. See how noble is the knowledge of the heirs of Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace!

I would say more on this presence on the Muhammadan tongue of Yusuf, as you will soon understand, if Allah wills. Know that that which is referred to as other-than-Allah, or the universe, is related to Allah as the shadow is related to the person. The universe is the shadow of Allah. It is the same as the relation of existence to the universe, since the shadow exists in the senses without a doubt. But there must be something by which that shadow appears. If one were to remove that by which the shadow appears, the shadow would be intelligible but would not exist in the senses. Rather, it would be a potential in the essence of the person on whom it depends. The locus of the manifestation of this divine shadow called the "universe" is the sources of the possibilities by which this shadow extends itself. This shadow is perceived according to what it projects itself on from the existence of this essence, but perception occurs through His name, the Light. This shadow is projected on the sources of possibilities in the form of the unknown unseen.

Do you not see that shadows incline to the darkness, indicating the hiddenness they contain because of the distance of the relationship between them and the persons who project them? Even if the person is white, his shadow is like this. Do you not see that when mountains are distant from the eye of the onlooker, they appear black? In their actual sources they are other than the colour the senses perceive. This is only due to the effect of distance. It is like the blue of the sky. This is the effect distance has on the senses with non-luminous bodies. It is the same for the sources of possibilities which are non-luminous because they are non-existent. Even if they are described as unchanging, they are not described by existence since existence is light. Distance makes luminous bodies appear small in the senses, so this is another effect of distance. The senses perceive them as small in size, whereas in their sources they are large according to that degree and greater in magnitude. One knows by proof that the sun is larger than the earth, but it appears to be the size of a shield. That is also an effect of distance.

You only know the universe according to the amount you know the shadows, and you are ignorant of the Real according to what you do not know of the person on which that shadow depends. Inasmuch as He has a shadow, He is known, and inasmuch as one is ignorant of what is in the essence of the shadow of the form which projects the shadow, he is ignorant of Allah. For that reason, we say that Allah is known to us from one aspect and not known to us from another aspect. "Do you not see how your Lord stretches out shadows? If He had wished, He could have made them stationary," (25:45) i.e. it still would be a potential in Himself. It is as He said, that Allah would not give a tajalli of Himself to possibilities until He manifests the shadow. The shadow is as if it remains outside of the possibilities which do not have a source manifested for them in existence.

"Then We appoint the sun to be a pointer to them," that is to His name, the Light of which we spoke, and the senses witness it, for shadows have no source in the absence of light. "Then We draw them back to Ourselves, in gradual steps," so Allah draws it back to Himself because it is His shadow which appeared from Him, and it is not other-than-Him. All that you perceive is the existence of Allah in the sources of possibilities. Inasmuch as the He-ness of Allah is He, it is His existence. Inasmuch as forms differ in it, it is the sources of possibilities. As the name of the shadow does not leave it by the difference of forms, in the same way the name of the universe or the name other-than-Allah does not leave it by the difference of forms. In regard to the Divine Unity of His being, the shadow is Allah, because He is the One, the Unique; and in respect to the multiplicity of forms, it is the world, so understand and realise what I have explained to you! Since the matter is as I mentioned, the universe is illusory, and it does not have a real existence. This is the meaning of the imagination, that is, you imagine that the universe is an autonomous extra thing outside of Allah. It is not like that in itself. Do you not see that in the senses, the shadow is connected to the person who projects it, and it is impossible that it be detached from that connection since it is impossible for something to be detached from its own essence? Recognise your source ('ayn), and who you are, what is your he-ness and what your relation to Allah is, and by what You are the Truth and by what you are the universe, "other", and whatever resembles these expressions. In this, those that know vie in excellence, so there is the one who knows and the one who is more knowing.

The Real is, in relation to a particular shadow, small or large, pure or more pure, as light is in relation to what veils it from the onlooker through coloured glass which tints it. At the same time, it has no colour, and so you see it as making a mirror-image of your reality to your Lord. If you say that the light is green by the greenness of the glass, you will have spoken the truth as your sensory vision testifies. If you say that it is not green and has no colour as evidence accords you, you will have spoken the truth as sound logical consideration testifies. This is light projected across the shadow, and it is the same as the glass which is a luminous shadow because of its purity. It is the same for one of us who has realised the Real. His form manifests itself in him more than it manifests itself in another. Among us there is the one for whom Allah is his hearing, seeing, and all his faculties and limbs, (3) according to the signs which the Shari'a gives in a transmission from Allah. In spite of this, the source of the shadow exists, so the pronoun of "his hearing" refers to him. Other slaves are not like this. The relation of this slave is nearer to the existence of Allah than the relation of other slaves.

Then the matter is as we have confirmed. So know that you are imagination and that which you perceive and of which you say, "It is not me" is also imagination. All of existence is imagination within imagination. True existence is Allah, the Real, in particular in respect to essence and source, not in respect to His Names, because the Names have two meanings. One meaning is His source which is the same as the "Named", and the other meaning is what it indicates and that by which the Name is separate from this other Name, and so distinct. The Ever-Forgiving is separate from the Manifest and the Hidden, and the First is distinct from the Last. Thus it is clear to you that each Name is the same as the other Name, and yet it is not the other Name. Inasmuch as the Name is the same, it is the Real, and inasmuch as it is not it, it is the imaginary Real which we discussed.

Glory be to the One who is only proven by Himself and Whose being is only confirmed by His source! The Hidden is pure non-existence, so whoever holds to multiplicity, holds to the universe and the Divine Names and the names of the world. Whoever holds to Divine Unity holds to Allah in respect to His Essence which is independent of the universe, not in respect to its divinity and form. If the Essence is independent of the universe, then He is the source of its independence from the ascriptions of the Names, because it has the Names, and they indicated it as they indicate other named things in which their effect is realised. "Say: He is Allah, Absolute Oneness" (112:1) in respect of his source, "Allah, the Everlasting Sustainer of all" in respect to our dependence on Him. "He has not given birth" in respect to His He-ness and us, "and was born born" the same way, "and no one is comparable to Him" in the same way.

This is His description so He singled out His Essence in His statement, "Allah is Unique (Ahad)". Multiplicity appears by His attributes which are known with us. We beget and are begotten, we depend on Him, and we are equals to one another. This is the One who is pure above these attributes. He is independent of them as He is independent of us. There is no description of Allah except for this sura, the Sura al-Ikhlās (112), and it was revealed in that. The Divine Unity (ahadiyya) of Allah is in respect to the Divine Names which demand the unity of multiplicity on our part, and the Divine Unity of Allah, in respect to His independence from us and from the names, is the Divine Unity of the source. Both of them are included in the name, the Unique One (al-Ahad).

Know that Allah has not manifested the shadows and made them prostrate themselves, casting themselves to the left and the right, (4) except as indications for you of yourself and Him. In this way you are able to recognise who you are and what your relationship to Him is, and what His relationship to you is, until you know from where and by which divine reality that which is other-than-Allah is described, through its complete poverty to Him as well as the relative poverty of some to others. In this way also, you are able to know from where and by what reality it is that Allah is described by independence from people and the universe, and the universe is described by independence, i.e. the independence of some from others in an aspect which is the source of its need of some. For the universe is in need of causes without a doubt by essential need. The greatest of its causes is the causality of Allah, and there is no causality of Allah by which the universe is in need except for the Divine Names. The universe is in need of each of the Divine Names, whether from the universe like it or, from Allah Himself. Thus it is Allah, and not other-than-Him.

This is why Allah said, "Mankind! you are the poor in need of Allah whereas Allah is the Rich Beyond Need, the Praiseworthy." (35:15) It is known that we depend on each other. Our names are the Names of Allah since everything is, without a doubt, in need of Him. At the same time, our sources are His shadow, and not other-than-Him. So He is our he-ness, and He is not our he-ness. We have prepared the way for you, so look!

10: The Seal of the Wisdom of Divine Unity (Ahadiyya) in the Word of Hud

Allah has the straight path which is manifest and unhidden among the common people.
Its source exists in great and small, in those who are ignorant of matters and those who know.

For this reason, 'His mercy encompasses everything,' (1) great and small. "There is no creature He does not hold by the forelock. My Lord is on a Straight Path." (11:56) So all that walks on the Straight Path of the Lord, and is not of those "against whom Allah is wrathful" from this aspect, nor is he "astray". (2) As being astray is a non-essential quality, so divine wrath is also a non-essential quality. The source to which they return is the "mercy which extends to all things", and which preceded wrath. Everything which is other-than-Allah is a creature which crawls and which has a spirit. There is nothing which crawls by itself, rather it crawls by other than it. It crawls by the principle of following the One who is on a Straight Path. It is only a path by virtue of the fact that it is walked on.

If creation draws near you, Allah draws near you.
If Allah draws near you, creation does not follow.
So realise what we say on it, and everything I have said to you is true.
There is no existent thing in phenomenal being that you see which does not have articulation.
The eye only sees of creation that its source is Allah.
But He is stored in it, and for this reason, its forms are true.

Know that divine knowledges of taste (dhawq) which are acquired by the people of Allah differ according to the different faculties acquired from them, even though they derive from a single source. Allah said, "I am his hearing by which he hears and his sight by which he sees and his hand by which he strikes and his foot by which he walks." (3) So He mentioned that His He-ness is the source of the limbs which are the same as the slave. Thus He-ness is one, but the limbs are different, and every limb has one of the knowledges of taste which are specified from a single source, and differ according to the different limbs. It is like water which is but a single reality, yet differs in taste according to the different locations. The water of the Euphrates is sweet, and brackish water is salty, yet it is water in all its states and its reality does not change, even though the taste differs.

This wisdom is from the wisdom of the feet. It is the words of Allah, that whoever establishes His Books will eat "from beneath their feet" (5:66). The path which is the Straight Path is travelling on it, and walking and running on it. It is only by the feet. So this witnessing of the taking by the forelock by the hand of the One who is one the Straight Path only results in this special art from the knowledges of taste. "We will drive the evildoers" (19:86), (4) who are those who deserve the station to which they are sent, and destroy them by the west wind. (5) The wind takes them by the forelocks and carries them on, and it is the source of the passions which take them to Jahannam. It is the distance (6) which they imagined. When it carried them to that abode, they reached the source of nearness, and so distance vanished. What is called Jahannam vanished in respect to them. They win the bliss of nearness in respect to merit since they were wrong-doers.

This pleasurable station of taste was not given to them as a favour. They received it by what they realities merited from the acts which they were doing. They were running with their actions on the Straight Path of the Lord because their forelocks were in the hand of the One who has this attribute. They did not walk by themselves, but by the principle of compulsion to reach the source of nearness. "We are nearer to him than you, but you cannot see." (56:85) Rather it is seen, and so the covering is stripped away, and "his sight is sharp." (7) What is specified as dead is from the dead, i.e. what distinguishes the happy from the wretched in usage. "We are nearer to him than his jugular vein." (50:16) What is specified as man is from man, so divine nearness is from distance as is not hidden in divine transmissions. There is no nearness nearer than that His He-ness be the source of the limbs of the slave and his faculties. The slave is not other than these limbs and faculties, so he is Allah witnessed in illusory creation. Creation is intelligible and Allah is felt and witnessed with the believers and the people of unveiling. Allah is intelligible with other classes, and creation is witnessed. So they are in the station of the salty, brackish water. The first group is the station of the sweet water which is pleasant to drink.

People are of two classes those who walk on the path recognising it and its end, for it is a straight path in respect to him; and those who walk on the path being ignorant of it and not knowing its end. It is the same path which the other class knows. The gnostic calls to Allah by inner sight, and the non-gnostic calls to Allah by limitation and ignorance. This is a special knowledge which comes from the lowest of the low (8) because the feet are the lower part of the person, and what is lower than them is none other than the path. Whoever recognises that Allah is the same as the Path, recognises the matter for what it is. Then Allah is travelling on it since there is no known except Him, and He is the source of the wayfarer and the traveller. There is no knower except Him. He is you, so know your reality and your Path (tariqa). The matter has been made clear to you on the tongue of the interpreter, (9) if you but understand. It is the true tongue, so the only one who will understand is the one whose understanding is Real.

Allah has many ascriptions and their existence varies. See how 'Ad, the people of Hud, said, "This is a storm cloud which will give us rain." (46:24) They thought good of Allah, and He is with the opinion of His slave. (10) Allah turned this word away from them. He informed them of what was more perfect and higher in nearness. When it rained upon them, that was the earth's portion and the seed was watered. He told them, "No, rather it is what you desired to hasten a wind containing painful punishment." He made the wind (rîh) an indication of what rest (râha) it contained for them. By this wind, He gladdens their spirits (arwah), delivering them from dark forms, difficult paths and black veils. There is punishment ('adhab) in this wind, i.e. a matter which they find sweet (ista'dhaba) when they taste it. It only pains them by the separation from familiar things. Thus punishment gives them good news. And the command is nearer to them than they imagine.

"Destroying everything at its Lord's command ! When morning came you could see nothing but their dwellings." (46:25) That is, their corpses, in which their true spirits lived, so the trueness of this special relation vanished from them; and a special life in their forms remains to them from Allah of which their skins, hands, and feet speak, (11) so does the punishment of the blows and thighs. (12) All that is related in a divine text.

Allah described himself by jealousy (ghayra). Out of jealousy He forbade actions unrestrained by limits (fawahish). The unrestrained act is only what is evident. As for the unrestrained which is hidden, it belongs to the one who manifests it. When He made the unrestrained haram, that it, forbade that the reality of what we mentioned be known, and that is the source of things, He hid it by other (ghayr). So other says: hearing is Zayd's hearing. The gnostic says that hearing is Allah. Thus nothing remains of the faculties and limbs. Therefore not everyone recognises Allah. People vie in excellence and ranks are differentiated, and the exceeding and exceeded are clear.

Know that Allah revealed to me and caused me to witness in a vision, which I received in Cordoba in 586, the sources of His Messengers and all His Prophets, from Adam to Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. None of this group spoke to me except for Hud, peace be upon him. He told me why they were gathered together. I saw that he was a very large man of good appearance, subtle in reply, gnostic in matters of unveiling. My proof of his unveiling is His words, "There is no creature He does not hold by the forelock. My Lord is on a Straight Path." (11:56) What gift to creatures is greater than this? Then it is from the bestowal of favours on us by Allah that this speech reached us from Him in the Qur'an.

Then Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant us peace, completed its gathering for everyone by what he was told by Allah, for He is the source of "hearing, sight, the hand, the foot and tongue the source of the senses. The spiritual faculties are nearer than the senses. He is content with the defined and distant more than with the defined unknown which is nearer. Allah translated the speech of Hud to his people to inform us, and the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, translated the speech of Allah in turn to give us good news. Knowledge is perfected in the breasts of those who are given knowledge, "and none denies Our signs but the unbelievers," (29:47) for they cover up the signs when they recognise them through envy, meanness and injustice. We only see from Allah in respect of Himself disconnection (tanzih) or non-disconnection by definition in any ayat which He has sent down or in transmissions which have reached us from Him. Otherwise He has the Great Mist (al-'Ama') (13) which has no air above it and no air beneath it. Allah was in it before He created creation. Then He mentioned that He "established Himself firmly on the Throne." (57:4) This is also definition. Then He mentioned that "He descends to the nearest heaven." (14) This is also definition. Then He said that "He is in the heaven and in the earth," (15) and "He is with us wherever we are." (16) and He tells us that He is our source. We are limited, so He only describes Himself by limitation.

His statement, "There is nothing like Him," (42:11) is also limitation if we take the kaf ("like") as an appendage to other than the attribute. Whoever is distinct from the defined is defined by his phenomenal being which is not the source of what is defined. Freedom from limitation is limitation, and the absolute is limited by absoluteness for whoever has understanding. If we attach the kaf of ka-mithli (like) to the attribute, we define it. If we take "There is nothing like Him" as the negation of "like (mithl)", we realise the given and the sound transmissions that He is the source of things, and that things are defined. If their definitions differ, He is defined by the definition of everything with a definition. Nothing is defined unless it is a definition of Allah's. He moves in the designation of creatures and creation. Had the matter not been like that, existence would not have been valid, for He is the source of existence. He preserves everything by His Essence, and the preserving of something does not oppress Him. (17) His preserving of all things is His preserving of His form in that the thing is other than His form. Only this is valid. He is the witness in the witness and the witnessed in the witnessed. (18) He is the spirit of the universe which is managed by Him, and it is the Macrocosmic or Great man (al-insan al-kabir).

He is all phenomenal being and He is the One (al-Wahid) who establishes my phenomenal being by His being,
For that reason, I said that He is nourished.
So my existence is His food, and we imitate Him in Him from Him, if you look by the aspect of my taking refuge.

For his sorrow breathed, so the breath is related to the All-Merciful because He is Merciful by it. Divine ascriptions demand it from the bringing into existence of the form of the universe which we have said is what is manifest by Allah since He is the Manifest. It is His inward since He is the Hidden; and He is the First since He was when they were not. He is the Last since their source is in their manifestation. The Last is the source of the Manifest, and the Hidden is the source of the First. He has knowledge of all things since he knows Himself. When He brought forms into existence in the Breath, and the power of the ascriptions designated by the names appeared, the divine ascriptions then became valid for the universe. They depend on Allah. He said, "Today, I set down your ascriptions and raise up My ascriptions," i.e. I take from you your dependence on yourselves and return to you your dependence on Me. Where are those who are fearful of Allah? (19) they those who take Allah as a safeguard. Allah is their manifest part, i.e. the source of their manifest forms. They are the greatest of people, the most pure and the strongest among all. The one who has taqwa is the one who makes himself a safeguard for Allah by His form since the He-ness of Allah is the faculties of the slave. The one called the slave makes a safeguard for the One called Allah based on witnessing, so that the knower is distinct from the one who does not know. "Say: 'Are they the same those who know and those who do not know?' It is only people of intelligence who pay heed," (39:9) and they see into the core of the thing (20) which is sought from that thing. The negligent one does not precede the diligent, and similarly the hireling does not resemble the slave, Since Allah is a safeguard for the slave by one aspect, the slave is a safeguard for Allah by another aspect. Say what you like about phenomenal being. If you like, say that it is creation. If you like, say that is the Real. If you like, say that it is both the Real and creation. If you like, say that it is not Real from every point of view and not creation from every point of view. If you wish, say it is bewilderment in that. The goals are made clear by your specification of ranks. If it had not been for definition, the Messengers would not have reported the changing of the Real in forms, nor would they have described Him by the dropping of forms from Himself.

and authority only rests with Him.

We are His, and by Him, in His hand, in every state, so we are with Him. For that reason, He is denied and recognised, disconnected and described. The one who sees Allah from Him in Him by His eye is a gnostic. The one who sees Allah from Him in Him by his own eye is not a gnostic. The one who does not see Allah from Him nor in Him, and waits to see Him by his own eye is veiled and ignorant.

On the whole, each person must have some doctrine of his Lord by which he refers to Him and in which he seeks Him. So when Allah manifests Himself to him in it, he knows Him and goes near Him. If He manifests Himself to him in other than it, he denies Him and takes refuge from Him and has bad adab in that matter while claiming he shows adab with Him. (21) He only believes in a divinity according to the [subjective] form he gives that in himself. The divinity of creeds is based on subjective positing. People only see themselves and what they formulate in themselves.

Look at the ranks of people in knowledge of Allah. That is the source of their ranks in vision on the Day of Rising; and I have taught you the necessary cause of it. Take care lest you be limited by a particular creed and deny what is other than it, so that a great blessing may pass you by. Indeed, knowledge of what the matter is based on may pass you by.

Make yourself a vessel for all the forms of belief. Surely Allah is vaster and greater than being contained by one creed rather than another. So Allah says, "Wherever you turn, the face of Allah is there." (2:115) He did not mention one "where" less than another. He said there is the face of Allah. The face of the thing is its reality. By this He spoke to the hearts of the gnostics, that they might not occupy themselves with non-essentials in this life through seeking the like of this. The slave does not know in which breath he will be taken. He may be taken at the time of his negligence, and then he will not be equal to the one taken in a state of presence.

Then the slave who is perfect knows that this is linked to exterior form and to the state limited by turning the prayer toward the Masjid al-Haram. He believes that Allah is in his qibla when he prays. Those are some of the ranks of Allah from "Wherever you turn, the face of Allah is there." The direction of the Masjid al-Haram is one of them. In it is the face of Allah, but do not say "He is here", rather stop with what you perceive and cling to adab in turning towards the Masjid al-Haram, and cling to adab in the non-encompassment of the face in this particular whereness. Rather whereness is part of the sum of directions to which one turns. So Allah makes it clear to you that He is in the "where-ness" of every direction.

There are only creeds, so all directions are correct. Every correct thing has a reward. Every rewarded thing is happy. Every happy one is approved. If he is wretched at one time in the Next Abode, the people of preservation experience illness and pain in this life in spite of our knowledge that they are happy and the people of Allah. Among the slaves of Allah are those who are overtaken by these pains in the other life in an abode called Jahannam. Even so, none of the people of knowledge to whom the matter is unveiled for what it is declares that they do not possess a bliss particular to them in this abode. As for the loss of pain, they denied it, and so it was lifted from them. Their bliss is their rest from feeling that pain, or else bliss is particular and extra as is the bliss of the people of the Garden in the Garden. Allah knows best.

11: The Seal of the Wisdom of Revelation (Futuh) (1) in the Word of Salih

Among the signs are the signs of the mounts. (2)
That is due to the difference in destinations.
Among those with mounts are those who make their mounts stand by the command of Allah, and among them are those who cross the deserts with their mounts.
As for those who stand, they are the people of the source, (3) and those who cross the deserts are the aliens.
Each of these has the revelation (futuh) of the Unseen worlds brought to him from Allah on every side.

Know, may Allah grant you success, that the business (of bringing into existence) is based on uniqueness (fardiyya), and uniqueness has triplicity which is from three and upwards. Three is the first singular. The universe exists from this Divine Presence. Allah, may He be exalted!, says, "Our Word to a thing when We desire it is just to say to it, 'Be' and it is." (16:40) This is an essence which has volition and speech. (4) Had it not been for this essence and its volition, which is connecting attention to something particular in order to bring anything into being (and when He turns to that thing, He says, "Be"), that thing would not have been. Then tripartite uniqueness also appeared in that thing, and it is by this uniqueness in respect to the thing that it is valid that it take and that it be described by existence. Its triplicity is its thingness, its hearing, and obeying the command of the One who gives it form by bringing it into existence. It accepted three by the threeness of its fixed essence when it was in the state of its non-existence in counterbalance to the essence of the One who brought it into existence. Its hearing is in counterbalance to the volition of the One who brought it into existence. Its agreeing to comply with the command to take form is in counterbalance to His word "'Be!' and it is." Taking form is thus related to the thing. If it not had the capacity to take form from within itself when this is said, it would not have been. Allah only brought the thing into existence after it was not in the command of taking form, by the thing itself.

Allah confirmed that taking-form (takwin) belongs to the thing itself, not to Allah; and that that which belongs to Allah is His command. Similarly, He told us about Himself when He said, "Our Word to a thing when We desire it is just to say to it, "Be!" and it is." He ascribed taking-form to the thing itself from the command of Allah. Allah speaks the truth, so this is understood in the command itself. Someone who is feared and not disobeyed commands His slave: "Stand!" and the slave stands in obedience to his master's command. When this slave stands, the master only has the command to the slave to stand. Standing is the slave's action, not the master's action.

Thus taking-form is based on triplicity, i.e. from three, on both sides the side of Allah and the side of creation. That applies to bringing meanings into existence by proofs. The proof must be compounded of three in a special structure and special condition. There must be a result from it. The result is that the thinker constructs his proof from two propositions. Each one proposition contains two singulars, and so it four. One of the four is repeated in the two propositions in order to link one to the other as is marriage. It is three and no more because of one is repeated in both of them. That is how it is the goal exists. Then this compound occurs in a special aspect which is that the two propositions are connected to each other by the repetition of that one singular, by which triplicity, and the special condition that the principle be more general by cause or equal to it, is valid. Then the principle is true. If it is not like that, then it will give a result which is not true. This existent thing in the universe is like the ascription of actions to the slave, removed from their ascription to Allah, or the ascribing of taking form, the object of our discussion, to Allah absolutely. But Allah only ascribed it to the thing which was told, "Be!" A representation of that is if we wish to prove that the universe exists from a cause, (5) we say that every thing which is in-time has a cause. (6) Thus we have the in-time and the cause. Then in the other proposition we say that the universe is in time. The "in-time" is repeated in the two propositions. The third singular is "the universe". From this it follows that the universe has a cause and the conclusion appears in what was mentioned in the first proposition - that is the cause.

The special aspect is the repetition of the "in-time", and the special condition is the generality of the cause ('illa) because the cause is what effects the existence of the in-time. The principle is general in the in-timeness of the universe in relation to Allah.

We therefore make the judgement that every being which is "in-time" has a cause, i.e. in the greater proposition, unless that cause is equal to the principle or the principle is more general than the cause. So the universe would thus fall under the principle of the cause [in both cases]. The result is true.

The principle of triplicity also appears in bringing meanings into existence, which makes use of proofs. The root of phenomenal being is triplicity. For this reason, the wisdom of Salih, peace be upon him, is what Allah manifested in the delay of three days when He promised to punish the people of Salih, and the promise was kept. The truth was the result, and it was the Cry by which Allah destroyed them, and "morning found them lying flattened in their homes." (11:67) On the first of the three days, the faces of the people became yellow, and on the second day red, and on the third day black. When the three days had passed, their predisposition was proved and corruption appeared in them. That manifestation was called "destruction".

The yellowing of the faces of the wretched is in counterbalance to the shining of the faces of the happy in the words of Allah, "Some faces on that day will be radiant (musfira)" (80:38) which comes from sufur, when the dawn becomes white. This is a manifestation as the yellowing of the faces on the first day was the manifestation of the sign of the wretchedness of Salih's people. Then came the counterbalance offered to His word about the happy, "laughing".(80:39) Laughter is one of the causes which produces redness in the face. Among the happy, it is the cheeks which are red.

Then He made the complexion of the wretched turn black as a counterbalance to His word, "joyous (mustabshira)". (7) That is the effect that joy has on their skins as black effected the skins of the wretched. For this reason, He spoke of the two groups with good news (bushra). He spoke a word to them which affected their skin (bashara) which turned a colour by which skin had not been described before this event. Allah said in regarding the happy, "Their Lord gives them the good news of His mercy and good pleasure," (9:21) and He said about the wretched, "Give them the news of a painful punishment." (9:34) There was an effect on the skin of each group because of the effect of the discourse on them. It only appeared in them outwardly by virtue of the understanding which was fixed inside them. So it is them who have that effect on themselves just as taking form only comes from them. "Allah's is the conclusive argument." (6:149) Whoever understands this wisdom and confirms it in himself and witnesses it, gives his self rest from connection to other. He knows that good and evil only come from him. By good, I mean what agrees with his goal and suits his nature and temperament. By evil, I mean what does not agree with his goal or suit his nature and temperament. The one who possesses this witnessing makes out excuses for all existent beings, even if they do not make excuses. He knows that all he has for himself is from himself, as we mentioned at the beginning, since knowledge follows the known. When something which does not agree with his goal comes to him, he tells himself, "Clench your fists and puff out your cheeks!" "Allah speaks the truth and He guides to the Way." (33:4)

Notes to Chapter 11:

1. Opening. Salih has this in view of the fact that the mountain split open to reveal the she-camel, he opened belief to those who believed in him. The camel is a mount.
2. Mounts which are miracles proving the truthfulness of the Prophets - like the Buraq of Muhammad and the she-camel of Salih.
3. Eyewitnessing.
4. i.e. a triplicity: Essence, volition, and speech (qawl).
5. Here he uses sabab, something by which something is brought about, rather than 'illa, which is something which alters or effects something, as in cause and effect. 'Illa is the reason behind judicial reasoning.
6. First proposition.
7. Comes from a root meaning skin (bashara), the root of bashshara, to give good news, is to announce something which produces a change in the complexion.

12: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Heart in the Word of Shu'ayb (Jethro)

Know that the heart of the gnostic of Allah is from the mercy of Allah, and it is vaster than mercy. The heart encompasses Allah, but His Mercy does not encompass Him. (1) This is the language of the general public from the door of indication (ishara). Allah is merciful (rahim) and is not the one to whom mercy is shown (marhum). Mercy has no power over Him. As for the indication from the tongue of the elite, Allah describes Himself by the breath which is from breathing. The Divine Names are the same as the Named, and the breath is none other than Him. They require what they give the breath of realities, so the realities which the Names demand are not other than the universe. Thus divinity (ulûhîya) demands the object of worship (ma'luh) and sovereignty (rubûbiya) demands the object of lordship (marbub). (2) They have no source except by the universe in existence and determination (taqdir). Allah, in respect to His essence, is independent of the universe, but sovereignty does not possess this principle. The matter remains between what the sovereignty demands and what the essence deserves of independence from the universe. Sovereignty is based on reality and the description is only the same as this essence.

Then the matter changes according to the relationships. It is reported that Allah only describes Himself with compassion for His slaves. The first of what was breathed from sovereignty by Himself is related to the Merciful by His bringing into being the universe, which sovereignty demands by its reality and all the Divine Names. By this aspect it is confirmed that "His mercy encompasses everything." (3) It encompasses Allah. It is wider than the heart or equal to it in capacity.

Know that Allah, as it is confirmed in sound tradition, changes in the forms of the tajalli. When the heart contains Allah, it does not contain other-than-Him of creatures along with Him. It is as if He filled it, and the meaning of this is, that when it looks to Allah in His tajalli to it, it is not possible to look at another with Him.

The heart of the gnostic in respect to vastness is as Abu Yazid al-Bistami said, "If the Throne and what surrounds it a million times over were in one of the corners of the heart of the gnostic, he still would not feel it." Al-Junayd said about this meaning, "If the in-time were compared to the out-of-time, not a trace of it would remain." The heart encompasses the out-of-time, so how can it sense the in-time as existent? If Allah varies His tajalli in forms, then by necessity, the heart is expanded and contracted according to the form in which the divine tajalli occurs. There is nothing left in the heart apart from the form in which the tajalli occurs. So in relation to the seal, the heart of the gnostic or the Perfect Man, is at the stage of the place that is the face of the seal. It does not exceed it, rather it is its size and shape in respect to roundness. The face is round, square, hexagonal, octagonal, etc. in form. If the face is square, hexagonal, octagonal or whatever form, its place in relation to the seal is like it and it is not like other than it.

This is the opposite of what one group alluded to, saying that Allah gives a tajalli according to the predisposition of the slave. This is not how it is. The slave is manifest to Allah according to the form in which Allah gives him a tajalli of Himself.

The exact clarification of this question is that Allah has two tajalli: an unseen tajalli and a visible tajalli. From the unseen tajalli He accords the predisposition on which the heart is based, and it is the tajalli of the Essence of which the Unseen is the reality. It is the He-ness which merits it by His word from Himself: "He". His He-ness is always He. If this predisposition comes to the heart, then the visible tajalli is manifested to it in the Visible world, so the heart sees it. He is manifest by the form of whatever tajalli he has, as we mentioned. Allah gives it the predisposition by His word, "He gave everything its creation, then guided it." (20:50) Then He lifted the veil between Him and His slave, so He sees Him in the form of his belief in Allah. Allah, who is in the belief, is He whose form the heart contains. He is the One who gives it a tajalli, and so it knows Him. The eye only sees by belief, not hidden in the varieties of belief.

Whoever limits Allah, denies Allah in other than what he limits Allah to, and confirms Allah in what he limits Him by, when Allah gives him a tajalli. Whoever frees Allah from limitation does not deny Allah, and so confirms Allah in every form in which Him changes. He is given from himself according to the form in which the tajalli infinitely occurs. The forms of the tajalli are without end. Similarly knowledge of Allah has no limit in the gnostic who understands the forms. Rather, he is a gnostic at every moment, seeking increase of knowledge by "Lord, increase me in knowledge! Lord, increase me in knowledge! Lord, increase me in knowledge!" (4)

The business is endless from both sides. This is as if you said: Allah and creation. If you looked at His words, "I am his foot by which he runs, and his hand with which he strikes and his tongue by which he speaks," and so on of the faculties whose location are the limbs which are not separate, then you said that the matter is all Allah or the matter is all creation. It is creation by one ascription and it is Allah by another ascription, yet the source is one. The source of the form is what gives the tajalli of the source of the form which did not exist before the tajalli. It is the one giving the tajalli and the one receiving it. See how wondrous is the command of Allah in respect to His He-ness and in respect to His relationship to the universe in the realities of His most Beautiful Names!

Who is He and what is He and what is His source?

He is He!

Whoever is of His commonality is of His elite, and whoever is of His elite is of His commonality.

There is no source except source, so the light of His source is His darkness.

Whoever is ignorant of this experiences grief in himself

And none recognises what we have said except for the slave who has aspiration (himma).

He said, "There is a reminder in that for anyone who has a heart," (50:37) because the heart (qalb) is transformed (taqallaba) in the various forms and attributes. He did not say, "to him who has an intellect" because the intellect limits. (5) It confines the matter to a single description, but reality refuses to be contained. It is also a reminder for those who have intellect, and they are those who have creeds by which some deny others, and some curse others, and they do not have helpers. (6) The god of the one with a creed does not have jurisdiction over the god of someone with another creed. The one who has a creed defends it; he defends the matter which he believes of his god, and supports it. He does not support that which is not in his creed. For this reason, he has no effect on the creeds of his dissenters, and similarly his dissenters have no help from the god who is in his creed; so they have no helpers. Allah excluded help from the divinity of creed based on the isolation of one creed to the exclusion of others. The helped is gathered and the helper is gathered.

For the gnostic, Allah is the Recognised Who is not denied. The people of recognition in this world are the people of recognition in the Next World. This is why Allah said, "anyone who has a heart (qalb)" (50:37) since he knows the transformation (taqlib) of Allah in forms by the transformation in shape. He recognises himself from himself. His self is not other than the He-ness of Allah. There is nothing in phenomenal being from what is, or what will be, which is other than the He-ness of Allah. Rather, He is the source of He-ness. So He is the gnostic and the knower and the acknowledger in this form. He is the one who is neither gnostic nor knower. He is also the one who denies Him in the other form. This is the portion of the one who knows Allah from the tajalli and the witnessing in the source of gatheredness (jam'). It is His word, "anyone who has a heart" which transforms the shapes by His transforming.

As for the people of belief (iman), they are the ones who imitate those who imitated the Prophets and Messengers in what they transmitted from Allah. They are not those who imitate the people of concepts and those who interpret the transmissions received by basing them on their logical proofs. These are the ones who imitate the Messengers, may Allah bless them and grant them peace. They are the ones who are meant by His words, "or listens well" (50:37) to what divine transmissions relate of the sunna of the Prophets. He means this is the one who "will listen well, having seen the evidence" (50:37) with awareness of the presence of the imagination and its use.

That is what the Prophet said about ihsan, "Worship Allah as if you saw Him," (7 and "Allah is in the qibla of the one who prays." (8) For that reason, he is a witness. Anyone who imitates the people of logical speculation and is limited by them is not the one who will listen well. The one who will listen well must witness what we have mentioned. When he does not witness what we have mentioned, he is not the one meant by this ayat. These are those of whom Allah has said, "When those who were followed disown those who followed them." (2:166) The Messengers do not disown their followers who follow them.

Realise, my friend, what I have mentioned to you in this wisdom of the heart. As for its specification with Shu'ayb, there is some branching off (tash'ib). Its branches are not numbered because every creed has a branch, and so they are all branches or creeds. If the covering is removed, it is removed for everyone in accordance with his creed. The covering might be removed in a manner contrary to his creed in principle. It is His words, "What confronts them from Allah will be something they did not reckon with." (39:47) Most of them in principle are like the Mu'tazilites, believing that Allah will execute the threat on the rebel should he die without repentance. If he dies and is given mercy from Allah, then concern preceded it, for He did not punish him. Thus he found Allah Ever-Forgiving, All-Merciful, and there appeared to him from Allah something he did not reckoned with.

As for He-ness (huwiya), some people are firm in their belief that Allah is such-and-such. When the covering is removed, they see the form of their belief, and it is true. They believe in it. Then the knot is unravelled and the creed vanishes and becomes knowledge through contemplation (mushahada). After vision is sharpened, weak vision does not return. It appeared to some people by the variety of the tajalli in forms through vision, since the tajalli is not repeated. He verifies it in he-ness; and there appeared to them from Allah in Allah's He-ness what they never reckoned with before the covering was removed. (9)

We mentioned the form of the ascent in divine recognitions after death in our Book of the Tajalliyat, in which we mentioned what we gathered from the group regarding unveiling, and the benefits we derived from them in the question that they did not know about. One of the most wondrous of matters is that man is always in ascent, but is not aware of that due to the fineness of the veil and its delicateness. It is like His words, "They were only given a simulation of it." (2:25)

He, the One, is not the same as the Last. Therefore the two semblances with the gnostic are similar dissimilars. The one possessed of realisation sees multiplicity in One, as he knows what the Divine Names indicate. Although their realities differ and are numerous, it is yet One Source. It is an intelligible multiplicity in the source of One. In the tajalli, it is multiplicity witnessed in the one source even as it matter which you obtain in the definition of each form. It and the multiplicity of forms and their variety derive, in fact, from one substance (jawhar). It is its own matter (hayula). Whoever recognises himself with this recognition recognises his Lord. Allah is in His creation due to His form, rather He is the source of its he-ness and its reality.

For this reason, the only ones among the 'ulama' who tumble on the recognition of the self (nafs) and its reality are the divinely inspired messengers and the great among the Sufis. As for the philosophers and masters of thought among the ancients and the mutakallimun in their discourse on the self and its whatness, none of them stumbled on its reality, and logical speculation can never provide it. (10) He who seeks knowledge of it by means of logical speculation, swells himself up and boasts without vigour or substance. "They are those whose efforts in the life of this world are misguided while they suppose that they are doing good." (18:104) He who seeks the matter by other than its path will not achieve its realization.

How excellent is what Allah said about the universe - He changes it with the breaths into a new creation in one source. He said in respect to some, rather to most of the world, "Yet they are dubious about the new creation." (50:15) This means that they do not know the renewal of the command in breaths. However, the Ash'arites stumbled on it in some existent things, and these are non-essentials (a'râd). The Hisbaniya (11) stumbled on it regarding the entire universe. The logical philosophers consider them ignorant of it. However, the two groups erred. As for the error of the Hisbaniya, in spite of what they said regarding change in the entire universe, they did not stumble on the oneness of the source of the intelligible substance (jawhar) which underlies the form. The universe only exists by the oneness, as the oneness is only intelligible by the universe. If they had said that, they would have obtained the degree of realisation in the matter.

As for the Ash'arites, they do not know that the entire universe consists of a collection of non-essentials (a'râd). It changes in every moment since accidents do not last for two moments. That appears in their definition of things. So when they defined the thing, its phenomenal being is clear in the definition of non-essential matters. These non-essentials mentioned in its definition are actually the source of this independent substance and its reality. Inasmuch as it is a non-essential, it is not independent, but by the sum of what is not independent, comes what is independent. It is like occupation of space in the definition of the independent essential substance, and its acceptance is non-essential in its essential definition. There is no doubt that that the containing-of-form is an accident since it is only in the container, and that is not independent it is in the essential nature of the substance. Occupation of space is a non-essential, and it only occurs in the thing occupying space, and so it is not independent. Occupation of space and containing-of-form are not based on the source of the definitions are the source of the defined and its he-ness.

That which does not last two moments becomes that which lasted two moments or indeed several moments! What was not independent became independent in their view! They do not understand the basis of this, and these people "are dubious about the new creation."

As for the people of unveiling, they see Allah in a tajalli of Himself in every breath, and there is no repetition of the tajalli. They also see by witnessing that every tajalli grants a new creation and takes away a creation. Thus its departure is annihilation in the presence of the tajalli, and it is going-on by what the other tajalli grants. So understand!

13: The Seal of the Wisdom of Power (Malk) in the Word of Lut (Lot)

Malk is power and force, and the strong man with power says, "I have power over the kneading, since I am forceful in kneading it." When the poet, Qays ibn al-Hatim, described his attack with a spear in verse, he said:

I have power over it and so I made its rupture wide, and you see standing under it what was behind it.

That is to say that he used enough force in the thrust. It was what Allah said regarding Lut, peace be upon him, "If only I had the power to combat you, or could take refuge in some powerful support!" (11:80) The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Allah showed mercy to my brother Lut, and he took refuge in a powerful support." So the Prophet said that Lut was with Allah who is strong. It was Allah whom Lut, peace be upon him, meant by the strong pillar, and resistance when he said, "If only I had the power". Here it is aspiration (himma) in relation to man in particular.

The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "From that time, the time in which Lut, peace be upon him, said, 'or could take refuge in some powerful support,' after that, Prophets have only been sent with some power from their people." His tribe protected him as Abu Talib protected the Messenger of Allah. His words, "If only I had the power to combat you" is because he heard Allah say, "It is Allah who created you from a weak beginning," (30:54) by origin, "and then after weakness, gave you strength." Strength is by appointing, and it is non-essential strength. "Then after strength ordained weakness and grey hair." Appointing is connected to grey hair. As for weakness, it returns to the basis of its creation as He said, "He created you from a weak beginning." Allah returns him to that from which He created him, as He says, "then some of you revert to the lowest form of life that, so after having knowledge, they may know nothing at all." (16:70) Allah mentions that he returns to the first weakness. The old man is judged to be as weak as the child is. A Prophet is only sent after he has reached the age of forty. It is the time which is the beginning of decrease and weakness. For this reason, Lut said, "If only I had the power to combat you," although that demands effective aspiration (himma). If you were to ask: "What prevents him from using effective aspiration while it is present in the wayfarers (sâlikûn) among the followers when the Messengers are more entitled to that?" you spoke the truth. However, you lack another knowledge, which is that gnosis does not leave the aspiration freedom of action. Whenever gnosis is great, then its freedom of action with the aspiration is weak. That has two reasons one is his realisation of the station of slavery and his regarding the root of his natural creation; (1) and the other reason is the oneness of the actor and the acted upon. The aspiration of a Messenger does not appear, since the latter aspect prevents it.

In this witnessing, he sees that his opponent does not turn from the reality on which he is based in the state of his source-form and the state of his non-existence. He only appears in existence through what he had in the state of non-existence by his source-form. He does not overstep his reality nor does he abandon his path. That is called dissent; yet it is a non-essential matter manifested by the veil which is over the eyes of the people, as Allah says, "but most people do not know." They know what is manifest and outward of the life of this world, but they are ignorant of the Next life. It is the other way round, so it is from their words, "our hearts are veiled," (2) that is, in coverings. It is a covering which veils them from perceiving the matter for what it is. This and its like prevent the gnostic from acting freely in the world.

Shaykh Abu 'Abdullah ibn al-Qa'id said to Shaykh Abu's-Su'ud ibn ash-Shibli, "Why do you not act freely?" Abu's-Su'ud replied, "I have left Allah to act for me as He wishes." He meant the command of Allah, "so take Him as your Guardian." (73:9) The Guardian is the one with freedom of action, especially as He heard Allah saying, "Give of that to which He has made you successors (khalifs)." (57:7) Abu's-Su'ud knew, and the gnostics know that the command which he has is not his, and he is only a successor to it. Allah told him, "this command is the deen to which I have you successors and over which I have given you power, so take Me for a guardian in it," Abu's-Su'ud obeyed the command of Allah and took Him for a Guardian.

How can there remain any aspiration for the one who witnesses the like of this command? Aspiration (himma) only acts by the property of concentration that which its possessor does not have, and acts on other than his concentration. This gnosis separates him from that property of concentration. The complete gnosis manifests gnosis at the end of incapacity and weakness. One of the Abdal (3) said to Shaykh 'Abdu'r-Razzaq, (4) "After you greet Shaykh Abu Madyan, (5) tell him, 'O Abu Madyan! Why is nothing difficult for us, yet things are difficult for you, and we long for your station and you do not long for ours?'" Similarly, although Abu Madyan had that station as well as the other, we are more complete than him in the station of weakness and incapacity. His badl said this to him; he did not say it.

The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said that this station is from the command of Allah to him: "I do not know what He will do to me or you. I only follow what is revealed to me." The Messenger acts according to what is revealed to him. He does not have anything else. If He reveals to him that he should act by ordinance, he acts. If he is prevented from acting, he does not act. The best part of choice is to abandon freedom of action unless the person is deficient in gnosis.

Abu's-Su'ud ash-Shibli said to his believing companions, "Allah gave us freedom of action fifteen years ago, and we abandoned it through politeness." This is the language of conceit. As for us, we did not abandon it through politeness, for abandoning would imply preference. Rather, we abandoned it by the perfection of gnosis. Gnosis does not oblige it on the strength of choice. When the gnostic acts by aspiration in the world, it is from divine command and compulsion, not by choice.

There is no doubt that the station of the Messenger demands freedom of action for the acceptance of the Message which he brings. Allah informs him of what will be accepted in his community and among his people in order to manifest the deen of Allah. The wali is not like that. Nevertheless, the Messenger does not seek Him in the manifest, because the Messenger has compassion for his people. He does not want them to exceed by having the proof appear against them because that would entail their destruction. He spares them.

The Messenger also knew that when something inimitable (6) is manifested to the community, some of them believe in it, and some recognise it but deny it out of injustice, arrogance or envy. Some of them attribute it to magic and deception. The Messenger sees that, and he also sees that no one will believe unless Allah illuminates his heart by the light of belief. When the person does not look by that light called belief, the inimitable miracle has no benefit for him. Their aspiration does not seek inimitable matters, since the effect is not uniform among those who see it, nor is it in their hearts as He said in respect to the most perfect of Messengers and the most knowing of creation and the most truthful in state, "You cannot guide those you would like to but Allah guides those He wills." (28:56)

If aspiration did have an effect, no one would be more perfect than the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, nor have a higher nor stronger aspiration than him, yet even so his aspiration did not bring about Abu Talib, his uncle, becoming Muslim, and it was to the Prophet that the ayat which we mentioned was revealed. Similarly, Allah said of the Messenger, "It is only his to deliver the message." (7) And He said, "You are not responsible for their guidance, but Allah guides whoever He wills," (2:272) and He added in Surat al-Qasas, "He has best knowledge of the guided," (28:56) those to whom knowledge of their guidance was given in the state of their non-existence in their source-forms. It is established that knowledge follows the known. Whoever is a believer in his source-form and in the state of his non-existence, appears in that form in the state of his existence. Allah knew that of him, so that is what he is like. For that reason, Allah said, "He has best knowledge of the guided."

When Allah said the like of that, He also said, "My Word, once given, is not subject to change," (50:29) because My Word is based on My knowledge of My creation. "and I do not wrong My slaves," that is, I do not decree that disbelief (kufr) on them which makes them wretched and then I demand of them what is not in their capacity to do. Rather, We only deal with them according to what We gave them knowledge of, and We only gave them knowledge of what they gave Us from themselves by that on which they are based. So if they do wrong, they are the ones who are unjust. For this reason, He said, "but they wronged themselves. Allah did not wronged them." (8) Finally, We only said to them what Our essence accorded that We say to them. Our Essence is known to Us by what it is based on; so, if We say this, and do not say that, then We only spoke by what We knew to say. We spoke the word from Us, and obedience or lack of obedience is up to those who hear.

So all is from Us and from them, (9) and acceptance is from Us and from them.
If they are not from Us,
We, without a doubt, are from them.

So, my friend, realise this wisdom of power in the word of Lut. It is a gate which belongs to gnosis. The secret (10) has been made clear for you, and the command is clear. It is included in the even which is called the odd.

Notes to Chapter 13:

1. Which is weakness, and the slave obeying the command of the Master, as in Qur'an 30:54, "It is Allah who created you from a weak beginning."
2. Two places: 2:88; 4:155.
3. Abdal, plural of badl, a substitute. Shaykh al-Akbar says, "They are seven. Whoever travels from one place and leaves his body in its form so that no one recognises that he has gone, that one is only a badl. He is modelled on the heart of Ibrahim, peace be upon him."
4. A jurist and one of Abu Madyan's disciples.
5. Abu Madyan: Shu'ayb ibn al-Husayn al-Andalusi, great Maghribi Sufi, born ca. 520/1126 near Seville and died near Tlemcen in 594/1197.
6. Mu'jiza, a miracle performed by a Prophet to prove his truthfulness and which others are unable to do.

7. Ref. Qur'an 5:99 and several other places.

8. 2:57, 9:70, etc. in many places in the Qur'an.

9. The apparent sources. The Word is from him and obedience from them.

10. The secret of the Decree.

14: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Decree (Qadar) in the Word of 'Uzayr (Ezra)

Know that fate (qada') is the judgement of Allah on things, and Allah's judgement on things is according to His knowledge in them and of them. The knowledge of Allah in things is based on that which known things accord Him of what they are in themselves. The decree (qadar) is the timing of how things are in their source without increase. (1) Fate is only decreed for things by themselves. This is the source of the secret of the Decree for the one who has a heart or gives ear. He is a witness "Allah's is the conclusive argument." (6:149)

Properly speaking, the judge (hâkim) studies the source of the question which he judges according to what its essence demands. The one sentenced to what is due him is, in fact, a judge over the judge when he sentences him to that. Every "judge" is sentenced to what he sentences, and in it he is the judge, whoever he is. Grasp this question! The decree is only unknown by the force of its appearance. It is not recognised, so there is much seeking and earnest request in it.

Know that the Messengers, may Allah bless them and grant them peace, inasmuch as they are Messengers not inasmuch as they are awliya' and gnostics are in ranks according to that on which their communities are based. They only have the knowledge with which they were sent, according to what the community of that Messenger needs, no more and no less. Communities differ, some have more need than others, so Messengers differ in the knowledge of the message just as their communities differ. It is what Allah said: "Those Messengers: We favoured some of them over others." (2:253)

In the same way, they also differ in what springs from their essences, peace be upon them, in the varieties of knowledges and judgements they have according to their predispositions. This is what Allah said: "We have preferred some of the Prophets over others." (17:55) And Allah said in respect of creation, "Allah has favoured some of you over others in provision." (16:71) Provision from Allah can be spiritual like knowledges and sensory like food. Allah "only sent it down in a known measure." (15:21) It is the due which creation seeks. Allah "gives everything its created form." (20:50) He sends down according to what He wills. (2) He only wills what He knows, and so He commands it. What He knows is as we have stated. It is only by what the known accords.

Timing basically belongs to the known. Fate, knowledge, will and volition follow the Decree. So Allah only gives the understanding of the secret of the decree in respect to knowledges to the one who has been given complete gnosis. Knowledge gives complete rest to the knower, and it gives painful punishment to the knower as well. It gives two opposites. By knowledge, Allah describes Himself with both wrath and pleasure, and by knowledge the Divine Names are opposite one another. A reality (3) governs the absolute existent and the limited existent. It is not possible that there be something more complete than it or stronger or greater than it, because of the universality of its jurisdiction, both limited and unlimited.

The Prophets, may Allah bless them and grant them peace, only take their own knowledges from a particular divine revelation. Their hearts are free of logical speculation because they know the limitations of the intellect in respect to its cognitive perception. The intellect is unable to perceive matters for what they really are. Simple communication is also unable to perceive that which is only accorded by taste (dhawq). Perfect knowledge remains only in the divine tajalli and in what Allah removes of veils from the springs of the inner sight and the eyes. They perceive matters - their non-time and in-time, their non-existence and existence, their impossibility, necessity and possibility - for what they truly are in their realities and sources.

Since the request of 'Uzayr, peace be upon him, occurred on the elite path, censure fell on him as is related in tradition. (4) Had he sought the unveiling which we mentioned, perhaps censure in that would not have fallen on him. The proof of the simplicity of his heart is in his statement, "How can Allah restore this to life when it has died?" (2:259) His form, peace be upon him, is in this statement of his, as the form of Ibrahim is in His words, "Show me how You bring the dead to life." (2:260) That necessitates the response by the action which Allah manifested when He said, "Allah caused him to die a hundred years, then He brought him back to life," and He said, "Look at the bones how We raise them up and clothe them in flesh." So he saw how bodies grow with the witnessing of realisation. He showed him how it was. He asked about the decree which is only perceived by unveiling to things in the state of their permanence in their non-existence. That was not granted. That is one of the properties of divine cognisance, so it is impossible that any except Allah know it. They are the keys of the First (5) the keys of the unseen which only He knows. Allah informs only those slaves whom He wills on such matters.

Know that they are only called keys in the state of opening. (6) The state of opening is the state of connecting taking-form to things, or rather the state of connecting the decree to the decreed. None has any taste in that except Allah. Neither tajalli nor unveiling occur in it since only Allah has power and action in view of the fact that He has absolute existence which is unlimited.

When we saw that Allah censured 'Uzayr, peace be upon him, when he asked about the Decree, we knew that 'Uzayr was seeking this cognisance. Thus he was seeking to possess the power (qudra) which is connected to the decreed (maqdur). That is only claimed by the One Who has absolute existence. Thus he sought the impossible. How-things-are is only perceived by taste.

As for what we relate of what Allah revealed to him, "If you do not desist, I will efface your name from the register of prophethood," it means I will remove the path of transmission from you and give you matters based on tajalli. Tajalli only occurs according to what you have of the predisposition by which the perception of taste occurs. You know that you only perceive according to your predisposition. You look at this matter which you are seeking. If you do not see it, you know that you do not have the predisposition which it requires. That is one of the properties of the Divine Essence. You have learned that Allah "gives everything its created form." (20:50) So if He did not give you this particular predisposition, then it is not your creation. If it had been your creation, then Allah, who informed you that "He gives everything its created for," would have given it to you. It is you who desist from this sort of question in yourself. There is no need for any other prohibition. This is a mark of concern Allah showed to 'Uzayr, peace be upon him. He knew that from his own knowledge and was ignorant of that from his own ignorance.

Know that wilaya (7) is the universal encompassing sphere. This why it is not intersected, and so it is informed about things. As for the prophethood of law-giving and the Message, it is intersected, and it was cut off in Muhammad, peace be upon him. There will be no Prophet after him, either giving law or bound by law. There is no Messenger after him, and he is the lawgiver. This hadith (8) is a fragment of the manifestation of the awliya' of Allah, because it contains the cutting off of the taste of complete perfect slavery, so the name of slavery, which is particular to it, was not used. The slave does not want to share with his Lord, who is Allah, in the same name. Allah is not called "prophet" or "messenger." However, He is called Wali and is described by that name. (9) Allah says, "Allah is the Wali of those who believe," (2:257) and He says, "He is the Wali, the Praiseworthy." (42:28) This name, "wali", continues to be applied to the slaves of Allah both in this world and the Next. A name which is particular to the slave and not to Allah no longer remains since prophethood and the message have been cut off.

"Allah is gentle to His slaves," (42:19) so they still have the general prophethood in which there is no law (shari'a), and they still have the law in striving in the confirmed ordinances. They still have heirs in the laws. The Prophet said, "The 'ulama' (men of knowledge) are the heirs of the Prophets." (10) The only inheritance here is that they strive with the ordinances, and so they legislate them.

If you see a Prophet speaking a language outside the simple ordinances of the Shari'a, that is due to the fact that he is a wali and a gnostic. For this reason, his station in respect to his being a man of knowledge and a wali is more perfect and complete than it is due to the fact that he is a Messenger or someone who legislates and has a Shari'a. If you hear one of the People of Allah speaking, or it is related to you that he said, "Wilaya is higher than prophethood," that speaker only means what we mentioned. Or if he says that the wali is above the Prophet or the Messenger, he means in the same person. He is the Messenger, and inasmuch as he is a wali, he is more complete than he is by simply being a Prophet. It does not mean that the wali who follows him is higher than him. The follower never overtakes the followed in that in which he follows him. If he had overtaken him, then he would not be his follower. So understand that!

The starting point of the Messenger or Prophet who brings a Shari'a is wilaya and knowledge. Do you not see that Allah commanded him to seek increase of knowledge, not increase of anything other than it? Allah commanded him, "Say: 'Lord, increase me in knowledge!'" ((20:114) This means: you know that the Shari'a consists of making certain deeds obligatory and prohibiting certain actions. These actions take place in this world, so they come to an end. Wilaya is not like that. If it had been cut off, it would have been cut off in respect to itself just as the message is cut off in respect to itself. If it had been cut off, it would not still have a name. Wali is a name which Allah will continue to have. (11) This belongs to the slaves by following a model, realisation and attachment. (12)

He told 'Uzayr, "If you do not desist from asking about how the decree is, I will efface your name from the register of prophethood. The business will come to through unveiling by tajalli and the name "prophet" and "messenger" will vanish from you." Allah will still have his wilaya. The context of the state indicated that this speech came as a threat. Whoever has this state when he is addressed in this fashion, knows that he is threatened with the cutting off of some of the special ranks of wilaya in this abode, since prophethood and the message are a special rank in wilaya based on some of the ranks which wilaya contains. He knows that he is higher than the wali who has neither law-giving prophethood nor the message.

If someone has another state which necessitates that the rank of prophethood be confirmed for him, that then is the promise and not the threat. 'Uzayr's question was accepted because the Prophet is the elite wali. Because of the context, he knows that since the prophet has this prerogative in wilaya, he cannot engage in what he knows that Allah will dislike him doing. He cannot engage in what he knows it is impossible for him to attain. When these circumstances exist for the one who has them and they are affirmed, then this divine statement, "I will efface your name for the register of prophethood" becomes a promise. Thus it becomes a transmission indicating a lasting rank. It is a lasting rank for the Prophets and Messengers in the Next Abode, which is not a place where a Shari'a is prescribed for any of Allah's creatures after they have entered the Garden or the Fire.

We define that as an entry into the two abodes of the Garden and the Fire. When the Day of Rising begins for the people who lived in the times of the gaps between the Prophets, (13) young children, and madmen, all of them will be gathered on one plain for the establishment of justice, recompense for wrong actions and the rewards for works which are due to the people of the Garden. Then they will be gathered separate from other people on one plain, (14) and a Prophet from the best of them will be sent among them. The Fire will be shown to them. This Messenger sent to these people will bring it, and he will say to them, "I am the Messenger of Allah to you." Some will affirm him and others will deny him. Then he will say to them, "Plunge into this fire. Whoever obeys me will be saved and will enter the Garden. Whoever disobeys me and opposes my command will be destroyed and he will be one of the people of the Fire." Whoever obeys his command and casts himself into this fire will be happy and receive his reward. He will find this fire to be "coolness and peace".(15) Whoever disobeys him deserves the punishment and will enter the Fire and descend into it because of his deed of opposition so that that justice from Allah might be set up among His slaves.

That is like the words of Allah, "Upon the day when legs are bared," (68:42) (16) i.e. for one of the immense matters of the Next World, "and they are called on to prostrate." This is obligation and Shari'a. Some will be able to prostrate and some will not be able to do so. (17) These are the one about whom Allah says, "They are called on to prostrate, but they will not be able to do so," just as some of the slaves cannot obey the command of Allah in this world like Abu Jahl (18) and others. This is according to what remains of the Shari'a in the Next Abode on the Day of Rising before people enter the Garden and the Fire. This is why we have written it down, and praise belongs to Allah, the Wali.

Notes to Chapter 14:

1. Qadar has a specific time and qada' does not. So qadar refers to the particular instances of qada'.
2. Ref. Qur'an, "Were Allah to expand the provision of His slaves, they would act as tyrants on the earth. But He sends downwhatever He wills in a measured way." (42:27)
3. The secret of the decree.
4. Qur'an 2:259 "Or the one who passed by a town which had fallen into ruin. He asked, 'How can Allah restore this to life when it has died?' Allah caused him to die a hundred years then brought him back to life. Then He asked, 'How long have you been here?' He replied, 'I have been here a day or part of a day.' He said, 'Not so! You have been here a hundred years. Look at your food and drink it has not gone bad and look at your donkey so We can make you a Sign for all mankind. Look at the bones how We raise them up and clothe them in flesh.'" According to 'Ali, Ibn Jarir, Ibn 'Abbas, al-Hasan and Qatada, that is 'Uzayr.
5. The realities of sources.
6. Miftah, key, comes from the root, fath, opening.
7. According to the commentator, wilaya is annihilation in Allah, and Allah encompassed all, and "All things are passing except His face." (28:88).

8. "I am the Seal of the Messengers."
9. Wali means the friend of Allah, and refers to the gnostic. It is also one of the Divine Names which means the Guardian or the One who manages people's affairs.
10. Al-Bukhari.
11. As Yusuf said about Allah, "...You are my Wali in this world and the Next." (12:101).
12. According to al-Qashani, it is acquired and realised through annihilation in the Divine Attributes and Essence and attached by the going-on (baqa') after annihilation in the station of drawing near.
13. i.e. those who did not have a Prophet to follow.
14. According to the commentator, al-Qashani, the plain on which they are gathered may be as-Sahira, as in the Qur'an (79:14), "But it shall be but a single scare, and behold they are at as-Sahira!" As-Sahira which, according to some, is the earth Allah will create anew on the Day of Rising.
15. As was the case with Ibrahim, Qur'an 21:69.
16. The expression means to get ready for something difficult.
17. This is also reflected in a hadith in al-Bukhari in which the Prophet said, "Our Lord will unveil what is hidden, and every believer, man and woman, will prostrate to Him. Those who prostrated out of eyeservice and reputation in this world will go to prostrate and find their backs rigid."
18. The Prophet's uncle who was a violent opponent of Islam.

15: The Seal of the Wisdom of Prophethood in the Word of 'Isa (Jesus)

He was manifested from the water of Maryam and the breath of Jibril in the form of man existing from clay.

The spirit was in an essence purified of nature which it called prison.

For that reason, the spirit stayed in it for more a thousand years in the designation of time. (1)

A spirit from Allah, no other.

For that reason, he revived the dead and formed the bird from clay.

Since his relation with his Lord is proven, by it he has effective action in both the higher and lower worlds.

Allah purified his body, and made his spirit pure, and He made him a model of taking-form.

Know that among the special qualities of the spirits (arwah) is whenever they touch anything life flows into it. This is why the Samiri (2) seized a handful of dust from the track of the messenger, who was Jibril, and he is the Spirit. The Samiri had knowledge of this matter. When he recognised that it was Jibril, he knew that life would flow into whatever he had walked on, so he took a handful of dust (3) from the track of the messenger or he filled his hand or the ends of his fingers, (4) and threw it into the Calf. The Calf made a noise like the sound of a cow mooing. If it had been in another form, the name of that form's sound would have been ascribed to it - as grumbling to the camel, baa-ing to rams, bleating to sheep, and voice or articulation and speech to man. That power from the life which flows in things is called lâhût. The nâsût is the locus on which the spirit is based. The nâsût may be called a spirit by what is based on it.

When the Trusty Ruh, who is Jibril, presented himself to Maryam, peace be upon her, in the form of a "handsome, well-built man", (5) she imagined that he was a man wishing to have intercourse with her. She took refuge with Allah from him with all her being, with the whole of her existence, that Allah might save her from him since she knew that that was among the things which are not permitted. She was given a complete presence with Allah, and it is the meaning-without-form spirit. If Jibril had breathed into her at that moment in this state, 'Isa would have been born in such a manner that no one could tolerate him due to the harshness of his nature which was the state of his mother.

When he said to her, "I am only your Lord's messenger of your Lord so that He can give you a pure boy," she relaxed from that contraction (qabd) and her breast expanded. It was at that time that Jibril breathed 'Isa into her. Jibril conveyed the word of Allah to Maryam as the Messenger conveyed the word of Allah to his community. 'Isa was "His word that He cast into Maryam, and a Spirit from Him." (6) Then appetite filled Maryam. The body of 'Isa was created from the actual water of Maryam and from the imaginary water of Jibril which was infused in the moisture of that breath, since the breath of the living is moist because of the water content in it. So the body of 'Isa is from imaginary water and real water. He emerged in the form of a man in respect to his mother and inasmuch as Jibril had appeared in the form of a man, since taking-form only occurs in the human species according to the normal principle.

'Isa brought the dead to life because he is the Divine Spirit, and bringing to life belongs to Allah. The breath which 'Isa has is like the breath which Jibril has. The word belongs to Allah. The bringing the dead to life by 'Isa is an actual revival inasmuch as it was manifested from his breath as he was manifested from the form of his mother. His bringing to life is also imagined to be from him, but it actually belongs to Allah. He joined the two by the reality on which he is based even as we said that he is created from imaginary water and actual water. Bringing-to-life is ascribed to him by means of actualisation in one aspect, and by imagination in another aspect. In respect to actualisation, it is said of him that he brings the dead to life. In respect to imagination (tawahhum), it is said that he breathes into it and it becomes a bird by the leave of Allah. (7) The agent is in the prepositional phrase "by Allah's permission", even though He did not breathe into it. It is also possible that the agent is the one who breathes into it. It became a bird as regards physical form. In the same way, 'Isa healed the blind and the lepers.

All was ascribed to 'Isa as being "by Allah's permission." (8) "Permission" (idhn) is an indirect expression, as in His words, "By My permission" (9) and "by the permission of Allah". If the prepositional phrase is connected to breathing, the breather has leave in the breathing, and so it is a bird by the leave of Allah. If the breather breathed not by leave, then the taking form of the bird as a bird is not by the leave of Allah. The agent in that is then the verb "it becomes (yakûn)." If there had not been something real and something imaginary in the matter, then these forms would not have accepted these two aspects. Rather, it has these two aspects because the constitution of 'Isa accords that. 'Isa showed humility to the extent that he prescribed that his community "pay the jizya (10) tax with their hands in a state of willing submission," (11) and that if one of them were slapped on the cheek, he should offer the other cheek to the one who slapped him, and not rise up against him nor seek revenge. This came from his mother's side. Since the woman is lower, she has humility because she is subject to the man legally and physically. The power to bring to life and heal that he had came to him the side of the breath of Jibril in the form of a man. 'Isa brought the dead to life by the form of man. If Jibril had not come in the form of man, but in another of the elemental forms of phenomenal beings from the animals, plants or minerals, 'Isa would not have been able to bring the dead to life without taking on that form for that moment and appearing in it. If Jibril had come in a luminous form beyond the elements and natural humours, since luminosity is part of his nature, 'Isa would not have been able to bring the dead to life unless he appeared in that form of non-elemental light, while still maintaining the human form in respect of his mother.

When he brought the dead to life, it was said that it was him and not him. The onlookers fell into bewilderment (hayra) just as the man of intellect becomes bewildered in his logical reflection when he sees an individual human being bringing the dead to life, as that is one of the divine qualities - bringing to life with speech, not mere bringing with animation. (12) The beholder is bewildered because he sees the form of a man who possesses a divine effect. That led some of them to speak of that as "incarnation" and say that 'Isa was Allah since it was by Him that 'Isa brought the dead to life. Thus they are charged with disbelief (kufr) which is the veil because they veil Allah, who brings the dead to life, by the human form of 'Isa. Allah said, "They are unbelievers who say, 'Allah is the Messiah, the son of Maryam.'" (13) They fell into both error and disbelief at the end of all they said, not because they say that he is Allah nor by calling him the son of Maryam. But they made the attribution that Allah, insofar as He brought the dead to life, was contained in the human form of the nasut which is called the son of Maryam. There is no doubt that 'Isa was the son of Maryam. The hearer imagines that they have attributed divinity to the form, and so they make divinity the same as the form. That is not what they do. Rather, they make divine He-ness the subject in the human form which is the son of Maryam. They should differentiate between the form of 'Isa and the divine principle because they have made the form the same as the principle. Jibril was in the form of man who did not breathe and then he breathed. One differentiates between the form and the breath, and the breath from the form. The form existed without the breath - thus the breath is not part of its essential definition. For that reason, differences occurred among the people of different [Christian] parties regarding 'Isa and what he was. Whoever looks at him in respect to his mortal human form, says that he is the son of Maryam. Whoever looks at him in respect to his mortal representational form relates him to Jibril. Whoever looks at him in respect to what was manifested from him of bringing the dead to life, relates him to Allah by the quality of the spirit, and says that he is the Spirit of Allah, (14) that is, by Him life was manifested in whomever received his breath. Sometimes Allah is imagined to be the passive principle in 'Isa, and sometimes the angel is imagined in him, and sometimes mortal humanity is imagined in him. So the conception of everyone is based on what predominates that person. 'Isa is the Word of Allah, (15) the Spirit of Allah, (16) and the slave of Allah. (17) That is something which no one else has in the sensory form. Indeed, each person is attached to his father of form, not to the One who breathed his spirit into the human form. When Allah fashioned the human body as He said, "When I have shaped him," (15:29;38:72) then He breathed into Him, that was from His spirit. Thus in its being and source, the spirit is ascribed to Allah. That is not the case with 'Isa. The shaping of his body and mortal form is implied in the breath of the spirit. Others, as we mentioned, are not like that.

All existent things are the words of Allah which are inexhaustible (18) because they are from "kun" and "kun" is the word of Allah. Is the word ascribed to Him according to what He really is? His what-ness is not known. Or is it that Allah descends to the form of the one who says, "kun", and so the word "kun" is the reality of that form to which he descended or in which He is manifest? Some of the gnostics take one side and some take the other side, and some of them are bewildered in the business and do not know. This is a question which can only be recognised by taste (dhawq), as was the case with Abu Yazid al-Bistami when he breathed into the ant which he had killed and it returned to life. He knew in that action by Whom he had breathed, and that was an 'Isawian witnessing. As for the revival of meaning by knowledge, that is the divine life, essential, eternal, sublime, and luminous, about which Allah said, "Is someone who was dead and whom We brought to life, supplying him with a light by which to walk among the people..." (6:123) Whoever gives life to a dead soul by the life of knowledge in a particular problem connected to knowledge of Allah, has brought him to life by it, and it is "a light for him by which he walks among the people, i.e. among his likes in form.

Were it not for Him and not for us, that which is would not have been.
I worship Him in truth, and Allah is our Master.
I am his source so know!
If you said, "man,"
Then do not be veiled by "man".
He has given you a proof.
So be Allah and be creation, and you will be merciful by Allah.
Feed His creation through Him, and you will be spirit and sweet scent.
We give Him what appeared by Him in us, and He gave to us.

The command is apportioned between Him and us.
My heart was given life by the One who knew it when He gave us sensory life.
At that time (before time),
we were beings, sources and times in Him.
That did not endure in us, but that gave us life.

Part of what proves what we mentioned concerning the breath (nafkh) of the spirit with the elemental form is that Allah has described Himself by the "breath of the All-Merciful". Everyone described by an attribute must follow the attribute and all that attribute demands of him. You realise that breath is necessary for the one who breathes. For that reason, the divine breath accepts the forms of the universe. It is like the primordial substance, (19) which is not other than the source of nature.

The elements are one of the forms of nature, and what is above the elements and what issues from them are also part of the forms of nature. They are sublime spirits going right up to the seven heavens. As for the spirits of the seven heavens and their sources, they are elemental, so they issue from the vapour of the elements. The angels from every heaven are from the elements, so they are made from the elements, and there are no beings of nature above them. For this reason, Allah described them with dispute, (20) i.e. the Highest Assembly, because nature has polarisation. Polarisation is that which is in the Divine Names, and they are ascriptions given by the "breath of the All-Merciful." Do you not see how the Essence is not subject to this principle, and that it is independent of the worlds? This is why the world appeared in the form of the One who brought it into being, and it is not other than the divine breath.

The divine breath ascends by what it has of heat, and descends by what it has of humidity and cold, and fixes itself and solidifies by what it has of dryness. Thus precipitation comes from cold and humidity. Do you not see that when the doctor wants to give someone a remedy, he looks at his water (urine) in a long-necked bottle? If he sees precipitation, he knows that the digestion is complete. He gives the remedy to speed progress. The precipitation is produced by his natural coldness and humidity.

Then Allah kneaded the clay of this human person with "His two hands." These are opposite to each other. Even though each of these two hands may be a right hand, the distinction between them is not hidden. They are only two in themselves - two hands because He only causes effects in nature according to what is in conformity with it. Nature consists of opposites, so He said "two hands". Then He brought man into existence with two hands, and called him man (bashar). (21) This refers to the direct contact (mubashara) of the two hands as befits the Divine Presence. That arises from His concern for this human species. Then Allah said to the one who refused to prostrate himself before Adam, "What prevented you prostrating to what I created with My Own Hands? Were you overcome with arrogance (towards the one who is your like, made of the elements) or are you one of the exalted?" (38:75) meaning those who are above the elements. "You are not like that."

By the exalted, (22) He means those who, by their essence, are above being elemental by their luminous constitution, even though they are part of nature. Man is only better than the other species by virtue of his being made of clay (bashar). He is the best species of all that was created from the elements by direct contact with the two hands. So in rank, man is above the terrestrial and celestial angels, although the lofty angels are better than the human species according to a divine text. (23)

If anyone wishes to recognise the divine breath (nafas), let him recognise the universe, because "whoever knows himself knows his Lord" (24) who is manifest in him. The universe was manifested in the breath of the Merciful which Allah breathed from the Divine Names. They brought the manifestation of their effects into existence from the non-manifestation of their effects. He was generous to Himself by what He brought into existence in Himself. The first effect of the breath took place in that Presence. Then the command continued to descend (25) by breathing out from the universal to the last of what Allah brought into existence.

All is contained in the source of the breath, like light is contained in the essence of darkness at the end of the night before daylight.
Knowledge comes by proof at the end of the day for the one who is sleepy.
He sees what I have said as a dream which indicates the breath,
And it gives him relief from every grief.
In the recitation of the Qur'an, it is, "He frowned." (26)
He has given a tajalli of Himself to the one who came to fetch a firebrand. (27)
So Musa saw Him as a fire, while He is a light for kings and seekers.
If you have recognise what I said, then know that you are in a state of grief. (28)
If Musa had sought something else (other than the brand), he still would have seen Him in that,
and not the opposite.

When Allah establishes this 'Isawian word in the Station (29) so that we would know and he would be known, 'Isa will be asked about what was ascribed to him and whether or not it was true, even though Allah already knew whether or not that matter had taken place. Allah will say to him, "Did you say to people: 'Take me and my mother as gods, besides Allah?'" (30)

Adab demands a response to the one asking the question because when He gave him a tajalli in this station and form, wisdom necessitated the response in separation by the source of gatheredness. So he put disconnection first and said, "Glory be to You!" using the kaf (pronoun of the second person singular) which defines who is indicated by encounter and speech. "It is not mine," inasmuch as I belong to myself rather than You, (31) "to say what I have no right to," that is, what my he-ness rather than my essence necessitates. "If indeed I said it, You know it," because You are the Speaker, and whoever says something knows what he has said. You are the tongue by which I speak, as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, reported to us in a divine transmission in which Allah said, "I am his tongue by which he speaks." He made His He-ness the same as the tongue of the speaker, but ascribed the speech to His slave.

Then the man of right action completed his response by saying, "You know what is in my self," and the speaker is Allah, "and I do not know what is in it," so this is in knowledge of the he-ness of 'Isa in respect of His He-ness, not in respect of the fact that 'Isa speaks and has an effect. "It is You", so He brought distinction and support to confirm the proof and dependence on Him, since Allah only knows the Unseen. So He separated and gathered, unified and made many, made wide and narrow.

To end his reply, 'Isa said, "I said to them nothing but what You ordered me to say." He negated to begin with, (32) alluding to the fact the he has no existence. The statement required adab with the questioner. If he had not acted thus, he would have been described as lacking knowledge of the realities, but he certainly was not like that! Thus he said, "only what You ordered me," and it is You are the One who speaks on my tongue, and You are my tongue. Observe this divine polarity of the spirit! What is finer and more subtle than this!

'Isa said that he said, "Worship Allah." So he used the name of Allah because slaves differ in forms of worship and Shari'a. So he did not specify one name rather than another name. Instead he used the name which joins all of them. Then he went on, "my Lord and your Lord." It is known that His relationship to one existent being by lordship (rubûbiya) is not the same as His relationship with another existent being. That is why he made a distinction when he said, "my Lord and your Lord," by two references one to the speaker and one to the one addressed. He said, "nothing but what You ordered me," and thus he affirmed that he is one who is commanded. The quality of being commanded is not other than slavery, since one is only commanded when obedience is expected of one, even if one does not comply.

Since the command descends according to ranks, all that appears in a certain rank is coloured with what the reality of that rank gives it. The rank of the one commanded has a principle which appears in everyone who is commanded. The rank of the commander has a principle which appears in every command. Allah said, "Establish the prayer." He is the commander and the one who is subject to the obligation is the commanded. The slave says, "Forgive me!" so he commands and Allah is the commanded. What Allah demands of His slave by His command is the same as what the slave demands of Allah by his command. This is why every supplication is answered, and it must be answered, even if the answer is delayed, just as some who are under obligation delay the prayer. Whoever who is obligated to perform the prayer and does not pray it at its proper time, delays obedience and prays it at another time when he is able to perform it. There must be an answer, if only by intention.

Then he said, "I was a witness against them (and he did not say over himself with them as when he said, 'my Lord and your Lord') as long as I remained among them" because the Prophets are witnesses over their communities as long as they are in them. "But when You took me (i.e. raised me) back to You," and You veiled them from me and me from them, "You were the One Watching over them," no longer in my substance, but in their substance, since You are their eye which necessitates observation.

He wanted to make a distinction between him and his Lord so that it would be known that he was a slave and that Allah is Allah and He is his Lord. He referred to himself as a witness (shahid) and he referred to Allah as the Watcher (raqib). He mentioned "them" before himself when he said, "I was a witness against them as long as I remained among them," (33) preferring them in priority and with adab. He put "them" after Allah in relationship to Him when he said, "You were the One Watching over them" because of what the Lord merits in priority of rank.

Then know that Allah has the name the Watcher (Ra'iqib) which 'Isa applied to Him, and He is the Witness in His words, "a witness against them," and "You are Witness of all things."

(5:117) He referred to all things and "thing" is the most indefinite of things. He used the name, "The Witness," and Allah is the Witness over every witnessed thing according to what the reality of that witnessed things demands. He indicated that Allah was the Witness over the people of 'Isa when he said, "I was a witness against them as long as I remained among them." This is the witnessing of Allah in the substance of 'Isa, as it is confirmed that Allah is his tongue, hearing and sight.

Then he said something which is both 'Isawian and Muhammadan. As for its being 'Isawian, that is the speech of 'Isa by the transmission of Allah from him in His Book. As for its being Muhammadan, it happened that Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, stood in one place for an entire night reciting it without turning to anything else until dawn broke. It is, "If You punish them, they are Your slaves. If You forgive them, You are the Almighty, the All-Wise." (34) "They" is the pronoun of those who are absent as "he" is the pronoun of someone who is absent. as He said, "they are those who disbelieve," with the pronoun of those who are not present. Absence is their veil to what is meant by the witnessed one who is present. He said, "If you punish them," with the pronoun of the absent, and that absence is the source of the veil which hides them from the Real.

The Prophet mentioned them to Allah before the time when they are present (35) so that when the actual time came when they were present, the leaven would already have acted on the dough, and the dough might have had time to become equal to the leaven. (36)

Then by "they are Your slaves," he singled out the unity (tawhid) on which they are based. There is no submissiveness greater than the submissiveness of slaves because they have no freedom of action with themselves. They act according to what their master wishes of them when he has no partner in them. He said, "Your slaves," and singled out what was meant of the punishment which is their humiliation. There are none more lowly than them since they are slaves. Thus their essence necessitates that they be lowly, so You do not degrade them, for You do not degrade them with anything more lowly than the fact that they are slaves.

"If You forgive them," if You veil them from the punishment which they deserve because of their opposition if You put forgiveness on them, You veil them from the punishment and protect them from it, "You are the Almighty," the Protector, the Guardian. When Allah gives this name ('aziz) to one of His slaves, then Allah is called the Exalter (Mu'izz). This name is given to him by the 'Aziz, so he has strong protection from the revenge and punishment which the Avenger and Punisher desire for him. He also used distinction and dependence to confirm the proof, and so the ayat is the same sort of His words, "You are the Knower of the Unseen Worlds," and "You are the Watcher over them," and "You are the Almighty, the All-Wise." (37)

The question from the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and his supplication to his Lord in which he repeated the phrase for the entire night until dawn was a request for the answer. If he had heard the answer in the first questioning, he would not have repeated it. Allah showed him the judgements in detail by which they deserved punishment. As each instance was presented to him and specified, the Prophet said to Him, "If You punish them, they are Your slaves, and if You forgive them, You are the Almighty, the All-Wise." If he had seen in what was presented to him anything which would make it necessary that Allah had already decided and that His presence must be preferred, he would have invoked Allah against them rather than for them. So what they deserved is changed by what this ayat accords of submission to Allah and exposing themselves to His pardon.

The Prophet related that when Allah loves the voice of His slave when he makes supplication to Him, He delays the answer to his supplication so that the slave will repeat the supplication. This comes from His love for the slave, not because He has turned away from him. For that reason, the Prophet mentioned the name of the Wise, and the Wise is the one who puts everything in its proper place, and who does not turn away from the qualities which their realities necessitate and demand; so the Wise is the One who knows the order of things. When the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, kept repeating this ayat, he was in possession of a great knowledge from Allah. If anyone recites it, let him recite it in that manner. (38) Otherwise, it is better that he remain silent. When Allah lets the slave articulate any request, He does so when He wants to answer it and grant his need. Let no one be slow in whatever has been guaranteed to him, but let him persevere as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, perserved with this ayat in all his states, so that he either hears with His ear, or with hearing, whichever you like. How else will Allah make you hear the answer? If He permits the question on your tongue, He will let you hear the answer with your ear. If He permits the meaning to you, He will let you hear the answer by your hearing.

Notes to Chapter 15:

1. As he was born more than five centuries before the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and is still alive, waiting to descend.
2. The story is found in the Qur'an 20:75-95, where as-Samiri convinces the tribe of Israel to cast their ornaments into the fire out of which he brought the figure of a Calf which they worshipped. 16: The Seal of the Wisdom of Mercy in the Word of Sulayman (Solomon)

Bilqis said, (1) "It (the letter) is from Sulayman and it says 'In the Name of Allah, the All-Merciful, Most Merciful.'" Some people criticise the fact that the name of Sulayman comes before the name of Allah. That is not the case, and in saying this they say something that does not befit the gnosis which Sulayman, peace be upon him, had of his Lord. How could what they say be connected to him when Bilqis said of it, "a noble letter had been delivered to me," that is, a letter which honoured her. In this they were influenced by the story of how Chosroes tore up the letter of the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. (2) He did not tear it up until he had read all of it and knew what it contained. It was the same with Bilqis. Had she not accepted what was established, respect for its author would not have prevented her from tearing up the letter, whether his name, peace be upon him, had been mentioned before or after the name of Allah.

Sulayman mentioned the two mercies: the mercy of graciousness and the mercy of obligation, and they are ar-Rahman ar-Rahim. So Allah freely dispenses His bounty by the Rahman, and it is incumbent on Him by the Rahim. This obligation comes from graciousness, so Rahim is contained in Rahman. Allah "has prescribed mercy for Himself," glory be to Him! in order that the slave might have what Allah spoke about of the deeds which this slave brings, expecting his due from Allah who has required Himself to have this mercy for them, the mercy of obligation. When one of the slaves is like this, he knows that He is the author of the deed.

The deed is divided according to the eight organs of man. Allah informed us that He is the He-ness of each organ. So the author of the action is none other than Allah while the form is that of the slave. He-ness is embodied in him, i.e. only in his name because Allah is the source of what is manifested and which is called "creation". Because of this, the names of the Manifest and the Last belong to the slave since he was not and then was. By the fact that his manifestation depends on Him and action issues from Him, there is the name the Hidden and the First. Thus, when you see creation, you see the First and the Last, the Manifest and the Hidden.

This recognition was not hidden from Sulayman, peace be upon him. Indeed, it is a part of a kingdom which "belonged to no one after him," (3) in terms of its manifestation in the visible world. Muhammad, peace be upon him, was given what Sulayman was given, but he did not manifest it. Allah gave him the power to vanquish the 'ifrit (4) who came in the night to attack him. (5) When the Prophet wanted to take the 'ifrit and tie him to the one of the columns of the mosque until morning so that the children of Madina could play with him, he remembered the prayer of Sulayman, and so Allah made him drive the 'ifrit off in disgrace. The Prophet did not manifest his power as Sulayman had done. He spoke of "a kingdom" which is not universal, and we know that he meant a particular kingdom. We see that the Prophet shared in every part of the Kingdom which Allah had given him and so we know by this that he is privileged with the whole kingdom. In the story of the 'ifrit, he was only given the manifestation while Sulayman might have been given the whole and the manifestation. If the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, had not said in the story of the 'ifrit, "and Allah gave me power over him," we would have said that when he wanted to seize the 'ifrit, Allah reminded him of Sulayman's prayer so that the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, would know that Allah had not given him power to seize him.

He then made him send off the 'ifrit off in disgrace.

When he said, "Allah gave me power over him," we knew that Allah had given him freedom of action in that. Then Allah reminded him and he remembered Sulayman's prayer and showed adab towards him. We know from this that that no creature after Sulayman had the general manifestation of that kingdom.

Our goal in this question is only discussion and instruction about the two mercies which Sulayman mentioned in the two names which are expressed in Arabic as ar-Rahman ar-Rahim. (6) Allah stipulated the mercy of obligation (7) and made the application of the mercy of graciousness universal when He said, "My mercy extends to all things," (7:156) even the Divine Names, which are the realities of ascriptions. He was gracious to us in them. We are the result of the mercy of graciousness by the Divine Names and divine ascriptions of lordship. Then He prescribed mercy for Himself by our own manifestation. He informed us that He is our He-ness, that we might know that He obliged mercy on Himself only for Himself. Mercy never departs from Him. Who could be gracious to you when there is only Him?

There must be a principle for clarifying differences in merit this is in relation to what is manifested of the differences in merit that creatures have in knowledge, so that it might be said that this person knows more than that person, even though the source is but one. This means the shortcoming connected to the will (irada), apart from the connection of knowledge. This difference in merit exists in the divine attributes. (8) The connection and merit of will and its increase is connected to power. In the same way, hearing, sight and all the divine names are arranged in ranks, some having more merit than others. Similarly what is manifested in creation differs in ranks of merit, so that it can be said that this person knows more than that person even though the source is the same.

As each Divine Name which I have set forth is implied by all the Names and described by them, similarly that which creation manifests accepts all of that which is subject to differences of merit. Each part of the universe is from all the universe, i.e. it is a vessel for all the separate realities of the universe. Our statement that Zayd is inferior to 'Amr in knowledge does not contradict the fact that the He-ness of Allah is the source of both Zayd and 'Amr, but it is more perfect and knowing in 'Amr than in Zayd, even as the Names differ in merit. They are not other-than-Allah. Allah, inasmuch as He is Knowing, has a more encompassing connection than Allah as the Transformer, the All-Powerful. But He is still He and not other-than-Him.

O my friend! do not then know Him in one aspect and be ignorant of Him in another! Do not negate Him here and affirm Him there, unless You affirm Him by an aspect through which He affirms Himself and negate Him by an aspect through which He negates Himself, as in the ayat which combines affirmation and negation in respect to Him when He said, "Nothing is like Him," negating, "and He is the All-Hearing, the All-Seeing," (42:11) and so He affirmed an attribute which is general to every hearing and seeing living being. Nothing exists but that it is alive, although this is hidden in the world from the perception of some people. It will appear to all people in the Next World, for it is the Abode of the Living (ad-Dar al-Hayawan). Similarly, the life of this world is only veiled from some of the slaves so that election and difference of merit might be manifested among the slaves of Allah according to what they perceive of Him from the realities of the universe.

In one whose attainment is more comprehensive, Allah is in principle more manifest in him than in someone who does not have this comprehensiveness. So do not be veiled by the difference in merit and say that it is not correct to say that creation is the He-ness of Allah after we have shown you the different in merit in the Divine Names. You have no doubt about them being Allah, and what is designated by them is not other than Allah.

How then could Sulayman place his name before the name of Allah as they allege? He is part of the whole which the mercy of graciousness brought into existence. The name, ar-Rahman ar-Rahim, must come first for the dependence of the one receiving this mercy to be valid. Advancing the one who should come afterwards and delaying the one who should come before in the place he merits is contrary to the realities.

Part of the wisdom of Bilqis and the sublimity of her knowledge lies in the fact that she did not mention who cast the letter to her. She only did that so that her companions would know that she had communications on matters whose means they did not know. This is part of divine management in ruling because when the means of communication reaching the ruler are unknown, the people of the government fear for themselves in their actions. Therefore they only act with prudence in a matter because that will reach their ruler, and they are guarding themselves from the potential danger of that action. If they knew precisely by whom information reached their ruler, they would have tried to flatter him and bribe him so that they could do whatever they wanted without their ruler hearing about it. Therefore the Queen said, "a noble letter has been delivered to me," without naming the one who cast it. That was an act of policy on her part would insure respect for her among the people of her kingdom and the nobles under her rule. By this, she merited her superiority over them.

As regards the superiority of the human man of knowledge over the man of knowledge of the jinn in the secrets of the disposal of things and the special properties of thing, that is known by the amount of time, for the movement of the eye in perceiving what it perceives is quicker than the movement of the body when it moves. (9) The moment in which the eye moves is the same moment which it connects to the object, in spite of the distance between the viewer and the object. The moment that the eyes open is the moment in which they are connected to the heaven of the fixed stars. The moment when its glance returns is the same moment that its perception is absent.

Rising from one's place is not like that. It does not possess this speed. Asaf ibn Barkhiya (10) was more perfect in the deed than the jinn was. What Asaf ibn Barkhiya said is the same as the action in the same moment. Sulayman, peace be upon him, at the same moment saw Bilqis' throne "settled before him" so one must not imagine that he perceived it while it was in its original place without being moved. We do not think that the displacement takes place in one and the same moment, but that it involves going into non-existence and returning to existence inasmuch as the only one who is aware of that is the one who has recognition of it. This is what Allah said, "Yet they are dubious about the new creation." (50:15) Not a moment passes them but that they see what they saw. Since it is like this, the time of its non-existence (the absence of the throne from its place) is the same as the time of its existence with Sulayman because of the renewal of creation with the "breaths". No one knows this power, or rather, man is not aware with regard to himself that he ceases to exist in each breath and then is again.

Do not think that "this" (thumma) implies a delay. That is not true. However, it demands a high rank of knowledge in Arabic, as when the poet says:

As he brandished the straight Rudayni, (11) it quivered.

There is no doubt that the moment of brandishing the spear is without a doubt the same as the moment of quivering of the thing which is brandished. It happened without delay. It is the same with the renewal of creation with breaths. The time of non-existence coincides with the time of the existence of its like. It is similar to the renewal of accidents in the theory of the Ash'arites [tajrîd al-a'râd].

The question involving the moving of Bilqis' throne is one of the most difficult problems, except for someone who has recognition of what we have mentioned in its story. Asaf did not have any merit except for acquiring renewal in the assembly of Sulayman, peace be upon him. The throne was not moved across place nor did it rise above the earth nor break the laws of space for the one who understands what we mentioned. That was done by one of the companions of Sulayman in order to elevate Sulayman's honour in the selves of those who were present with Bilqis and her suite. The reason for that was that Sulayman was Allah's gift to Da'ud as He said, "We gave Sulayman to Da'ud," (38:30) so the gift is the giving of the donor by providing a blessing, not by means of fitting recompense or merit. So he is the abundant blessing, the decisive word and the cutting sword.

As for the knowledge of Sulayman, Allah said of him, "We gave Sulayman understanding of it (in spite of his opposite judgement to that of Da'ud), and Allah "gave each of them judgement and knowledge." (21:79) Da'ud's knowledge was knowledge given by Allah, and Sulayman's knowledge was the knowledge of Allah in the matter inasmuch as He is the Judge without intermediary. So Sulayman is the interpreter of Allah in the seat of sincerity.(12) It is like the man who is striving to hit on the judgement of Allah by which Allah would judge the question. If he were to find it by himself or by what was revealed to His Messenger, then he would have two rewards. The one who errs in this particular judgement has one reward as well as its being knowledge and judgement. The community of Muhammad was given the rank of Sulayman in judgement (13) and the rank of Da'ud in wisdom, (14) so there is no better community than it.

When Bilqis saw her throne, and she knew how great the distance was and the impossibility of moving it in that space of time, she said, "It seems the same." (28:42, lit. "it is as if it were.") She spoke the truth according to what we mentioned regarding the renewal of creation by similarity. It was it. The matter is true, as you are the same at the time of renewal as you were in past time. Part of the perfection of Sulayman's knowledge was in the instruction he gave regarding the pavilion when he told Bilqis, "Enter the courtyard." (15) The courtyard was very smooth without any curvature in its glass. When Bilqis saw it, she thought that it was water and had depth, so she bared her legs so as not to let the water dampen her clothes. By that, Sulayman informed her that the throne which she saw was of this sort. This is the utmost fairness. He informed her that she had hit the mark when she said, "It seems the same." At that point, she said, "My Lord, I have wronged myself but I have submitted with Sulayman to the Lord of all the worlds."

So she did not submit to Sulayman, but to the Lord of the worlds, and Sulayman was part of the worlds. She did not restrict her submission as the Messengers do not restrict their belief in Allah, contrary to Pharaoh who said, "to the Lord of Musa and Harun." (26:48) Although this submission is related to Bilqis' submission in a certain respect, it does not have the same force. She had more discernment than Pharaoh in submission to Allah. Furthermore, Pharaoh was governed by the principle of the moment when he said, "I believe in the One in whom the Children of Israel believe." (10:90) He specified, but he also specified when he saw the sorcerers articulate their belief in the "Lord of Musa and Harun." The Islam of Bilqis was the Islam of Sulayman since she said, "with Sulayman." She followed him in all that he adhered to in the way of beliefs.

This is how we are on the straight path which the Lord is on, for our forelocks are in His hand, (16) and it is impossible for us to separate from Him. We are with Him implicitly, and He is with us by open declaration. Allah said, "He is with you wherever you are," (57:4) and we are with Him as He takes us by our forelocks. He, may He be exalted! is with Himself wherever He goes with us on His path. So everyone in the world is on a straight path, and it is the path of the Lord. It is this that Bilqis learned from Sulayman, so she said, "To Allah, the Lord of all the worlds," without referring to a particular world.

As for the subjection which was the privilege of Sulayman, peace be upon him, and by which he was distinguished from others, and the kingdom which Allah gave him which none after him would have, it is from his command when He said, "We gave him the fiercely blowing wind, speeding at his command." (21:81) It was not subjection in itself, for Allah said in respect of each of us without exception, "He has made everything in the heavens and everything on the earth subservient to you." (45:13) He also mentioned the subjection of the winds, stars and other things, (17) but that is not by our command. It is from the command of Allah. If you reflect with your intellect, Sulayman was privileged by this command neither by mental concentration nor by aspiration (himma) rather, it was by nothing more than the command itself. We said that because we recognise that the physical bodies of the world can be affected by the himma of the self when someone is in the station of concentration. We have seen such things happen in this Path. Sulayman only had to articulate the command in whatever he wished to subject without either concentration or himma.

Know, may Allah support us and you by a spirit from Him, that when any slave receives a gift like this, that does not detract from his portion of the kingdom of the Next World, nor is he called to account for it. That was true of Sulayman. Although he sought it from his Lord, the tasting (dhawq) of the Path (18) demands that it was advanced to him from what was stored up for others, and He will call him to account for it when he wants it in the Next World. Allah told him, "This is Our gift (and He did not say "to you: or to anyone else); bestow or withhold without reckoning." (38:39) We knew by the tasting of the Path that his request was from the command of his Lord. Thus the request was from the divine command, and the one who requested it received full recompense for his request.

If the Creator wishes, He grants his need in what he seeks from Him, and if He wishes, He withholds it. The slave has fulfilled what Allah demanded of him to obey His command in what he asked of his Lord. If he had asked that from himself without his Lord commanding him to do that, then he would be held to account for it.

That is true in all that Allah is asked for, as He said to His Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, "Say: 'O Lord, increase me in knowledge!'" He obeyed his Lord's command and sought increase in knowledge to such an extent that each time he was given milk, he interpreted it to be knowledge even as he interpreted it as knowledge in a dream in which he received a glass of milk. In the dream, he drank the milk, and gave the rest of it to 'Umar ibn al-Khattab. The people asked, "What is its interpretation?" He replied, "Knowledge." Similarly, when Allah took him on his Night Journey, the angel gave him a vessel which contained milk and a vessel which contained wine. The Prophet drank the milk, and the angel said, "You have chosen the true nature (fitra). Allah has bestowed you on your community!" When milk appeared, it was the form of knowledge. Therefore it is knowledge taking on the form as milk, just as Jibril came to Maryam in the form of "a handsome, well-built man." (19:16)

When the Prophet said, "People are asleep and when they die, they wake up," he meant that everything that man sees in the life of this world is in the rank of the dreams of someone who is asleep, so it must be interpreted. Phenomenal being is imagination (khayal), but it is Allah in reality. (19) Whoever understands this has received the secrets of the Path. When the Prophet was offered milk, he would say, "O Allah, bless us in it and increase us in it" because he saw it as the form of knowledge, and he had been commanded to seek increase in knowledge. When he was offered something other than milk, he would say, "O Allah, bless us in it and give us better than it."

When Allah gives something to someone, and He gives it to him by a request which arises from a divine command, He does not take him to account for it in the Next Abode. When Allah gives something to someone, and He gives it by a request which is not by a divine command, the business in it is up to Allah. If He wishes, He will take him to account for it, and if He wishes, He will not take him to account for it. I hope for knowledge from Allah in particular for which He will not call one to account, for He commanded the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, to seek increase of knowledge, and it is the same command which is addressed to the Prophet's community. Allah said, "You have an excellent model in the Messenger of Allah," (33:21) and what greater model is there than this model who is a source of solace (20) to the one who possesses understanding from Allah?

Had we discussed the station of Sulayman in its entirety, you would have seen a matter whose revelation would have struck you with terror. Most of the men of knowledge of this Path have no knowledge of the state and rank of Sulayman. The business is not as they claim. (21)

Notes to Chapter 16:

1. In Qur'an 27:30. The story is found in Sura 27. When Sulayman hears of the kingdom of Queen Bilqis in Sheba', he sends the hoopoe to take a letter to her.
2. When the Prophet sent Chosroes or Khosrau a letter inviting him to Islam, he tore it up after it was read to him.
3. Ref. Qur'an 38:35, where Sulayman says, "My Lord, forgive me, and give me a kingdom the like of which will never be granted to anyone after me."
4. Type of malicious jinn.
5. Hadith. "Yesterday Shaytan rushed up suddenly to stop my prayer. Allah gave me power over him and I seized him. I wanted to tie him to one of the pillars of the mosque so that all of you could look at him, but then I remembered the supplication of my brother Sulayman, 'O Lord, forgive me and give me a kingdom the like of which will never be granted to anyone after me.' (38:35) Allah turned him away in humiliation." via Abu Hurayra in al-Bukhari and Muslim.
6. The All-Merciful, the Most Merciful.
7. When He said, "I will write (mercy) for those who are godfearing...." (Qur'an 7:156)
8. i.e. Knowledge is more perfect than will.
9. Sulayman asked his council, "'O Council, who among you will bring me her throne before they come to me in submission?' An 'ifrit of the jinn said, 'I will bring it to you before you get up from your seat...' He who possessed knowledge of the Book said, 'I will bring it to you before your glance returns to you.'" (27:38-40)

10. The name of the man of knowledge in Sulayman's council.

11. Rudayna was a woman who was famous for straightening spear shafts which were tested by shaking.

12. See Qur'an 54:55.

13. i.e. by the Qur'an and hadith.

14. By ijtiḥad.

15. This is in the same sura (27), ayat 44.

16. Qur'an Ref. 11:56, "I have believed in Allah, my Lord and your Lord. There is no creature He does not hold by the forelock. My Lord is on a straight path."

17. Various places in the Qur'an: 14:32, 16:12, 22:65, 31:20.

18. One variant has "reality" instead of Path (Tariq).

19. Inasmuch as phenomenal being is a divine shadow.

20. Uswa is model, or a person to be imitated and through whose emulation one gains consolation. The source of solace is the verbal noun from Form V of this verb, ta'assa, which means to become consoled by the example of another who had suffered in a similar fashion and been patient in it.

21. His kingdom does not decrease what he has in the Next world.

17: The Seal of the Wisdom of Existence (Wujud) in the Word of Da'ud (David)

"We subjected the mountains to glorify with him in the evening and sunrise, and also the birds, flocking together, all of them turned to him." Then Allah combined the kingdom and speech and prophethood in Da'ud when He says, "We made his kingdom strong, and gave him wisdom and decisive speech." (1) Allah clearly and openly appointed Da'ud Khalif. This was Da'ud, peace be upon him. His freedom of action in the kingdom with this subjection was by a mighty command which was not completed in him alone. Allah also gave it to Sulayman who shared in it as He says, "And We gave knowledge to Da'ud and Sulayman who said, 'Praise be to Allah who has favoured us.'" (27:15) He says, "We gave Sulayman understanding of it. We gave each of them judgement and knowledge." (21:79)

Know that since prophethood and the message are a divine privilege, and cannot be acquired. This is the prophethood which lays down a Shari'a. It is Allah's gift to them. Gifts of this sort are not recompense, nor is recompense demanded from them for these gifts. Allah bestows it on them as pure blessing and favour. So He says, "We gave him (i.e. Ibrahim) Ishaq and Ya'qub." (2) He says of Ayyub, "We gave him his family, and the same again with them." (38:43) He says of Musa, "We endowed him with Our mercy, making his brother Harun a Prophet," (19:53). There are more instances like that. What they received first of all is what they will receive at the last in the totality of their states, or most of them. It is only His name, the Giver.

Allah says in respect of Da'ud, "We gave Da'ud great favour from Us." (34:10) He did not accompany that with a demand for recompense from Da'ud, nor did He say that He gave him what He mentioned as a reward. When He demanded gratitude for that by action, He demanded it of the people of Da'ud, and did not mention Da'ud himself, asking Da'ud's people to thank Him for the blessing which He gave to Da'ud. For Da'ud himself, it is a gift of pure blessing and favour. It is not like that for his people, but rather like the demands of barter. So Allah said, "Work, family of Da'ud, in thankfulness! But very few of My slaves are thankful." (3)

If the Prophets, peace be upon him, thanked Allah for what He had bestowed on them and given to them, that was not from the command of Allah. They undertook that freely from themselves, as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, stood thanking Allah until his feet were swollen, when Allah had forgiven Him his wrong actions, past and present. When people commented what he did, he said, "Am I not a thankful slave?" Allah said that Nuh was a thankful slave. (4) So the thankful among the slaves are few.

The first blessing which Allah bestowed on Da'ud was that He gave him a name which does not have any connected letters in it:

D W D

By this, He cut him off from the world and He told us this by the name itself which is dâl, alif, and wâw. Allah named Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, with both connected and separated letters:

So in this Allah both joined him and separated him from the world. He combined the two states for him in his name as He combined the two states for Da'ud through meaning (ma'na) (5) although He did not put that in his name. That was a privilege which Muhammad had above Da'ud, i.e. calling him by this name. The matter was thus completed for Muhammad in all its aspects. It is the same in his name Ahmad.

AHMAD

That is from the wisdom of Allah.

Then He spoke about the blessing He gave Da'ud in the mountains' echoing of glorification with him. (6) So they glorified with his glorification that the deed might be his. It was the same with the birds. He gave him power and described him by it, (7) and He gave him wisdom and decisive speech.(8)

Then the greatest blessing and nearest rank which Allah appointed for him was that his khalifate was mentioned in the divine text. He did not do that with any of his kind, and there were khalifs among them. Allah said, "Da'ud, We have made you a khalif on the earth, so judge between people with truth and do follow your own desires," i.e. whatever comes to your mind in judgement without revelation from Me, "letting them misguide you from the Way of Allah," (38:26) from the path which I revealed to My Messengers. Then Allah showed adab with him and said, "Those who are misguided from the Way of Allah will receive a harsh punishment since they forgot the Day of Reckoning." He did not say to him, "If you go astray from My Path, there is a terrible punishment for you." If you said that Adam is mentioned as the Khalif in divine text, we will say that it is not the same as in the text regarding Da'ud, for Allah said to the angels, "I am putting a khalif on the earth." (2:30) He did not say, "I am making Adam a khalif." Even if He had said that, it still would not be the same as His words, "We have made you a khalif," in respect of Da'ud. One is implied and the other is explicit. Mentioning Adam in the story after that did not indicate that he is the same as the khalif of whom Allah spoke. Occupy your mind with the transmissions of Allah on His slaves when He transmits them. It is the same in respect to Ibrahim the friend, "I will make you an Imam for the people." (2:124) He did not say "a khalif". We know that the imamate here means the khalifate, but it is not the same because He did not mention it by the most specific of its names which is the khalifate.

Then part of bestowing the khalifate on Da'ud is that He made him a khalif of judgement. That is only from Allah. He told him, "Judge between people with the truth." (5:42) The khalifate of Adam was not of this rank. Da'ud's khalifate was that he follow what was in it previously, not that he delegated with the divine judgement of Allah in His creation. If that had been the case, it would have occurred. However, our discourse is only regarding the khalifs on the earth from Allah, and they are Messengers. As for the khalifate today, it is from the Messengers, not from Allah, so they only judge by what the Messengers prescribed for them. They do not go beyond that except when there is a small point which is only known by those like us. That is in taking what they judge by, from what is in the Shari'a of the Messenger, peace be upon him.

The khalifate is from the Messenger. He takes the judgement from him, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, by transmission or by ijtiḥad, whose basis is also transmitted from him. Some of us think that the one who takes the judgement takes it from Allah, for he is a khalif from Allah by the source of that judgement. The substance is his inasmuch as it was the Messenger's - the source of his judgement is that of the Messenger's. Outwardly he follows, not disputing his judgement, as will be the case with 'Isa when he descends and judges. It is the same when the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Those are the ones whom Allah has guided, so be guided by their guidance." (9) This relates to what he recognises as one who is singled out and one who conforms. It is in him by the degree of what the Prophet established of the Shari'a which from the previous Messengers since he confirmed it. We follow him in relation to its confirmation, not because it is a Shari'a of someone else before him. In the same way, the Khalif takes from Allah the same thing that he takes from the Messenger.

In the language of unveiling, we call him "the khalif of Allah", and with outward knowledge, we say "the khalif of the Messenger of Allah". For this reason, the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, died and did not transmit the khalifate from himself to anyone else for he knew that among the slaves of Allah are those who will take the khalifate from their Lord. Thus the khalif from Allah is in conformity with the judgements of the Shari'a. Since the Prophet knew that, he did not hinder the matter. Allah has khalifs in His creation who take from the mine of the Messenger and the Messengers that which the Messengers took. They recognise the virtue of their predecessor there because the Messenger is a vessel for increase. The khalif is not a container for the increase which, had he been the Messenger, he would have received. He only gives knowledge and judgement in what he legislates through the specific legislation of the Messenger. Outwardly he follows the Messenger without opposition.

Do you not see that in the case of 'Isa, peace be upon him, when the Jews imagined that he did not add to Musa, as is the case with what we said about the Khalifate today with the Messenger, they accepted him and confirmed him? When he added judgement and abrogated judgement, Musa confirmed it, for 'Isa was a Messenger. They did not accept that because he differed from their creed, and the Jews did not know the matter for what it was - this is why they sought to kill him. His story is what Allah relates to us about them and him in His Mighty Book. He was a Messenger before increase. As for decrease of the judgement or its increase, it is confirmed since decrease is increase of judgement without a doubt.

The khalifate today does not have this rank, but it decreases or increases based on the Shari'a which is confirmed by itjihad, not on the Shari'a which Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, articulated. The khalif might do something which is counter to a hadith in a certain judgement, and so he imagines that that comes from itjihad. That is not the case, but rather this Imam has not confirmed that the transmission with respect to unveiling is from the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. If it had been confirmed, he would have judged by it. If the path in it is fairness in justice, he is not protected from illusion. It is not by transmission in meaning.

Something like this occurs in the khalif today. Similarly, it also applies to 'Isa for, when he descends, he will remove much of the Shari'a established by itjihad. By removing that, he will clarify the form of the legislated truth which he had, especially when the judgements of the Imams differ in the same event. We know absolutely that when revelation descended, it descended in a certain way. That is the divine judgement and none other! Allah confirmed it and it is the Shari'a of confirmation by the removal of interdiction from this community and the vastness of its judgements in it.

As for the statement of the Prophet, "If there are two khalifs, then slay one of them," this is the outward khalifate which has the sword. If they are in agreement, then one of them must be killed by the conflict of the khalifate of meaning. There is no actual killing in it, but killing comes with the outward khalifate. If the khalif does not possess this station, being the khalif of the Messenger of Allah - it is just being from the principle of the basis by which the existence of two gods could be imagined: "If there had been any gods besides Allah in heaven or earth, they would both be ruined," (21:22) even if they are in agreement. We know that if they differ implicitly, the judgement of one of the two will be valid. The one with the operative judgement is the god properly speaking. The one whose judgement is not operative is not god.

From this, we know that every valid judgement in the world today is the judgement of Allah even if it differs from the established judgement in its outward manifestation called the Shari'a. The only judgement which is valid belongs to Allah in the heart of the matter, because the matter which occurs in the world is based on the judgement of the Divine Will, not on the judgement of the established Shari'a, (10) whose establishment itself comes from the Will. For that reason, He put His determination into effect. Therefore, Will only has determination in the matter, not in the act which it brings.

The power of the Will (mashi'a) is immense. (11) This is why Abu Talib (12) considered it to be the Throne of the Essence, since the will itself necessitates judgement. Nothing occurs in existence nor disappears from it without the Will. When there is opposition to the divine command here, it is called "rebellion". It is only commanding the means, not the command which brings things into being. None opposes Allah at all in what He does in respect to the command of the Will. Opposition only occurs in respect of the command of means. So understand that!

Properly speaking, the command of the Will is directed to bringing the action itself into existence, not to the one at whose hands the action manifests itself. It is impossible that the action should not be. However it takes place in a particular locus, and so, at one moment, it is called opposition to the command of Allah, and at another moment it is called agreement and obedience to the command of Allah. The language of praise and blame follow the action accordingly.

Since the matter itself is based on what we have stated about it, creation of all sorts therefore hopes for happiness. He designated this station as "mercy which encompasses everything." (13) It preceded divine wrath, and the predecessor comes before as is its right. That which the latter judges is what the former judged. Mercy obtained it since nothing preceded it, so this is one meaning of "His mercy preceded His wrath" that mercy judges the one who reaches it. It stands at the end. Therefore the end must be reached, and thus mercy and parting from wrath must be reached. It has jurisdiction over everything which reaches it according to what is given to it by the state of the one who arrives.

Whoever possesses understanding witnesses what we have said.
If they do not understand,
they should take it from us.
There is only what we mentioned in this matter, so rely on it and be in it now as we were.
What we recited to you came from it to us, and from us to you is what we gave you from us.

As for the softening of iron, (14) hard hearts are softened by reprimand and threat as fire softens iron. The hardness of hearts is a stronger hardness than that of stone. Fire breaks stone, calcifies it and does not soften it. Iron was only softened for him so that protective coats of mail could be fashioned. This is an instruction from Allah that the thing is only protected by itself.¹ Mail protects against the spearhead, the sword, the knife and the arrowhead - protection against iron is by iron. The Muhammadan Shari'a brings, "I take refuge with You from You." Understand this! This is the spirit of the softening of iron. He is the Avenger, the Merciful, and Allah grants success.

18: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Breath (Nafas) in the Word of Yunus (Jonah)

Know that this human organism in its perfection consists of spirit (ruh), body and self (nafs). Allah created it in His form. The disintegration of its structure is only undertaken by the One who created it either by His hand - and it is only that - or by His command. Whoever undertakes to do that without the command of Allah has wronged himself and exceeded the limits of Allah in it and rushed to the ruin of the one whom Allah has commanded to thrive. Know that compassion to the slaves of Allah is more proper through preservation than jealousy in Allah.

Da'ud, peace be upon him, wanted to build the Bayt al-Muqaddas, (1) and built it many times. Whenever he finished it, it was destroyed. He complained about that to Allah. Allah revealed to him, "This House of Mine will not be built by the hands of one who has shed blood." Da'ud said, "O Lord, was that not for Your sake?" Allah said, "Yes, but are they not My slaves?" Da'ud said, "O Lord, let it be built at the hands of someone who is from me!" Allah revealed to him, "Your son Sulayman will build it."

What is meant in this story is that the preservation and maintenance of this human organism is better than its destruction. Do you not see that Allah has prescribed jizya (2) and research of peace with those who had opposed the Din in order to spare them. He said, "If they incline to peace, you too incline to it, and put your trust in Allah." (8:61)

Do you not see that for the one who has responsibility for retaliation, accepting blood-money or pardoning is prescribed for the next-of-kin who is the responsible guardian? If he refuses to accept either, then the killer can be slain in retaliation. Do you not see how when the next-of-kin consists of a group of people, and one of them accepts the blood-money or pardons the person while the rest of the group want him killed, Allah observes the one who pardoned and prefers him to the one who did not pardon. Do you not see that the Prophet, peace be upon him, said, "Whoever is in a position to retaliate and slays the person is like him"? Allah says, "The repayment of a bad action is one equivalent to it," (42:40) so He made retaliation an evil deed, i.e. that deed is evil even though it is part of the Shari'a. Whoever pardons and makes amends has a reward due from Allah because he is based on His form. Whoever pardons and does not slay, his reward is due to the One on whose form he is based, because the One who fashioned is more entitled to it, and his existence only appeared by the name the Manifest.

Whoever preserves the person, preserves Allah. Man is not blameable by his source, but by his action, and his action is not the same as him. We are discussing his action, and action belongs only to Allah, even though some actions are blamed and some are praised. The language of blame in respect to purpose which is reprehensible with Allah, and the only thing reprehensible is what is made to be so by the Shari'a. The Shari'a makes something reprehensible because of what Allah made known or which He made known through someone He has instructed. So Allah prescribed retaliation by necessity for the preservation of the human race and to prevent people exceeding the limits of Allah. Allah says, "There is life for you in retaliation, O you who possess intelligence (lit. cores)!" (3) (2:179) They are the people of the core who stumble onto the secret of divine laws and wisdoms.

Since you know that Allah preserves this organism and preserves its continuance, you should also preserve it since you have that happiness. While man is still alive, he hopes that he will obtain the attribute of perfection for which he was created. Whoever strives to destroy it, strives to prevent the acquisition of that for which he was created. How excellent is what the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Shall I tell you what is better and more excellent for you when you meet your enemies, smite their necks and they smite yours? Remembering Allah."

That is because the only one who knows the value of this human organism is the one who remembers Allah with the invocation (dhikr) demanded of him. (4) Allah sits with the one who remembers Him, (5) and the sinner is witnessed by the one doing the invocation. When the one doing the invocation does not witness Allah who sits with him, then he is not doing invocation. When Allah is mentioned, He flows in all parts of the slave, not just in his invocation with the tongue. Allah, at that moment, is only the Companion of the tongue in particular. The tongue sees Him, inasmuch as the man, (6) in respect of his sight does not see Him. (7)

Understand this secret in the invocation of those who are heedless! The heedless person who does invocation is present without a doubt, and the One mentioned sits with him and so he witnesses Him. In respect of his heedlessness, this person does not do invocation and Allah does not sit with the heedless. Man is many but with a single source. Allah is one source but has many Divine Names, just as man has many parts. What is required of the invocation of one part is not the invocation of another part. Allah sits with the part which is invoking Him, and the other part is described as heedless. There must be some part of man doing invocation, so Allah sits with that part, and He preserves the rest of the parts by His concern.

When Allah undertakes the destruction of this organism by what is called "death", that is not negation (i'dam) , but rather separation. He takes man to Him, and what is meant is only Allah's taking man to Him, "and to Him the whole affair will be returned." (11:123) When He takes him to Him, He fashions him a different composition than this composition. The new composition is from the genus of the abode to which he has moved, that is, the Abode of Going-on, because equilibrium exists. The creature thus will never die, i.e. his parts will never be separated.

As for the people of the Fire, they will return to bliss, but it will be in the Fire since after the end of the duration of punishment, it must become cold and peace according to the mercy which preceded it. This is their bliss. The bliss of the people of the Fire, after claims are settled, is the bliss of the friend of Allah, Ibrahim, when he was thrown into the Fire.⁸ He was punished by the sight of it since his knowledge told him that it is a form which causes pain to any living being which is near it. He did not know what Allah intended by it and from it in respect to him.

So after the existence of these pains, he will find cold and peace in spite of the fact that he still witnesses the phenomenal form which is fire in the eyes of the people. The single thing has various modes in the eyes of the onlookers. The divine tajalli is also like that. If you wish, you could say that the tajalli of Allah resembles this, and if you wish, you could say that the world is in the eye of the beholder which contains the parable of Allah in the tajalli, and so it takes on various modes in the eye of the onlooker according to the onlooker's disposition. The onlooker's disposition varies with the modalities of the tajalli. All of this is permissible in the realities.

Had a slain person or one who had died not returned to Allah when he died or was slain,

Allah would not have decreed their deaths nor prescribed their slaying. All is in His hand, and there is no loss in respect to Him. He prescribes slaying and decrees death by His knowledge that His slave will not pass from Him, for he returns to Him as Allah says, "and to Him the whole affair will be returned." So freedom of action occurs in it, and He is the One with freedom of action. Nothing is outside of Him of which He is not the source. Rather, His He-ness is the source of that thing, and He is the One who gives it its unveiling when He says, "and to Him the whole affair will be returned."

Know that this human organism in its perfection consists of spirit (ruh), body and self (nafs). Allah created it in His form. The disintegration of its structure is only undertaken by the One who created it either by His hand - and it is only that - or by His command. Whoever undertakes to do that without the command of Allah has wronged himself and exceeded the limits of Allah in it and rushed to the ruin of the one whom Allah has commanded to thrive. Know that compassion to the slaves of Allah is more proper through preservation than jealousy in Allah.

Da'ud, peace be upon him, wanted to build the Bayt al-Muqaddas, (1) and built it many times. Whenever he finished it, it was destroyed. He complained about that to Allah. Allah revealed to him, "This House of Mine will not be built by the hands of one who has shed blood." Da'ud said, "O Lord, was that not for Your sake?" Allah said, "Yes, but are they not My slaves?" Da'ud said, "O Lord, let it be built at the hands of someone who is from me!" Allah revealed to him, "Your son Sulayman will build it."

What is meant in this story is that the preservation and maintenance of this human organism is better than its destruction. Do you not see that Allah has prescribed jizya (2) and research of peace with those who had opposed the Din in order to spare them. He said, "If they incline to peace, you too incline to it, and put your trust in Allah." (8:61)

Do you not see that for the one who has responsibility for retaliation, accepting blood-money or pardoning is prescribed for the next-of-kin who is the responsible guardian? If he refuses to accept either, then the killer can be slain in retaliation. 19: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Unseen in the Word of Ayyub (Job)

Know that the secret of life flows in water, for it is the basis of the components and the basic elements. For this reason, Allah made every living thing of water. (1) There is nothing which is not alive, so there is nothing which does not proclaim His praise, but their extolling is only understood by divine unveiling. (2) Nothing extols unless it is alive. So the basis of everything is water. Do you not see how the Throne is on the water because it was formed from it? (3) It oppresses the water while the water underneath it maintains it. In the same way, Allah created man a slave. Then he was haughty towards his Lord and put himself above Him. In spite of this, Allah preserves him from underneath in respect of the height of this slave who is ignorant of himself. This is what the Prophet said, "If you let a rope fall, it would fall on Allah." So he indicated that "below" is related to Him as "above" is related to Him when He said, "They fear their Lord above them," (16:50) and "He is the Absolute Master over His slaves." (6:18; 6:61) So He has "above" and "below" For this reason, the six directions only appeared in respect of man, who is on the form of the All-Merciful.

There is no nourisher except Allah. He said of one group, "If they had implemented the Torah and the Gospel," using the indefinite and being general, "and what was sent down to them from their Lord," and this includes every judgement sent down on the tongue of a Messenger or someone inspired, "they would have been fed from above their heads," and He is the Nourisher in respect of the aboveness which is ascribed to Him, "and beneath their feet," (5:66) as He is the Nourisher in respect of the belowness which He ascribes to Himself on the tongue of His Messenger, who translates from Him. If the Throne had not been on the water, its existence would not have been maintained. The existence of the living sustains life. Do you not see that when the living dies the customary death, the parts of his structure disintegrate and his faculties are eliminated from that particular structure? Allah said to Ayyub, "Stamp your foot! Here is a cool bath," (38:42) meaning that since he had an excess of the heat of pain, He would alleviate it by the coolness of the water. For this reason, the medicine was decrease from excess and excess in decreasing. What is meant is the demand of balance, and the only way to it is by approaching it.

However, we said that there is no way achieve equilibrium because realities and witnessing constantly accord taking-form with every single breath. (4) Taking-form (takwin) only comes from an inclination which is called deviation or decomposition in nature. In Allah it is the will, and it is inclination to one particular goal rather than another. Equilibrium denotes sameness in all, but this does not occur. For this reason, we are deprived of the principle of equilibrium. Allah's description with pleasure and anger and the attributes is related in prophetic divine knowledge. Pleasure obliterates anger, and anger obliterates pleasure from the pleasing. Perfect equilibrium would mean that anger and pleasure are the same. The Wrathful would not be wrathful towards the one he is angry with, but would be pleased with him. He is described by one of the two principles in respect to him that is, inclination. And Allah would not be pleased with the one He is pleased with and would be angry with him, and so He is described by one of the two principles in respect to him - that is, inclination.

We said this, however, in respect of the one who thinks that Allah's wrath will continue against the people of the Fire forever, as he claims. So they do not have the principle of pleasure from Allah. What is meant is true. It is as we have said, so the hopes of the people of the Fire lies in the removal of pains. Even if they still dwell in the Fire, that is pleasure, so wrath is removed when the pains are removed since the source of pain is the source of wrath if you understand! Whoever is wrathful has suffered hurt. He only strives to avenge the object of his wrath by causing him suffering so that the wrathful might find relief by that. He transfers the pain which he has to the object of his wrath. If you separate Allah from the universe, then High indeed is He exalted above this attribute! If Allah is the He-ness of the universe, then all principles appear only in Him and from Him. It is His word, "to Him the entire affair will be returned" in reality and unveiling, "so worship Him and put your trust in Him" (11:123) in veil and covering. There is nothing in the realm of possibility more original than this universe because it is based on the form of the Merciful which Allah brought into existence - He manifested His existence by the existence of the universe as man manifests the existence of the natural form. We are His manifest form, and His He-ness is the spirit of this form which governs it. There is no management except in Him as it is only from Him. He is the First by meaning and the Last by form, and the Manifest by the changing of judgements and states, and the Inner by management. "He has knowledge of all things." "He witnesses everything" (5) so He knows by direct witnessing, not by thought. It is the same with the knowledge of tasting (dhawq) which does not derive from thought. Tasting is sound knowledge. Other things are only conjecture and surmise, and that is not knowledge at all.

Then Ayyub had that water to drink to remove the pain of thirst which was from the weariness and punishment with which shaytan (6) had touched him, (7) that is, distance from the realities which he perceived for what they were. Ayyub perceived them for what they were, and by his perception, he was in the place of nearness. Every witnessed one is close to the eye ('ayn=source), even if it is far away by the interval of distance. Vision reaches it, since it is witnessing. If it had not been for that, he would not witness it, nor would what is witnessed be reached by vision, however you want to put it. The witnessed is near between the sight and the seer. This is why Ayyub alluded to touch and ascribed it to Shaytan in spite of the nearness of touch. He said, "The one distant from me is near because of his power over me."

You know that distance and nearness are two relative matters, for they are two ascriptions. They have no existence in the source in spite of the fact that there judgements are established in the far and near. Know that the secret of Allah in Ayyub (whom He made an example for us in a written existing book which this Muhammadan community reads in order to learn what is in it, and they attach honor to the one who possesses it), is that Allah praised him for his patience in his supplication to remove affliction from him. We know that when the slave calls on Allah to remove affliction from him without that lessening his patience, then he is patient and the best of the slaves, as Allah said, "What an excellent slave! He truly turned to his Lord." (8) (38:44) This means he goes back to Allah, not back to the cause.

Allah affects by the cause because the slave depends on it since the causes which will remove any one matter are many, but the Causer is but one. It is more fitting that the slave return to the One Source in order to remove that pain by the cause of that than to the particular cause. It may be that it will not conform to Allah's knowledge in it, and then some will say, "Allah did not answer me." Yet he did not call on him, but he inclined to a particular cause which neither the time nor the moment requires. Ayyub acted by the wisdom of Allah since he was a Prophet. He knew that with one group, patience is what holds the self back from complaint. That is not our definition of patience (sabr). Its definition is to hold the self back from complaint to other-than-Allah, not to Allah. The first group is veiled in their view that the complainer is lessened in contentment (rida) with the decree by complaint. That is not the case.

Contentment with the decree is not lessened by complaint to Allah or to others, but contentment with the decreed is lessened. We are not speaking about contentment with the decreed. Affliction is what is decreed and not the same as the Decree. Ayyub knew that holding the self back from complaint to Allah for the removal of affliction is to oppose divine force. It is ignorance if, when Allah afflicts someone by what gives him pain, he does not call on Allah to remove that painful matter from him. The one who has realization must supplicate and ask Allah to remove that from him. For that gnostic who possesses unveiling, that removal comes from the presence of Allah. Allah describes Himself as "hurt", so He said, "those who hurt Allah and His Messenger." (33:57) What hurt is greater than that Allah test you with affliction in your heedlessness of Him or a divine station which you do not know so that you return to Him with your complaint so that He can remove it from you? Thus the need which is your reality will be proven. The hurt is removed from Allah by your asking Him to repel it from you, since you are His manifest form.

One of the gnostics was hungry and wept. Someone who had no tasting (dhawq) in that area censured him for that. The gnostic said, "But Allah makes me hungry so that I might weep. He tests me by affliction so that I might ask Him to remove it from me. This does not lessen my being patient." We know that patience is holding the self back from complaint to other-than-Allah.

By "other" I mean a particular aspect of Allah. Allah specified a particular one of Allah's aspects, and it is called the aspect of He-ness, so he calls on Him from that aspect to remove affliction from him, not from the other aspects called causes. They are only Him in respect to elaboration of the matter in itself. The gnostic's request does not veil him from the He-ness of Allah in removing affliction from him and the fact that all the causes are Him from a particular point of view. This path is only obliged on the people of adab among the slaves of Allah who are entrusted with the secrets of Allah. Allah has guardians whom only Allah recognizes, and some of them recognize each other. We have counselled you, so strive, and ask of Allah!

This is the wisdom of firstness in the names. Allah called him Yahya, i.e. the dhikr of Zakariyya was Yahya brought to life by him, and "a name We have given to no one else before." (19:7) He joined the attainment of the attribute, which is in the one who has passed on but left a son to revive his memory and his name through him. He called him "Yahya". His name Yahya is like knowledge by tasting. The memory of Adam, peace be upon him, was revived by Shith and that of Nuh by Sam. It is the same with the Prophets, peace be upon them; but Allah did not combine the name of knowledge from Him and the attribute for anyone before Yahya. It was an act of concern for Zakariyya from Allah, since Zakariyya said, "Give me an heir from You." (19:5) He mentioned Allah before the mention he mentioned his son, as Asiya (1) mentioned the neighbor before the abode when she said, "Build a house in the Garden for me in Your presence." (66:11) Allah was generous to Zakariyya, for He granted his need and named him by His attribute. Yahya's name was a remembrance for what His Prophet Zakariyya asked of Him; because he preferred the going-on of dhikr-Ullah after his death, since the son is the secret of his father.

He said, "to be my inheritor and the inheritor of the family of Ya'qub." (19:6) Nothing is inherited in respect of these except for the station of dhikr-Ullah and calling to Him. Then Allah gave him the good news of what He appointed for him from His words, "Peace be upon him the day he was born, and the day he dies, and the day he is raised up again alive." (19:15) He brought the attribute of life, which is his name, and He informed him of His peace upon him. His words are true. He completed it, even if it is the word of the spirit, "Peace be upon me the day I was born, the day I die, and the day I am raised up again alive," (19:33) and this is more sublime and more perfect in oneness and belief in the interpretation. That in which the order of nature (2) was broken in respect to 'Isa was articulation. His intellect was given mastery and perfected at that time when Allah made him speak. In any case, mastery of articulation is not necessary.

'Isa spoke the truth in what he articulated but this is different than the one who was testified to, as in the case of Yahya. (3) Allah's greeting on Yahya was higher than the greeting of 'Isa on himself in this way since the ambiguity occurring in divine concern was removed. The immediate circumstances indicate his proximity to Allah in that and his sincerity, since he spoke in the cradle the form which indicated the innocence of his mother. He was one of the two witnesses. The other witness was the shaking of the dried trunk of the palm tree. (4) Fresh, ripe dates came tumbling down without the male palm tree or pollination. In the same way, Maryam bore 'Isa without a man, that is, without normal and customary intercourse. If a Prophet had said, "My sign and my miracle is that this wall will speak," and then the wall speaks and says, "You have lied, you are not the Messenger of Allah," then the sign is proven and it is confirmed by it that he is the Messenger of Allah. One does not pay any attention to what the wall said.

He introduces this probability into the words of 'Isa when his mother pointed to him while he was in the cradle. Allah's greeting on Yahya is higher than this element. The passage which indicates that he is the slave of Allah is in respect of the claim made about him that he was the son of Allah. The indication is completed by sheer articulation. He is the slave of Allah according to another group who speak of Prophethood. It increases the principle of probability in logical thought until his truthfulness appeared in the future regarding all that he spoke about when he was in the cradle. So understand our allusion!

Notes to Chapter 20:

1. The wife of Pharaoh who was one of the perfect women.
2. Kharq al-'adat, miracle, literally, the breaking of the normal pattern of things.
3. 'Isa was a witness, not one who is the object of witness, since he testified on behalf of his mother.
4. See Qur'an 19:29.

21: The Seal of the Wisdom of Sovereignty (1) in the Word of Zakariyya (Zachariah)

Know that the mercy of Allah encompasses everything in existence and judgement, and the existence of wrath comes from the mercy of Allah by wrath. His mercy preceded His wrath, that is, the ascription of mercy to Him preceded the ascription of wrath. Then every source has an existence which demands that Allah's mercy encompass every source. For that reason, we say that the mercy of Allah encompasses all things in existence and principle.

The Divine Names are "things", but they derive from a single Source. The first thing that His mercy encompassed before time was its thingness, that source which gives existence to mercy by mercy. Thus the first thing that His mercy encompassed was itself, then the thingness indicated, then the thingness of every existent existing without end in this world and the Next, non-essential ('arad) and substance (jawhar), composite and simple. Neither the acquisition of a goal nor harmony of nature is taken into account rather, harmonious and inharmonious things are all encompassed by divine mercy in existence. We mentioned in The Makkan Revelations that effect only belongs to the non-existent, not the existent. If the existent had it, it is by the principle of the non-existent. It is a strange knowledge and a rare question. Only those who possess illusions (awhâm) know its realisation, and that is by their tasting (dhawq). (2)

The mercy of Allah pervades phenomenal beings, and circulates in essences and sources. The most ideal position of mercy is when it is known from witnessing with sublime thoughts. Everyone mercy designates is happy. There is only what mercy designates, and the mention of the mercy of things is the source of its bringing them into existence. Every existent thing has been shown mercy. O friend! Do not be veiled from the perception of what we have said by what you see of the troubles people experience and what you believe about the pains of the Next Abode which will not depart from the one whom they afflict.

First of all, know that mercy is in bringing-into-existence in general. In mercy by pains, only pains come into existence. So mercy has an effect in two ways - the first effect is by the essence, which is its bringing every existent source into existence. It does not regard desire or lack of it, suitability or lack of suitability. It looks at the source of every existent before its existence, or rather, it looks at its source-form. For this reason, it saw Allah-as-creature in creeds as a single source-form among the source-forms. Its mercy to itself is by bringing-into-existence. This is why we said that Allah-as-creature in creeds is the first thing shown mercy after its mercy to itself in its connection of bringing those shown mercy into existence.

It has another effect by request. Those who are veiled ask Allah to have mercy on them in their beliefs, and the people of unveiling ask for the mercy of Allah to settle on them. They ask for it by the name of Allah, and so they say, "O Allah! Have mercy on us!" and He only has mercy on them by carrying out mercy through them. It has authority because authority in reality belongs to the meaning based on place.

He is the Merciful in reality, so Allah is only merciful to His slaves, attentive to them by mercy. When mercy settles on them, they experience its authority through taste (dhawq). The one designated by mercy has had mercy known to him. The active participle is the Merciful (Rahîm) and the Mercy-Giver (Râhim), and this principle does not describe creatures because it is a matter of directing meanings to their essences.

States are neither existent nor non-existent they have no source in existence because they are relationships. They are not non-existent in principle because what knowledge establishes is called the "knower", and it is a state. The knower is an essence described by knowledge, but it is not the same as the essence nor is it the same as knowledge. There is only knowledge and the essence on which this knowledge is established. The being of the knower is a state of this essence when it is described by this meaning. The relationship of knowledge occurred to him, so he is called knowing. Mercy, properly speaking, is a relationship from the Mercy-giver, and it is necessarily part of the principle, so it is merciful. The One who brought it into existence in the one shown mercy did not bring it into existence in order to be shown mercy by it; He brought it into existence to show mercy to the one on whom it settled.

Allah is not in a place by events, so He is not in a place by bringing mercy into existence. He is the Mercy-Giver, and the Mercy-Giver is only Mercy-Giver by the establishment of mercy. He confirmed that He is the source of mercy. Whoever has not tasted this matter and has no part in it, does not dare to say that He is the source of mercy or the source of the attribute. Such a person says, "He is not the same as the attribute nor other than it." In his view, the attributes of Allah with Him are not Him, nor are they other-than-Him because he cannot deny them nor can he make them the same as Him. Thus he (3) moves to this interpretation, and it is a good interpretation. Yet there is another interpretation more appropriate to the matter than this one, and more likely to remove ambiguity. It is to deny the sources of the attributes any existence based on the essence of the one described. Rather, they are relationships and relative ascriptions between the one described by them and their intelligible sources. Although mercy is common to all of them, it is different in relationship to each Divine Name. (4)

For this reason, Allah is asked to show mercy by each Divine Name, so the mercy of Allah and its indirect reference, which is that which encompasses everything, has many branches according to the number of the Divine Names. It is not general in relation to that particular divine name in the statement of the one who asks, "O Lord, have mercy!" and other Divine Names, even the Avenger. So he says, "O Avenger, have mercy on me!" That is because these Names indicate the designated Essence and, by their realities, indicate different meanings. They call on Him by these Names in mercy with respect to their indication of the Essence called by that Name and no other not by what is indicated by that Name, separating it from another and distinguishing it. The Name is not distinguished from another, and with him it is the indication of the Essence. It is distinguished in itself from other-than-it by its essence, as it is generally agreed that, by any expression, this Name is a reality distinct in its essence from other-than-it.

The whole is set forth to indicate one designated source. There is no disagreement that each name has an authority which another does not have. That also must be taken into account, as one takes into account their indications of the named essence.

For this reason, Abu'l-Qasim ibn Qasi said regarding the Divine Names that each Name is, in its isolation, designated by all of the Divine Names since they preceded in mentioning its description by all the Names, that is, by their indication of one source. Although the Names based on it are many and their realities differ, i.e. the realities of these Names, the mercy is obtained by two means. The first is the path of obligation, and it is His word, "I shall prescribe it for those who are godfearing and pay zakat," (7:156) and He binds them by it through the attributes of knowledge and action. The other path by which mercy is obtained is the path of divine graciousness which is not connected to action. It is His words, "My mercy embraces all things." Of this, it is said, "So that Allah may forgive you your earlier errors and any later ones." (48:2) And of this, there are His words, "Do what you want, I have already forgiven you." (5) So know that!

Notes to Chapter 21:

1. Al-Mâlikiyya. His state was dominated by the name al-Mâlik, the Sovereign, who prevails in His orders. This strength was shown in his himma whose fruit was Yahya.
2. Because they connect the imagination (wahn) to things and bring them into existence and thus have experiential knowledge of this. As for the one on whom illusion has no effect, he is far from this question.
3. The Imam of Ahlu-s-Sunnah wa-l-Jama'ah, Shaykh Abu-l-Hasan al-Ash'ari.
4. There is a specific mercy of Allah, of al-Rahman, of ar-Rahim, of al-Malik, etc.
5. This refers to an incident involving Hatib ibn Abi Balta'a. When the Muslim army prepared to set out to conquer Makka, Hatib sent a letter to warn the Quraysh which was intercepted. 'Umar wanted kill him for intelligence with the nemy in war, but the Prophet said, "O 'Umar, perhaps Allah has looked with favor on those who already fought at Badr and said, 'Do whatever you want. I have already forgiven you.'"

22: The Seal of the Wisdom of Intimacy in the Word of Ilyas (Elijah)

Ilyas (Elijah) is none but Idris (Enoch), peace be upon him. He was a Prophet before Nuh, and Allah raised him to a high place. (1) He dwells in the heart of the spheres, the sphere of the sun. Then he was sent to the town of Baalbek (Ba'labakk). Baal is the name of an idol and "bakk" is the power of the village. The idol was called Baal and was singled out with domination. It was Ilyas who was Idris, who was given the example of the splitting of the mountain called "Lubnan (Lebanon)" which comes from lubana (desire, goal). What he needed was a horse of fire with all its trappings of fire. When he saw it, he rode it and appetite fell from him, and so there was intellect without appetite. There remained for him no connection with that which is connected to the desire of the self. For him, Allah was pure without connection. He had only half of gnosis of Allah. When the intellect is free of the self in respect to gathering knowledges by its discernment, its gnosis of Allah is based on disconnection (tanzih) not connection (tashbih).

When Allah gives gnosis by tajalli, then gnosis of Allah is perfected.
Disconnection is used in one place and connection in another place.

The gnostic sees the diffusion of Allah by existence in natural and elemental forms. There is no form but that he sees the source of Allah in its source. This is the complete perfect gnosis which is brought the roads (shara'i) revealed from Allah. By this recognition, all illusions (awham) have authority. For this reason, illusion has a stronger power in this human organism than the intellect, because the man of intellect even if his intellect reaches maturity is not free of the power which illusion has over him and over the formation of what he reasons. Illusion is the greatest power in this perfect human organism. The revealed roads brought it, and so you use both connection and disconnection. You use connection in disconnection by illusion, and disconnection in connection by the intellect. So the whole is connected to the whole. It is not possible that disconnection be free of connection nor connection from disconnection. Allah said, "Nothing is like Him," so He used connection and disconnection. "He is the All-Hearing, the All-Seeing," (2) and He used connection, and yet it is the greatest of ayat revealed on disconnection. Even so, it is not free of connection because of the Kayf (like).

So He has the most knowledge of Himself of those who know. He only designated Himself by what we mentioned. Then He said, "Glory be to your Lord, the Lord of Might, beyond anything they describe," (37:180) and they only describe according to what these realities accord them. He exalted Himself above their disconnection since they limit Him by that disconnection. That is due to the inability of the intellect to perceive the like of this.

Then all the roads (Shara'i) brought what the illusions dominate. They do not free Allah of an attribute in which He is manifest as they said. They brought that, and so communities acted on it. Allah granted them the tajalli. The heirs followed the Messengers closely, and said what the Messengers of Allah said. Allah knows best where He puts His message, and so Allah knows best who turns his face to Him in a particular aspect by transmission to the Messenger of Allah. One aspect of His begins with "He knows best where to place His message." (6:124) There is a reality in each of the two aspects for that reason, we speak of connection and disconnection, and disconnection and connection. After this (3) is established, we will lower the screens and drop the veils on the eye of the critic (4) and the one who simply follows a creed. Both of them are among the forms in which Allah gives tajalli, but He has commanded the veil for us in order that different levels of excellence of the predisposition of forms might appear. One is given a tajalli in a form according to the predisposition of that form. What its reality and exigencies accord him is ascribed to him. That must be. The example of the one who sees Allah when he is asleep and does not deny it is this. Without a doubt, it is Allah Himself. He attaches to it the exigencies of that form and its realities in which He gives the tajalli in sleep. Then after that, he interprets, i.e. he transfers it to another matter which disconnection logically demands. If the one who interprets it has unveiling and belief (iman), then he does not transfer it to disconnection at all. Rather, he gives it the disconnection that is due it and what is due to that which is manifest in it, i.e. its connection/resemblance. Properly speaking, "Allah" is an expression for the one who understands the indication (ishara). (5)

The spirit of this wisdom and its seal is that the command is divided into the effector and the one effected. These are two expressions. The effector in every aspect and in every state and in every presence is Allah. The effected by every aspect and in every state and in every presence is the universe, even if it is Allah who comes. (6) Allah is everything at its foundation which corresponds. That which appears is forever and ever a branch from the root; divine love is a branch from the supererogatory acts of the slave. So this is an effect between the effector and the effected. Allah is the hearing of the slave and his sight and faculties from this love. (7) This is an established effect which, if you believe, you cannot deny because it is confirmed by the Shari'a.

As for the person of sound intellect, he is either in possession of a divine tajalli in a natural locus of tajalli, (8) so he recognizes what we have said, or else he is a believing Muslim who believes in what was reported in sound tradition. The power of illusion must govern the man of intellect investigating what has been brought to him in this form because he believes in that form. As for the one who is not a believer, he judges illusion by illusion; and so he imagines by his logical discernment that he assigns to Allah what the tajalli gives him in dream. Illusion in that does not depart from him inasmuch as he is not aware because of his disregard for himself. From that is what Allah says, "Call on Me and I will answer You." (40:60) Allah also says, "If My slaves ask you concerning Me, I am near. I answer the call of the caller when he calls on Me," (2:186) since He only answers when there is someone who calls to Him. The source of the caller is the source of the answerer, but there is no disagreement about the difference of forms. They are two forms without a doubt.

All these forms are like Zayd's limbs. It is known that Zayd is one reality in personality, yet his hand is not the form of his foot nor his head nor his eye nor his eyebrow. He is one multiple - multiple by forms, one by source. That is like man who is one by source without a doubt. There is no doubt that 'Umar is not Zayd nor Khalid nor Ja'far, and that the individual persons of this one source are endless in existence. Even if man is one by source, he is many by forms and persons. If you are a believer, you know absolutely that Allah Himself will appear in a tajalli in a form on the Day of Rising. He will be recognized and then He will change form and be denied. (9) Then He will change from it again into another form and will not be recognized. He is the One giving tajalli and it is not other than Him in each form, even though it is known that this form is not that other form.

It is one source which has the same function as the mirror. When the viewer looks in it at the form of his belief in Allah, he recognizes Him, and so draws near Him. When it happens that he sees in it the belief of someone else, he denies Him since he sees his form and the form of someone else in the mirror. The mirror is but a single source while the forms are many in the eye of the viewer. There is no form in the mirror which comprises them all at once. Although the phenomenal being of the mirror has an effect on the forms from one aspect, it does not have an effect on the forms from another aspect. The effect which it has makes the form change shape in smallness, largeness, length, and width, so it has an effect in quantities. This is attributable to it, but this changing of it is by the difference of the size of the mirrors. In the example, look at one of these mirrors, and do not look at all of them. It is your perception in respect to His being essence, and so He is independent of the universe, and in respect to the divine names. In that moment He is like the mirrors. Whatever Divine Name in which you look at yourself or simply look at. He manifests the reality of that Name in whoever looks. The matter is thus. If you understand, do not be anxious, and do not fear. Allah loves bravery, even to the extent of killing a snake. The snake is not other than your self, and the snake is alive through its self in form and reality. The thing is not killed by itself, even if the form is destroyed in the senses, The definition determines it, and imagination does not make it depart.

Since the matter is based on this, this is the safeguard of the essences and might and invincibility. You cannot destroy the definition. What might is greater than this might? You imagine by illusion that you have killed. By intellect and illusion, the form does not vanish from existence in the definition. The proof of that is, "You did not throw when you threw, but Allah threw." (8:17) The eye only perceived the form of Muhammad which had the throwing confirmed to it in the senses. It is what Allah denied the throwing to at first, and then confirmed in the middle, only to return to the perception that Allah was the One who threw in the form of Muhammad. One must believe this. So look at this effector when Allah descended into a Muhammadan form. Allah Himself informs His slaves of that, and none of us said that of Him, rather He said it of Himself. His report is true, and it is obligatory to believe it whether or not you perceive the knowledge of what He said, being a knower or believing Muslim.

Part of what shows you the weakness of the intellect's discernment in respect to its thought, since the intellect passes judgement on cause ('illa), is that cause is not an effect of the one who is the cause. This is the judgement of the intellect which is evident. There is only this in the knowledge of tajalli, and it is that the cause is an effect to whoever is the cause. That which the intellect governs is sound when discernment is clarified. Its goal in that is that, when it sees the matter differently than what logical proof would accord it, it says that the source after it is confirmed that it is one in this multiple, and inasmuch as it is cause in one of these forms belonging to any effect is not an effect of its effect, so that its effect would become a cause to it. This is his goal when he sees the matter for what it was, although he does not continue in his logical discernment.

Since the command in causality is of this sort, your opinion by the scope of logical discernment is not in other than this narrow limit. None are more reasonable than the Messengers, may the blessings of Allah be upon them, and they brought what they brought in transmission from the Divine Presence. They confirmed what the intellect confirmed. Then they gave more in what the intellect alone does not possess by its perception and what the intellect does not imagine directly, but one draws near to it in the divine tajalli. When he is alone with himself after the tajalli, he is confused about what he saw. If he is the slave of a Lord, his intellect returns to him, and if he is the slave of reasoning, Allah gives him back judgement. This is only as long as he is veiled in the dimension of this world from his dimension in the Next World.

The gnostics appear here as if they possessed the form of this world by virtue of the fact that its principles operate on them. However, Allah has transformed them inwardly to the dimension of the Next World. That must be the case. They are unknown by form except to whomever has had his inner eye unveiled by Allah so that he perceives. (10) There is no gnostic of Allah in respect of divine tajalli who is not based on the dimension of the Next World. He has been gathered in this lower world of his and has been called from his grave. He sees what they do not see, and he witnesses what they do not witness - as a mark of concern from Allah to some of His slaves in that respect.

Whoever wishes to find this wisdom of Ilyas-Idris to whom Allah gave two formations, so that he was a Prophet before Nuh, and then he raised him up and brought him down after that as a Messenger and so Allah joined for him the two degrees, let him descend from the authority of his intellect to his appetite and be an absolute animal so that he will be shown what every creature that crawls is shown except for the jinn and men. Then he will know that he has realized his animality, and it has two tokens. One is this unveiling so he sees who is punished in his grave and who has bliss. He sees the dead alive and the silent speaking and the sitting walking. The second token is muteness since, had he wanted to utter what he had seen, he would be unable to do so. Thus he has realized his animality. We had a pupil who acquired this unveiling although dumbness did not take hold of him, and so he did not fully realize his animality. When Allah established me in this station, I realized my animality with a complete realization. So I was seeing and wishing to utter what I was witnessing but I could not. So there was no difference between me and the mute who cannot speak.

When he realizes what we have mentioned, he will move to being pure intellect in natural matter. He will witness matters which are the roots of what is manifested in natural forms. He will know from where this principle is manifest in the natural form with the knowledge of tasting. Had it been unveiled that nature is the source of the breath of the All-Merciful, he would have been given much good. If he is restricted in what we have mentioned, this power from the gnosis which governs his intellect will be enough for him. He keeps company with gnostics, and by that he knows tasting. "You did not kill them, it was Allah who killed them," (8:17) yet only iron, the blow and that which is behind this form killed them. In the whole, killing and throwing took place. So he witnesses matters by their roots and by their forms, and he is complete. When he witnesses the breath, he is completely perfect. The breath of the All-Merciful is the source of the overflowing of existence and life on all, rather the source of Allah's descent to all forms.

Notes to Chapter 22:

1. A place from which, according to Sidi Muhiddin, Idris (Enoch) descended in order to become Ilyas (Elijah). See Qur'an 19:57, "Mention Idris in the Book. He was a true man and a Prophet. We raised him up to a high place."
2. Qur'an 42:11.
3. The rule of joining tanzih and tashbih.
4. The one who uses logical proof.
5. i.e. what he recognises from the word "Allah" extends only so far as his predisposition and understanding.
6. In the wârid.
7. "When I love him, I am his hearing with he hears, his sight by which he sees, his hand with which he strikes, and his foot with which he walks".
8. i.e. the human form.

9. Hadith in Muslim: 1: 299, 302.

10. See Qur'an 50:22, "We have stripped you of your covering and today your sight is sharp."

23: The Seal of the Wisdom of Ihsan in the Word of Luqman

If Allah wishes, He wills provision for Him, so all of phenomenal being is His food.
If Allah wishes, He wills provision for us, so He is our food as He wishes.
His volition is His will, so say that He wished it.
So it is wished.
He wills increase and decrease.
So what He wishes is wished.
This is the distinction between them, (1) so understand!
From a certain point of view, their source is the same.

Allah says, "We gave Luqman wisdom," (31:12) and He says, "Whoever has been given wisdom has been given much good." (2:269) By the divine text, Luqman had much good as Allah has testified. The example of what Luqman said to his son is, "My son, even if something weighs as little as a mustard-seed, and it is inside a rock or anywhere else in the heavens or earth, Allah will bring it out." (31:16) This is a wisdom which is articulated, and that wisdom is his setting out that Allah is the One who brings forth. Allah confirmed that in His Book and did not refute what the speaker said.

As for the silent wisdom in it, and you know it by the circumstances, he is silent about the one to whom that grain is given. He did not mention him nor did he say to his son, "Allah will bring it to you or to other than you." He used bringing in general terms and denoted the thing brought in the heavens or in the earth as an instruction that the looker might regard His words, "He is Allah in the heavens and in the earth." (6:3) Luqman gave instruction by what he said and by what he remained silent on, so Allah is the source of every knowing thing because the known is more universal than the thing, so it denies unknown things.

Then he completed the wisdom and brought it to its full value in order that the structure might be complete in it. He said, "Allah is Latif (Subtle, Kind)." (31:16) Part of His subtleness (latâfa) and His kindness (lutf) is that He is in the thing named by such-and-such a definition in such-and-such a source of that thing, so it is only what its name indicates by convention and usage. It is said that these are names: heaven, earth, rock, tree, animal, angel, provision and food, and yet the source of everything is One. Thus the Ash'arites say about this that the entire universe is homogeneous in substance (jawhar), so it is one single substance.

It is the same as our statement that the source is One. They said that it varies by non-essentials. Thus our statement that it varies and becomes many through forms and relationships so as to provide distinction. It is said, "This is not that in respect to its form or its non-essential or natural disposition (mizâj)." Say whatever you like, but this is the same as that in respect to its substance. For this reason, the source of the substance is put in the definition of every form and disposition. However, we say that it is not other-than-Allah. The mutakallim thinks that it is called substance. Even though it is true, it is not the source of Allah of which the people of unveiling and tajalli speak. This is the wisdom of the "Latîf".

Then He is described when He says "the All-Aware (Khabir)," the One who knows by experience. It is His words, "We will test you until We know." (47:31) This is the knowledge of tastes. Allah put Himself with His knowledge of what the matter is in (our) profitable knowledge. No one can deny what Allah has written about Himself. Allah differentiated the knowledge of tasting and absolute knowledge. The knowledge of tasting is limited by the faculties. He said of Himself that He is the source of the faculties of His slave when He said, "I am his hearing," which is one of the faculties of the slave, "and his sight," which is one of the faculties of the slave, "and his tongue," which is one of the faculties of the slave, "and his foot and his hand." He did not restrict Himself to specifying the faculties, but He mentioned the members. The slave is not other than his members and faculties. The source called the slave is the Real, but the source of the slave is not the Compassionate Master.

Relationships are distinct by their essence. The one brought into relationship is not distinct. (2) Then He equalized His source in all relationships, for it is but one source with various ascriptions, relationships and attributes. Part of the completeness of Luqman's wisdom in instructing his son is what has come in the ayat of these two Divine Names, Latif and Khabir - Allah is called by them. If He had put that in phenomenal being (kawn) which is existence, and said, "He was (kana)," it would have been more complete in wisdom and more eloquent in admonition. Allah related the words of Luqman in meaning as he said it and did not add anything to it. His statement that Allah is the Latif, the Aware, is from the statement of Allah. Then Allah knew of Luqman that, had he said it (kana), it would have been utterly perfected by this.

As for his words, "If it should be but the weight of one grain of mustard-seed," it is for the one who has it as food. It is only the atom mentioned in His words, "Whoever does an atom's weight of good will see it, and whoever does an atom's weight of evil will see it." (99:7-8) A mustard-seed is the smallest thing consumed. If there had been anything smaller, Allah would have used it as He said, "He is not ashamed to make an example of a gnat." (2:26) Then since He knew that there is anything smaller than the gnat, He said "or of an even smaller thing," i.e. in smallness. This is the word of Allah, and that which is in the Sura of the Earthquake (az-Zalzal, 99) is also the word of Allah. So know that! That which is smaller than the gnat is the atom, and then there is another subtlety (latifa). That is that the atom, in spite of its smallness, is also lighter in weight because it is alive, since the living is lighter than the dead. So the meaning is that when the deed is the weight of an atom in smallness and lightness, the recompense must be seen. We know that Allah did not restrict Himself to the weight of the atom, and there is nothing smaller than it. He used it by way of intensification, and Allah knows best.

When Luqman used the diminutive for his son, (3) it was the diminutive of mercy and thereby he gave him a legacy which contains his happiness if he acts according to it. The wisdom of Luqman's legacy lies in his prohibition to his son, "Do not associate anything with Allah. Associating others with Him is a terrible wrong." (31:13) The one wronged establishes apportioning in respect to His description even though it is the same source. So he is only associating His source with Him, and this is the very greatest ignorance.

The reason for this is that the person who has no recognition of the matter nor of the reality of the thing, does not know that diversity is actually contained in a single source although forms vary in that single source. So such a person puts the form shared by another in that station, and so he makes every form a part of that station. It is known of the associate that the matter which indicates him through what occurs in him of partnership is not the source of the other with whom he is associated, since it is the other. In reality, there is no associate. Everyone is based on his portion whenever it is said about him that there is a partnership between the two in it. The reason for that joint association, if it is joint, is that the action of one of them eliminates the collective aspect. "Say: Call on Allah or call on the All-Merciful." (17:110) This is the very heart of the question.

Notes to Chapter 23:

1. The difference between volition (mashi'a) and will (irada).
2. In respect of its reality, the Essence is not distinguishable.
3. Bunayya, "little son".

24: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Imam in the Word of Harun (Aaron)

Know that the existence of Harun, peace be upon him, was from the presence of mercy (rahamut) by His words, "We endowed him with Our mercy, making his brother Harun a Prophet." (19:53) So his Prophethood was from the presence of the Rahamut. He was older than Musa, and Musa was greater than him in Prophethood. The Prophethood of Harun is from the presence of mercy (rahma) and, for that reason, he said to his brother Musa, peace be upon him, "O son of my mother!" (7:150) So he called to him by his mother, not by his father, since, in principle, mercy belongs in greater abundance to the mother than the father. Were it not for that mercy, the mother would not have the patience necessary for upbringing. Then he said, "do not seize me by the beard or by the hair," (20:94) and do not let my enemies gloat over me. All this is one of the breaths of mercy. The reason for that is the lack of ascertainment in looking at the tablets which had been given into his hands. If he had looked at them with ascertainment, he would have found guidance and mercy in them.

Musa would have found guidance, which is an elucidation of what happened in the matter which made him angry and of which Harun was innocent, and mercy towards his brother. He did not take him by the beard because of that state in which he saw his people because of his age, for Harun was older than him. That was compassion for Musa from Harun because the Prophethood of Harun is from the mercy of Allah. Only the like of that issued from him.

Then Harun said to Musa, "I was afraid that you would say: 'You have caused division in the Tribe of Israel'," (20:94) and you would make me the cause of their division since the worship of the Calf divided them. There were some of them who worshipped it following and imitating the Samiri, and there were some of them who refused to worship it until Musa returned to them so that they might question him regarding it. Harun was afraid that he would have that division between them attributed to him.

Musa knew the matter better than Harun because by his knowledge he knew the One the people of the Calf worshipped since Allah decreed that only He would be worshipped. When Allah decrees something, it must occur. Musa chided his brother Harun since the business consisted of disavowal and inadequacy. The gnostic is the one who sees Allah in everything, rather he sees Him as the source of everything. Musa was teaching Harun with the instruction of knowledge even though Musa was younger than him in age.

For that reason, when Harun said what he said, he turned to the Samiri and said to him, "What did you think you were doing, O Samiri," i.e. what were you doing in turning aside to the form of the Calf, and in your making this shape from the jewelry of the people so that you captured their hearts for the sake of their wealth? 'Isa used to say to the Tribe of Israel, "O Tribe of Israel! Every man turns to where his wealth is, so put your wealth in heaven, and then your hearts will be in heaven." Wealth is only called that (mâl) because by essence it inclines (yumîl) the hearts to worship. It is the greatest and most exalted goal in the hearts since they need it. Forms have no going-on, so the form of the Calf must vanish. If Musa had not hastened to burn it, jealousy would have overcome him. So he burned it and then scattered the ashes of that form in the sea. He told the Samiri, "Behold your god." He called it a god to alert him in order to teach him that he did know some of the places of divine tajalli, "I will surely burn it!"

The animality (hawayâniyya) of man has freedom of action over the animality of animals since Allah has subjected animals to man, especially in view of the fact that man's origin is not animal. Man has greater subjugation because that which is not-animal does not possess will. In fact, the non-animal is under the jurisdiction of whoever administers it without any recalcitrance whatsoever. The animal, on the other hand, has both will and instinct. Recalcitrance appears in some of its actions. If it has the power to manifest that, reluctance and resistance to what man wants appears from it. If it does not have that power or if what the man wants agrees with what the animal itself wants, then the animal obediently follows what is wanted of it.

Even so, man's "like" follows a command in whatever Allah has called him to in respect of the wealth which he hopes for from Him, which is designated in some states by "the other World" as when Allah says, "We have raised some of them above others in rank so that some of them are subservient to others." (43:32) His like is only subjugated to him by his animality, not by his humanness. The two likes are two opposites. The higher in degree subjugates the lower in degree by wealth or by rank with his humanness, and that other was subjected to him either by fear or greed from his animality, not from his humanness, so his like is not subjected to him.

Do you not see that what is among the beasts in the way of jostling against one another is because they are likes? Two likes are two opposites. That is why He said, "and He raised some of them above others in rank," so he is not with him in rank, and so subjugation occurs in respect of rank. Subjection is of two kinds. First, there is subjection intended by the subjector like the active conqueror when he subjects this subjected person - like the subjugation by the master of his slave although he is his like in humanness, and like the subjugation of the Sultan of his subjects who are his like in humanness, He subjugated them by rank.

The second sort is subjugation by the subjects of the king establishing their command that he drive harm away from them, protect them, do battle against those who attack them, and preserve their property and lives. All this is subjection through state by the subjects who subjugate their king in this act. In reality, it is called the subjection of rank. Rank has jurisdiction over him by this act. There are kings who work just for themselves, and there are those who recognize the matter and know that their subjects' subjugation of them is by rank. He knows their power and rights. Allah rewards him for that with the reward of those who know. The reward of the like of this is up to Allah, in Allah's being involved in the affairs of His slaves, for all the universe is subjected by state. Who is there who cannot be referred to as being "subjected"? Allah said, "Every day He is engaged in some affair." (55:29)

Lack of power was in fact the armour of Harun which saved him from the people of the Calf by mastery over the Calf as Musa had mastery over it. This is a wisdom from Allah which is manifest in existence that He should be worshipped in every form. When the form departed after that, it only departed after it had been clad with divinity by its worshipper. For this reason, there is no species but that it is worshipped, either by the worship of making divine or by the worship of subjugation. That must be so for the one who has intellect.

Nothing is worshipped in the universe except after it is clad in elevation for the worshipper and its rank is manifest in his heart. For that reason, Allah called Himself for us, "the Exalter of ranks," and He did not say the "Exalter of rank," for ranks are many in the same source. He decreed that we worship only Him in many ranks. Each rank accords a divine locus of tajalli which is worshipped in it, and the greatest locus of tajalli in which He is worshipped and the highest, is passion (hawa). As He said, "Have you seen him who takes his passion to be his god?" (45:23) It is the greatest idol. Nothing is worshipped except by it, and it is only worshipped by itself. Of it I say:

The truth of passion is that passion is the cause of passion.
If there had not been passion in the heart, passion would not have been worshipped.

Do you not see how perfect Allah's knowledge of things is? How it is completed in respect of the one who worships his passion and takes it as a god? He said, "he who Allah has misguided knowingly." (45:23) Being astray is bewilderment (hayra). That is when this worshipper sees that what he worships is only his passion, by following it in obedience to Him in what He commanded him of worship of whichever person worships Him, until his worship is for Allah the Great. That too is from passion because if passion had not occurred in him in that pure presence and it is the will to love he would neither have worshipped Allah nor preferred Him to others. In the same way, everyone worships a certain form among the forms of the universe, and takes it as a god, and he only takes it by passion. The worshipper is under the power of his passion. Then he sees that idols take on various forms among the worshippers. Each worshipper, for some reason, denies the one who worships another. What he has is a nearer perception which is confused by the unity (ittihâd) of passion, rather by the oneness (ahadiyya) of passion as He mentioned. It is the same source in every worshipper. Allah led him astray, i.e. confused him in respect to a knowledge that every worshipper only worships his own passion, and only seeks to worship his passion whether or not it agrees with the command of the Shari'a.

The complete gnostic is the one who sees that every idol is a locus of Allah's tajalli in which He is worshipped. For that reason, they are all called "god" in spite of having a particular name of a stone, tree, animal, man, star, or angel. This is the nature of the personality in it. Divinity is a rank which the worshipper imagines it to have, and it is the rank of his idol. In reality, it is a locus for the tajalli of Allah belonging to the sight of this particular worshipper devoted to this idol in this particular locus of tajalli.

This is why some of those who did not recognize an ignorant statement said, "We only worship them so that they may bring us nearer to Allah" (39:3) although they called them "god", as they said, "Has he turned all the gods into One God? That is truly astonishing." (38:5) They do not deny Him, rather they are amazed. They stop at the multiplicity of possible forms and the ascription of divinity to them. That is why the Messenger came and called them to one God who is recognized and not witnessed by their witnessing. They confuse Him with them and believe in Him when they say, "We only worship them so that they may bring us nearer to Allah" by their knowledge of those forms in stones. This is why the proof went against them when He said, "Say: Name them!" and they only named them by what they know those names to have in reality.

As for those who recognize the matter for what it is, they manifest the form of denying what is worshipped in the way of forms because their rank is in knowledge, and their rank is in accord with their being based on the principle of the moment, since they know that the moment is one of the mighty places of the tajalli of Allah in which He gives tajalli at each moment by some of His attributes. This is why time (ad-Dahr) is one of Allah's Names. The Prophet, peace be upon him, said, "Do not curse time, for time is Allah!" At every moment, people are overcome by the principle of the quality in which He gives tajalli at that particular moment. The Messenger who is sent in that moment is the greatest manifestation of the perfection of that quality. He calls creation to Allah, manifested by tajalli in him, by obedience to him, which is obedience to Allah, as Allah says, "Whoever obeys the Messenger has obeyed Allah." (4:80) This is why it is obligatory to trust in him and obey him.

However, the gnostics know that they do not worship the forms themselves. Rather, they worship Allah in them according to the power of the tajalli which they know of these forms. The one who denies and has no knowledge of what Allah has manifested in tajalli is ignorant of this. The complete gnostic veils himself from the Prophet and Messenger and their heirs. He commands himself to leave that form which the Messenger of the moment left in order to follow the Messenger desiring Allah's love for them by His words, "Say: if you love Allah, then follow me and Allah will love you." (3:31) He called on a God to whom one has recourse and Who is known in respect to the whole and is not witnessed, "nor do the eyes perceive Him, but He perceives the eyes" (6:103) by His lutf and His diffusion in the source of things. The eyes do not perceive Him as they do not perceive their spirits which govern their shapes and outward forms. "...He is the Latif, the All-Aware."

Experience is tasting, and tasting is tajalli. Tajalli occurs in forms. They must be and it must be, and the one who sees Him by his passion must worship Him, if you only knew! Allah possesses the goal of the path.

25: The Seal of the Wisdom of Sublimity in the Word of Musa (Moses)

The wisdom of the killing of the male children in respect to Musa was in order to give him the support of the life of each of those killed for his sake because each of them was killed for being Musa. There is no ignorance, so the life of the one killed for his sake had to return to Musa. It is pure life in the natural state (fitra). The desires of the self have not soiled it; rather, it is in its natural state of "Yes (bala)." (1) Musa was the sum of the lives of those killed for being him. All that was prepared for the murdered ones in the way of the predisposition of their spirits was in Musa, peace be upon him. This is a divine favour to Musa which no one before him had.

The wisdoms of Musa are numerous. If Allah wills, I will enumerate them in this chapter according to what the divine command puts into my mind. This is the first about which I shall speak in this chapter.

Musa was only born being a synthesis of many spirits. He was a concentration of effective forces since the young have an effect on the old. Do you not see how the child has an effect on the older person by the special quality the child has? The older person descends from his leading position to play with the child and rock him in his arms and to show himself at the child's level of intellect he descends to the level of the child's intellect. He is under subjugation even though he is not aware of it. He occupies himself with instructing and protecting the child, seeing to his needs and consoling him so that the child is not distressed.

All this is part of the effect of the young on the old. That is due to the strength of his station. The young has a new covenant with his Lord because he has newly come into being. The old person is further from Him. Whoever is nearer to Allah subjects whoever is further away from Him, just as the elite of the near angels subject the further ones. The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, used to expose himself to the rain when it came down and to uncover his head so that it would fall on him. He said that it has a new covenant with Allah. Look at this recognition of Allah on the part of this Prophet! What is more glorious, more sublime and clearer than this? The rain subjected the best of men due to its proximity to its Lord. That is a likeness of the Messenger on whom the revelation descends. The rain called him by its own state, (2) and so he exposed himself to the rain in order to receive from it what it brought from his Lord. If he had not received this divine benefit from it by the rain, he would not have exposed himself to it. This is the message of water from which Allah has fashioned every living thing (3) - so understand! As for the wisdom of Musa being put into the ark and then cast into the river, the ark (tâbût) is his human nature (nâsût). The river is what he received of knowledge through his body by what the power of discernment and the sensory imaginative faculties accorded him. Only by the existence of this elemental body does the human self have these faculties or their like. When the self comes to this body and is commanded to freely dispose of it and manage it, Allah gives it these faculties as instruments by which it obtains what Allah wills that it obtain in the management of this ark which contains the sakina (4) of the Lord. Musa was cast into the river in order to receive various knowledges by these faculties. Thus Allah taught him that the spirit which manages him is the ruler. He is only managed by it. It gives him the command of these faculties of phenomenal being which are in this nâsût that is designated by the ark in the field of indications and wisdoms.

Allah manages the universe in the same way, and it is only managed by it or by its form. It is only managed by Him inasmuch as the arrival of the one begotten depends upon its being brought into existence by the begetter. Caused things depend on their causes, proven things depend on their proofs, and true things depend on their realities. All of this is part of the universe, and it is Allah's management of it, and he only manages by it.

As for our statement, "or by its form," I mean the form of the universe, and by it I mean the Most Beautiful Names and sublime attributes by which Allah is named and described. Nothing of a name by which He is called has reached us but that we found the meaning and spirit of that name in the universe. The universe is also only managed by the form of the universe.

For that reason, the Prophet said in respect of the creation of Adam who is the blueprint which gathers all the attributes of the Divine Presence which is the essence, the attributes and the actions: "Allah created Adam in His form." His form is only the Divine Presence. In this noble epitome, which is the Perfect Man, He brought into existence all the Divine Names and the realities of that which is outside of him in the Macrocosm separate from him. He made Adam a spirit (rûh) for the universe, and so He subjected to him the high and the low through the perfection of his form. As there is nothing in the universe that "does not glorify Allah's praise," (5) in the same way, there is nothing in the world which is not subject to this man according to what the reality of his form accords him. Allah says, "He has made everything that is in the heavens and the earth subservient to you. It is all from Him." (22:65) All that is in the universe is subject to man. He who knows that from his knowledge is the Perfect Man. He who is ignorant of that is the Animal Man.

The form of casting Musa into the ark and then casting the ark into the river is outwardly a form of destruction. Inwardly, it was his rescue from being killed. He was brought to life as the self is brought to life by knowledge from the death of ignorance as Allah says, "Is someone who was dead (i.e. by ignorance) and whom We brought to life (with knowledge) and supplied with a light by which to walk among the people (which is guidance) the same as someone who is in utter darkness (in being astray) unable to emerge from it (i.e. will never be guided)?" (6) In itself the matter has no end at which it stops.

Guidance is that man is guided to bewilderment (hayra). He knows that the business is bewilderment. Bewilderment is being unsettled and movement. Movement is life. There is no non-movement nor death. There is existence and not non-existence. It is the same with the water which gives life to the earth. Its movement is His word, "so it quivers" and conceives, "and swells" with pregnancy, "and sprouts plants in beautiful pairs." (7) It only gives birth to what resembles it, i.e. has a nature like it. It has being linked in pairs (zawjiya) which is the state of being doubled by what is born from it and what appears from it.

Similarly, the existence of Allah has multiplicity and the many Names. It is this or that according to what appears from it of the universe which demands the realities of the Divine Names by its development. They are doubled by it and stand in opposition to the unity of multiplicity. It is one by source in respect to its essence, as the primal substance (hayûla) is a single source in respect to its essence, while it has many forms which it supports by its essence. It is the same with Allah through the forms of tajalli which are manifested from Him. So the locii of the tajalli are the forms of the universe, in spite of the intelligible unity (ahadiyya). Look at the excellence of this divine instruction which Allah gives by granting its recognition to whoever He wishes among His slaves.

When the family of Pharaoh found him in the river by the tree, Pharaoh called him Musa. Mu is water in Coptic and sha is tree. He named him by where he found him, for the ark stopped by the tree in the river. Pharaoh wanted to kill him. His wife, speaking by divine articulation in what she said to Pharaoh about Musa since Allah had created her for perfection as Allah said about her when He testified that she and Maryam, daughter of 'Imran, have the perfection which men have (8) - said, "he may be a source of delight for me and for you." (28:9) She would be consoled by him with the perfection which she received as we have said.

The consolation of Pharaoh was with the belief Allah gave him when he was drowning. So Allah took him pure and purified. There was no impurity in him since He took him in his belief before he had acquired any wrong actions. Islam effaces what was before it. He made him a sign of His concern so that none might despair of the mercy of Allah, for "no one despairs of solace from Allah except for the unbelievers." (12:87) If Pharaoh been of those who despair, he would not have embarked on belief. Musa, peace be upon him, was, as the wife of Pharaoh said, "a source of delight for me and for you. Do not kill him. It may well be that he will be of use to us." That is what happened. Allah gave them use of Musa, although they were not aware that he was a prophet who would destroy the kingdom of Pharaoh and his family.

When Allah protected him from Pharaoh, his mother's heart was freed of the anxiety which had befallen her. Then Allah forbade him to be suckled until he had received his mother's breast, so she suckled him that Allah might complete her joy. The knowledge of the roads (sharâ'i) is like that. It is as Allah said, "to each We have made a road," (5:48) i.e. a path (tariq), "and a direction (minhaj)" from that path. This statement is an indication of the root from which he came (minhuja). It is his food as the tree has branches and yet is only nourished by its root. What is haram in one Shari'a can be halal in another Shari'a - I mean in a certain form it can be halal, while in the heart of the matter it is not really the same as what passed because the matter is new creation, not repetition. This is what we instruct you! It is referred to in connection with Musa when the wet-nurses were made haram.

In reality, the one who suckled him, not the one who bore him, is his mother. The mother of birth carried him in regard to the trust. He is formed within her and fed by her menstrual blood without any volition on her part in that, so that does not come from her benevolence towards him. He is only fed by what would destroy her or make her ill had he not been nourished on it, or had that blood not gone out of her. The embryo is a gift to its mother since it feeds on what would cause her harm had that blood remained with her and not gone out of her, or had not the embryo been nourished on it.

Suckling is not the same. By her suckling, she intends to give him life and to sustain him. Allah gave that to Musa in the mother who bore him. No woman outside of his mother by birth had any right over him that she also might find consolation in bringing him up and watching him grow in her room, and so she was not sad.

Allah saved him from the grief of the ark, so he pierced natural darkness by what Allah gave him of divine knowledge, while he did not depart from nature. He tested him with many trials (9) and gave him experience in many places so that he might realize patience in himself in the trials Allah gave him.

The first of Allah's trials was the killing of the Copt which Allah inspired him to do and gave him success in his secret yet he did not know this. However, Musa did not feel any anxiety over killing him, although he was unsure until the command of his Lord told him, since the Prophet is inwardly protected without being aware of it until he is informed, until transmission comes to him. For this reason, al-Khidr showed him the killing of the boy, (10) so Musa criticized the killing but did not remember how he had killed the Copt. Al-Khidr told him, "I did not do it of my own volition," (18:82) and he informed him of his rank before he told him that his movement was protected in reality, but he was not aware of it.

Al-Khidr also showed him the piercing of the ship. Outwardly it was destruction, but inwardly it was rescue from the hand of the tyrant. He made that an analogy of the ark which was in the river its outward aspect was destruction, while inwardly it was rescue, for his mother did it fearing the hand of the tyrant, who was Pharaoh, that he might not kill Musa in captivity. She looked at him with the revelation Allah had inspired in her while she was not aware of it. She felt in herself that she would suckle him. When she feared for him, she cast him into the river because, as the proverb says, "What the eye does not see does not afflict the heart." She did not fear for him with the fear of the witnessing of the eye, and she was not sad with the sorrow of seeing him. It came over her thoughts that perhaps Allah would return him to her, for she had a good opinion of Him. She lived by this thought in herself and by the hope which was opposite fear and despair. When she was inspired to do this, she said, "Perhaps he is the Messenger who will destroy Pharaoh and the Copts." She lived and took joy in this, which was illusion and thought in respect of herself, but, in the heart of the matter, it is knowledge.

When they searched for Musa (after he had killed the Copt), he left in flight, fearful outwardly and in the meaning, it was love of deliverance for movement is always by love, but the onlooker is veiled from it by other causes, which are not the movement. This is because the root is the movement of the universe from non-existence which was immobile in existence. That is why it is said that the matter is movement from immobility. The movement which is the existence of the universe is the movement of love. The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, quoting Allah, "I was a hidden treasure, therefore I wanted (lit. loved) to be known." (11)

If it had not been for this love, the universe would not have appeared in its source. Its movement from non-existence to existence is the movement of the love of the One who brings into existence for this purpose. The universe also loves to witness itself in existence as it was witnessed in immutability. Thus by every aspect, the movement from immutable non-existence to the existence of the sources is a movement of love, both in respect of Allah and in respect to itself.

Perfection is loved for itself. Allah's knowledge of Himself is His, since He is independent of the worlds. It belongs only to Him. The perfection of the rank of knowledge only remains by the in-time knowledge which comes from these sources. When the sources of the universe exist, then the forms of perfection appear with timeless and in-time knowledge. Thus the rank of knowledge is perfected by two aspects.

In the same way, the ranks of existence are perfected. Existence from it is before-time and not before-time, which is in-time. Pre-temporal (azali) time is the existence of Allah by Himself, and non-pre-temporal-time is the existence of Allah by the forms of the immutable universe. It is called in-time because it manifests some parts to others. He is manifest to Himself by the forms of the universe, and so existence is perfected.

The movement of the universe is by love of perfection, so understand! Do you not see how what the Divine Names bring into existence is breathed from the absence of the manifestation of their effects in a entity called the universe? It loves rest (12) which is only reached by the existence of form, high and low. Thus it is confirmed that movement occurs by love. The only movement in the entire cosmos is by love.

Among the 'ulama' are those who know that and those who are veiled by the nearer cause because it rules their state (hâl) and overpowers them. Musa was aware of his fear by what occurred through his killing the Copt. That fear implied love of deliverance from killing. So he fled by fear. In the meaning, he fled when he loved deliverance from Pharaoh and his deeds. He mentioned the nearest cause which he was aware of at that moment, which is like the form of the body of man, and love of deliverance is contained in it as the body contains the spirit which manages it.

The Prophets had the language of the outward with which they addressed people in general and on which they relied to make the one who listened understand what was said. The Messengers make allowances for people in general by their knowledge of the rank of the people of understanding. It is as the Prophet, peace be upon him, said about gifts, "I give to this man, while another man is more beloved to me than him for I fear that Allah might throw him down into the Fire." He made allowances for those whose intellect and discernment are weak and who are overcome by greed and nature.

Similarly, what they brought of knowledges, they brought wearing a robe (13) which nearer to the understanding, so that the one who has no "diving" might stop at the robe and say, "How excellent this robe is!" and he will see it as the limit of rank. Because of what this robe from the king demands, the one with subtle understanding, the one who dives for the pearls of wisdom, looks at the quality of the robe and its type of material. By it, he knows the degree of the one it covers, and so he stumbles onto a knowledge which no one else has obtained from those without knowledge of such matters.

Then the Prophets and Messengers and heirs knew that in this world and in their communities, there are those who, in this manner, express themselves in the outward language which the elite and common share. The one who is elite understands of it what the common understand, and more, inasmuch as it is valid that he be called elite. He is distinguished from the blind. Those who have obtained knowledges are content with this. This is the wisdom of his words, "I fled from you when I was in fear of you," (14) but he did not say, "I fled from you by love of safety and well-being."

Musa came to Madyan and found two women and got water for them without being paid for it. Then he turned away to the divine shade and said, "O my Lord, I am truly in need of any good You have in store for me." (28:24) He made the source of his getting water the same as the good which Allah sent down to him, and he described himself as being in need of Allah in the good which he had. Al-Khidr showed him the setting-up of the wall without wage, but Musa chided him for it. So al-Khidr reminded him of his drawing water without wage, and other things which were not mentioned. The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, wished that Musa had remained silent and had not left him so that Allah would have related more about them.

Al-Khidr alerted Musa to the fact that what had come to him and would come to him was by the command of Allah and His will which it is impossible to contradict. Knowledge of that is one of the prerogatives of wilaya. As for the Messenger, He might not acquaint him with it, for it is the secret of the decree.(15) If He had acquainted him with that, it might have been a reason for his lassitude in conveying what he was commanded to convey. Allah withholds the knowledge of this from some of the Messengers as a mercy to them from Him. He did not withhold it from our Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, because of the strength of his state. This is why our Prophet said, "I call on Allah by inner sight." (75:14)

By this he knew what Musa had succeeded in had been without knowledge on his part. If it had been from knowledge, Musa would not have criticized what al-Khidr did, since Allah had testified before Musa as to al-Khidr's purity and justice. In spite of this, Musa was heedless of the fact that Allah had made him pure, and of the conditions set down for following him. This was a mercy for us if we forget the command of Allah. If Musa had known that, al-Khidr would not have said to him, "What you have never encompassed in your knowledge," meaning I have a knowledge which you have not received by tasting as you have a knowledge which I do not know. He was just.

As for the wisdom of his parting from him, it is because Allah said of the Messenger, "Take what the Messenger brings you, and avoid what he prohibits you." (59:7) The 'ulama' of Allah who recognize this quality of the Message and the Messenger stop at this statement. Al-Khidr knew that Musa was the Messenger of Allah. He regarded what came from him to preserve the adab which is due to the Messengers. Musa said to him, "If I ask you about anything after this, then you should no longer keep me company." So he forbade al-Khidr to keep his company. When that occurred for the third time, al-Khidr therefore said, "This is where you and I part company," Musa did not tell him, "Do not do it," nor did he seek to keep him company for he knew the level of the rank he was in when he spoke of the prohibition against keeping him company. Musa was silent, and the parting took place.

Look at the perfection of these two men in knowledge and the completion of divine adab as right, and the justice of al-Khidr, peace be upon him, in what he acknowledged to Musa when he said, "I have a knowledge which Allah has taught me which you do not know, and you have a knowledge which Allah has taught me which you do not know." This information which al-Khidr imparted to Musa was a remedy for the wound inflicted on him in his words, "How indeed could you bear with patience something you have not encompassed in your knowledge?" (18:68) although he knew the sublimity of his rank with the message, and al-Khidr did not have this rank.

This appeared in the community of Muhammad in the hadith regarding the fertilization of the date tree. The Prophet, peace be upon him, told his Companions, "You know more about the matters of your daily life."¹⁶ There is no doubt that the knowledge of the thing is better than ignorance of it. Allah praises Himself, saying, "He has knowledge of all things." The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, acknowledged to his Companions that they knew more about the exigencies of this world than him because he had no experience of them. It is knowledge of tasting (dhawq) and experience, and the Prophet, peace be upon him, had not occupied himself with this sort of knowledge. Rather, he was occupied with what was more important. I have informed you about a great adab by which will benefit you if you occupy yourself with it.

Musa's statement, "My Lord gave me right judgement," (26:21) means the khilafah, "and made me one of the Messengers," means the message. Not every Messenger is a Khalif. The Khalif has a sword, duties and governance. The Messenger is not the same rather, he transmits what he has been sent to transmit. If he does battle and defends with the sword, then he is both Khalif and Messenger.

As for the wisdom of Pharaoh's question regarding divine whatness (mâhiya) when he said, "What is the Lord of the worlds?" (26:23) that question did not arise from ignorance, but it was posed in order to test Musa and to see what answer he would give when he claimed that he had a message from his Lord. Pharaoh knew the rank of the Messengers in knowledge of Allah and he wanted to test Musa's answer to ascertain the validity of his claim. In order to inform those present, he invited an answer which would have been misleading as far as they were concerned since they did not know what Pharaoh himself knew about the question. Musa answered him with the answer of those who have knowledge of the matter. Then Pharaoh, in order to preserve his position, asserted that Musa had not answered his question. So because of the inadequacy of their understanding, it seemed clear to those who were present that Pharaoh knew more than Musa. For this reason, when Musa answered him with what was not appropriate and outwardly it is not an answer to what he was asked about and Pharaoh knew that he would only give that answer, Pharaoh then said to his companions, "Your Messenger" who was sent to you "is mad" since the knowledge of what I question him about is veiled from him (17) since it is inconceivable that it be known at all.

The question is valid. The question of the what-ness is a question about the reality of what is asked about - it must be real in itself. As for those who make definitions which consist of category and genus, these are matters shared by various things. Whoever has no category must have a reality in Himself which belongs to no other. The question is invalid in the school of the People of Allah, sound knowledge and sound intellect. The only answer to it is the answer Musa gave.

Here is a great secret! He mentioned the "act" in giving the answer to the one who asked for a definition of essence. He made the essential definition the source of the attribution to what appeared of Him in the forms of the universe, or what appeared in Him of the forms of the universe. In answer to, "What is the Lord of the worlds?" he said that He is the One in whom the forms of the universe are manifest on high which is the heaven - and below - which is the earth, "if you but have certainty," (18) or He who is manifest by them.

When Pharaoh told his companions that Musa was mad, (majnûn) in the sense that he was possessed, Musa added to the elucidation in order to inform Pharaoh of his rank in divine knowledge because he knew that Pharaoh already knew that. Musa said, "The Lord of the East and the West," bringing what was manifest and what was hidden, in the outward and the inward, "and what between them is" which is Allah's words, "He has knowledge of everything," "if you have intellect," (19) i.e. if you possess qualification since this comes from intellect.

The first answer is for those who are certain, and they are the people of unveiling and existence. Musa said, "If you have certainty," i.e. if you are the people of unveiling and existence. I have given you knowledge of what you are already certain about in your witnessing and existence. If you are not of this category, I have answered you in the second answer: if you are among the people of intellect and qualification, and you limit Allah according to what the proofs of your intellects accord.

Thus Musa manifested both aspects in order to inform Pharaoh about his question and his veracity. Musa knew that Pharaoh knew that because he asked about the what-ness of Allah.

He knew that his question was not couched in the language the ancients used in their questioning by means of what. That is why he answered him. If he had known anything else from him, he would have been mistaken in the question. Musa treated that about which he was asked as the source of the universe, and Pharaoh addressed him by this language (20) although the people present were not aware of that.

Pharaoh said to him, "If you take any god other than me, I will certainly make you one of the imprisoned." (26:29) The letter sin in prison (sijn) is one of the letters of increase, (21) meaning I will veil you, for you answered by what supported me so that I might say the same to you. If you say to me, "O Pharaoh! I do not I do not recognize your threat to me while the source is but one, so how can you separate?" Then Pharaoh replied, "The ranks are separate, but the source is not separate and it is not divided in its existence. My rank right now is power over you by actual fact, O Musa! I am you by the source and other than you by rank!"

When Musa understood that from him, he gave him his due in respect to himself and told him, "You will not be able to do that." Pharaoh's rank gave him power and influence over Musa because Allah is in the rank of Pharaoh in respect of the outward form which has authority over the rank in which Musa appeared in that assembly.

Therefore Musa told him that Allah had manifested a barrier to his hostility against Musa. He said, "Even if I were to bring you something undeniable?" Pharaoh could only reply, "Produce it then, if you are someone telling the truth" so that Pharaoh would not appear to be unjust among those of his nation who were weak-minded. They had doubts about him, and they were the group Pharaoh made unsteady. However, they obeyed Pharaoh because they were a corrupt people; (22) that is, lacking sound intellects' rejection of taking Pharaoh's claims literally. The intellect stops at a certain limit, and only those of unveiling and certainty can cross that limit. This is why in his answer, Musa first addressed those of certainty and then address those of the intellect.

"So he drew down his staff ('asa)" (26:32) which is the form with which Pharaoh defied (23) ('asa) Musa when he refused to answer his call. "And there it was, unmistakably a snake," i.e. an evident snake. Thus rebellion, which is evil, changed into obedience, which is good, as Allah says, "Allah will transform their evil deeds into good deeds," (25:70) meaning in judgement. Here the judgement manifested a differentiated source in a single substance (jawhar) so it is a staff, a snake, and a manifest serpent. It devoured its likes among the snakes in the form of a snake, and the staffs in the form of a staff. The proof of Musa overcame the proofs of Pharaoh in the form of staffs, snakes and ropes. The sorcerers had ropes, but Musa did not have a rope. The "rope" is the small hill; (24) that is, their powers in relation to the power of Musa is as the hills are to the lofty mountains.

When the sorcerers saw that, they recognized Musa's rank in knowledge and they saw that he possessed a power which was not mortal. If it had been within the power of a mortal, it would only belong to someone who could distinguish sure knowledge from imagination and illusion. So they believed in "the Lord of the Worlds, the Lord of Musa and Harun" - that is, the Lord to whom Musa and Harun summoned them because they knew that the people understood that they were not being called to Pharaoh. Pharaoh was in the position of authority, and he was the master of the moment since he was the Khalif with the sword, even though he broke the customary divine laws when he said, "I am your Lord most high" - i.e. since all are lords, (25) I am the highest of them through the power which you have outwardly given me over you. The sorcerers knew that he spoke the truth in what he said, and they did not deny it. They affirmed that to Pharaoh, and said, "You only judge in this passing life, so judge as you like, for the kingdom is yours." So the statement of Pharaoh, "I am your Lord most high," was valid. Although the source is from Allah, the form is Pharaoh's. He cut off the hands and feet, and crucified through a real source in false form in order to attain the ranks which are only attained by that act.

There is no way to neutralize causes because the source-forms necessitate them. They only appear in existence by the form on which they are based at the source since "there is no changing the words of Allah." (10:64) The words of Allah are not other than the sources of existent things. Timelessness is ascribed to Him in respect to their permanence, and in-time ness is ascribed to them in respect of their existence and appearance. Thus we say, a certain man or guest happened (26) to be with us today." That does not mean that he did not have any existence before this event. For that reason, Allah says about His Mighty Word which is timeless, "No reminder (dhikr) from their Lord comes to them lately renewed (27) without their listening to it as if it were a game," (21:2) and "but no fresh (28) reminder reaches them from the All- Merciful, without their turning away from it." (26:5) The Merciful only brings mercy, and whoever turns away from mercy advances the punishment which is the absence of mercy.

As for the words of Allah, "but their belief when they saw Our violent force was of no use to them. That is the pattern Allah has always followed with His slaves," (29) (40:85) that did not mean that it did not profit them in the Next World through His exception, "except for the people of Yunus." He meant that that did not prevent them being punished in this world. For that reason, Pharaoh was seized in spite of the existence of his belief even though his affair was that of someone who is certain that his death is approaching. The circumstances accord that he was not certain that he was going to die because he saw the believers walking on the dry path which had appeared when Musa struck the sea with his staff. Pharaoh was not certain that he would perish since he believed that he would not die until the moment actually reached him. He believed in the One in whom the Tribe of Israel believed, in certainty of his deliverance.

It was indeed certain, but it was in a form other than the one he wanted. He was saved from the punishment of the Next World in himself and his body was saved as Allah says, "Today We will save your body that you might be a sign for those after you," (10:92) because, if his form had vanished, his people might have said that he had gone into occultation. His known form appeared as a corpse that it might be known that it was really him. Deliverance was encompassed both in the senses and in the meaning.

The one who has the word of the punishment in the Other World realized for him (30) will not believe, even if every ayat had been brought to him, "so that they might see the painful punishment," that is, taste the punishment of the Next World. Pharaoh left this class of people. This is the literal meaning of what the text of the Qur'an brought us. We say, and the matter belongs to Allah, that the fixed idea which the common people have regarding the wretchedness of Pharaoh is not based on anything in the divine text. As for his family, that is another judgement. This is not the place to mention it.

Know that Allah only takes someone while he believes that is, affirms what divine transmissions bring, and I mean those who are consciousness at death. This is why dislikes sudden death and being killed while unaware is disliked. The definition of sudden death is that the incoming breath goes out and the outcoming breath does not come in. This is sudden death and when that happens, one is not conscious of death.

It is the same if a man is killed unawares by a blow from behind on the back of the neck. He is then taken with whatever belief or disbelief he possesses at that moment. For that reason, the Prophet said, "One will be gathered in the state in which one dies," as one is taken in whatever one is doing at the time. The one who is conscious of death is only the one who sees it coming. He believes what he sees. He is only taken in what he is doing because that is an existent expression connected to time by the circumstances. We distinguish between the unbeliever who is conscious at death and the unbeliever either killed while unaware or who dies suddenly as we have said in the definition of sudden death.

As for the wisdom of tajalli and the discourse on the form of the fire, this was because it was the object of Musa's desire. Allah gave him a tajalli in what he was searching for so that Musa would turn to Him and not turn away. If Allah had given the tajalli in other than the form which he was seeking, Musa would have turned away because his interest was concentrated on a particular goal. If he had turned away, his action would have rebounded on him, and Allah would have turned away from him. Musa was the chosen one and the one brought near. When Allah brings someone near to Him, He gives him a tajalli in the object he desires, without him knowing it.

which he saw as what he needed.
It was Allah,
but he did not perceive it.

26: The Seal of the Wisdom of What One Turns to (as-Samad) in the Word of Khalid

As for the wisdom of Khalid ibn Sinan, (1) by his call he manifested the Prophethood of the interspace. He claimed that he would tell them about what happens after death. He commanded that he should be disinterred and questioned in order that he might report that the judgement in the Interspace occurs in the form of the life of this world. Thus it would be known that all the Messengers spoke the truth in what they related in this life regarding what happens after death. Khalid's goal was that all the world would believe in what the Messengers brought so that there would be mercy for all. He was honored by his Prophethood being near the time of the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. He knew that Allah had sent Muhammad as a mercy to the worlds, but Khalid was not a Messenger. He wanted to receive a generous share of this mercy contained in the message of Muhammad. He was not commanded to convey the message, but he wanted to have that share in the Interspace so that there would be stronger knowledge about the creation, and for this reason his people squandered him.

The Messenger of Allah described them as having squandered their Prophet because they did not do what he wanted them to do. Did Allah give him the reward for what he wanted? There is no doubt and no disagreement that he had the reward of what he wished, but there is doubt and disagreement about the reward of the goal. Is wishing for it the same in the Next World as its occurrence even though it did not occur or not? In the Shari'a, equality is not supported in many places such as in the case of the one who performs the prayer in the group. (2) The one who prays it in the group has a reward from the presence of the group. He is like the person who, in spite of poverty, desires to be able to give charity as the people of wealth and property do. He has the like of their rewards, but the like of their rewards can be in their intentions or their deeds. The people had both the intention and the action. The Prophet, peace be upon him, did not prescribe both of them, nor one of them, and outwardly they are not the same. For that reason, Khalid ibn Sinan sought the proclamation to confirm for him the station of joining both matters so that he would receive two rewards. Allah knows best.

Notes to Chapter 26:

1. Al-Qashani, the commentator, says that Khalid lived in Aden, and was a man of great himma who was overcome in the contemplation of divine unity. One day a great fire appeared from a cave among his people. It destroyed the crops and the livestock, and the people called on him to protect them from it. He struck the fire with his staff, saying, "Away! Away!" until it became cold and retreated to the cave. Then he told his people that he would enter the cave in order to extinguish the fire, and he told them to call him after three full days had passed. Should he call him before that, he would come out and die. If they were patient, he would emerge in good health.

They waited two days, and then Shaytan made them restless, and doubts came to them and they were afraid that he might have been destroyed. They shouted to him. He emerged from the cave with his hand on his head from the pain their shouting had caused him. He told them, "You have killed me and squandered my word and my covenant." He then told them of his death and commanded them to bury him and then watch for forty days. Then, he said, a flock of sheep led by a donkey with slit ears and its tail cut off would come to them. When it stood opposite his grave, they were to disinter him and he would rise and tell them of the true state of things after death from witnessing and vision so that all creation would receive certainty as to what the Messenger related. Then he died and they buried him.

They waited until the forty days had passed. The flock of sheep came led by a donkey with slit ears. It stopped opposite his grave, so they understood that they should disinter Khalid as he had commanded them so that he might inform them as to the truth of the Prophets. Some of his older sons were adverse to that and said that it would shame them among the Arabs and that they would be called, "the sons of the disinterred one." There was the vehemence of the Jahiliya in that. They squandered their legacy and destroyed him. After the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, was sent, a daughter of Khalid came to him, and he said to her, "Greetings to you, O daughter of a Prophet whose people squandered him!"

2. His Prophethood did not appear in this world.

27: The Seal of the Unique Wisdom in the Word of Muhammad

Muhammad's wisdom is uniqueness (fardiya) because he is the most perfect existent creature of this human species. For this reason, the command began with him and was sealed with him. He was a Prophet while Adam was between water and clay, (1) and his elemental structure is the Seal of the Prophets. The first singular is three, and what is more than this firstness of individuals comes from three. The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, is the surest proof of his Lord, so he was given all the words, (2) which are everything that is named by the names of Adam. (3) He resembles the proof in its threefoldness, and the proof is a proof of itself. Then his reality grants the first uniqueness which is threefold in structure. For that reason, speaking about the domain of love which is the root of existence, he said, "I was made to love three things in your world," (4) because of what this world has of threefoldness. Then he mentioned women, and perfume, and that the coolness of his eye was in the prayer.

The Prophet began by mentioning women and ended with the prayer. That is because woman is part of man in the root of the manifestation of her source, and because man's recognition of himself preceded his recognition of his Lord. That is why the Prophet, peace be upon him, said, "Whoever knows himself knows his Lord." If you wish, you can say that this tradition is the forbidding of gnosis and stating the inability to attain to Him - and that is a permissible statement; and, if you wish, you can say that it is the affirmation of gnosis. The first is that if you do not know yourself, so you will not know your Lord. The second is that you recognize yourself, so you do recognize your Lord. Muhammad was the clearest proof of his Lord. Every part of the world indicates its root which is its Lord, so understand!

The Prophet was made to love women, so he yearned for them because as the whole yearns for what is part of it. The matter is self-evident through what Allah says regarding this elemental human constitution, "and I breathed My Ruh into him." (15:29; 38:72) Then He described Himself with intensity of yearning to meet those who yearn for Him. He said, "O Dawud! I have intense yearning for them," i.e. those who yearn for Him, and it is a particular encounter. The Prophet said in a hadith about the Dajjal, "None of you will see his Lord until after he dies." (5) Allah must yearn for those near ones - because even though He sees them and wants them to see Him, that encounter is still prevented by man's station. That is like His words "until We know" although He is Knowing. He yearns for this particular attribute which only is achieved existence through death.

By this, He tests their yearning for Him as He said in the hadith of hesitation which concerns this matter, "I do not hesitate in anything I do, but I hesitate to take the breath of My believing slave because he hates death, and I hate to make him die. But He must meet Me." He gave him good news and did not say to him, "he must die" because He did not want to distress him by mentioning death. Man only meets Allah after death as the Prophet says, "None of you will see his Lord until he dies." That is why Allah says, "He must meet Me," for Allah desires the existence of this relationship. He made it clear that He breathed into him some of His spirit (rûh) so He only yearns for him. Do you not see that He created him on His form because he is from His Spirit?

Man's constitution is based on these four elements which are called the "humors" in his body. The combustion of the moisture found in the body occurs from his breath. The spirit of man is fire as regards his constitution. For this reason, Allah only spoke to Musa in the form of fire, (6) and put his need in it. If his constitution had been from nature, (7) then his spirit would have been light. Allah alluded to it with the blowing (nafkh) which indicates that it is from the breath (nafas) of the All-Merciful. It is by this breath, which is the blowing-out that he manifested from Him, and by the predisposition of the one blown into, that combustion is fire and not light. The breath of Allah is hidden in that by which man is man.

From man, He derived a person in his form called "woman". She appeared in his form, and he yearned for her with the longing of that thing has for itself, and she yearned for him with the longing of that thing has for its home. Allah made him love women. Allah loves the one whom He created in His form, and He made the luminous angels, in spite of the power of their might and their station and the sublimity of their natural constitution, prostrate to him. (8) From this comes the affinity which occurs in the form which man and woman share, which is like that between Allah and man. The form has the greatest affinity, as well as the most glorious and perfect. It makes a pair that is, doubles the existent belonging to Allah, as the woman, by her existence, doubles man, and makes him one of a pair. So three appeared: Allah, man and woman. Man yearns for his Lord who is the origin as woman yearns for man.

His Lord made him love women as Allah loves the one who is in His form. Love only occurred by the One by whom he is formed. His love was for the One he was formed by, and He is Allah. This is why the Prophet said, "He made me love...", and he did not say, "I loved" as coming from himself because his love is connected to his Lord in Whose form he is. In his love for his wife, he loves her by Allah's love for him as a divine nature. (9)

When a man loves a woman, he desires union, that is, the goal of union which exists in love. In the elemental form, there is no greater union than marriage. (10) By this appetite encompasses all parts. For that reason, complete ritual washing is prescribed after intercourse. Purification envelops him as annihilation in the woman was complete in the obtainment of appetite. Allah is very jealous of His slave if He believes that he finds pleasure in other than Him. So man purifies himself by ritual washing in order to return to Him in whom he was annihilated, since that is all there is.

When man witnesses Allah in women, his witnessing is in the passive; when he witnesses Him in himself, regarding the appearance of woman from Him, he witnesses Him in the active. When he witnesses Him from himself without the presence of any form from him, his witnessing is in the passive directly from Allah without any intermediary. So his witnessing of Allah in the woman is the most complete and perfect because he witnesses Allah inasmuch as He is both active and passive. Regarding himself, He is passive in particular. For this reason, the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, loved women because of the perfection of the witnessing of Allah in them since one does not ever witness Allah free of matter. Allah by His essence is independent of the worlds. So from this aspect, the business is impossible, yet witnessing only occurs in matter. The witnessing of Allah in women is the greatest and most perfect witnessing. The greatest union is marriage.

It is like the projection of His will on the one He created in His form in order to create him. He sees His form in him, rather, He sees Himself. He fashioned him and balanced him and breathed into him of His spirit (rûh) which is His breath. Outwardly he is creation, and inwardly he is Allah. For this reason, Allah describes Himself with having management of this frame. He "directs the whole affair from the heaven," which is the height of the earth, "to earth," (32:5) which is the lowest of the low, because it is the lowest of all the elements.

He called them women (an-nisâ') which is a plural which does not have a singular form. For that reason, he said, "He made me love three things in your world: women..." and he did not say, "woman". He took note of the fact that they came after him in existence. The word an-nisa' also means postponement. Allah says, "The month postponed is an increase in disbelief," (9:37) and the sale of "nasi'a" is said to be by postponement, that is, by credit. That is why he said an-nisa'. He loved them only by rank, and they are the place of the passive. They are to him as nature is to Allah in which Allah opened the forms of the world by the projection of the will and the divine command which is marriage in the world of elemental forms, and aspiration (himma) in the world of luminous spirits, as in the order of premises and their meanings through deduction. All of that is the marriage of the first uniqueness in each of these aspects. Whoever loves women in this measure, loves with a divine love. Whoever loves them in respect to natural appetite in particular, deprives himself of the knowledge of this appetite. For him it is a form without a spirit (rûh). That form in the heart of the matter is the essence of a spirit, but it is not witnessed by the one who comes to his wife or any woman by pure gratification, and he does not perceive the one it is for even so, he has no knowledge of himself, as others have no knowledge of him, since he has not been verbally named so that he could be known.

One of them said:

It is confirmed with people that I am a passionate lover, although they do not know the object of my passion.

It is the same with the one who loves gratification - he loves the place in which it occurs, being the woman, but the spirit of the question is obscure to him. If he had known it, he would have known by whom he has pleasure and who it is that has pleasure. He would have been perfect.

Similarly, the woman has a lower degree than the man by the words of Allah, "As for men, they have a degree over them." (2:228) The one created on the form is lower in degree than the one who is fashioned in His form, (11) even though he is in His form. This is the degree by which He is distinguished from the form. So Allah is independent of the universe, and He is the first Doer. The form is the second doer, and does not have the firstness which Allah has. Sources are distinguished by ranks. "He gives each thing its creation," (12) as every gnostic gives each thing with a right its due.

That love that Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, had for women came from divine love. "Allah gives everything its creation," and that is the source of its truth. He only gave creation to it by merit, so it merits what He called it that is, by the essence of the created thing.

He put women first because they are the place of the passive as nature precedes that which exists from it by means of form. Nature in reality is only the breath of the Merciful. The forms of the universe, high and low, are introduced into it by the diffusion of the breath (nafkha) in the primal substance (jawhar hayulânî), particularly in the world of bodies. As for its diffusion by the existence of the luminous spirits and non-essentials (a'râd), that is another kind of diffusion.

In this tradition, the Prophet put the feminine before the masculine because he meant to attach importance to women. He said, "Three (thalath, the feminine form of the number) and he did not say thalatha (the masculine) with the ha' which is by the number of the masculine since scent (tīb) is one of the three, and it is masculine. The custom among the Arabs is that the masculine takes precedence over the feminine. When they say, "The Fatimas and Zayd went out," they saw kharajû (mas. pl) and do not say kharajna (fem. pl). The masculine, even if it is only one, take precedence over the feminine, even if they are a group. The Prophet was Arab, so he respected the meaning which was intended by showing love for what did not happen through his own love. Then Allah informed him of what he did not know, and Allah's bounty to him was great. (13) The feminine took precedence over the masculine by his word, thalath without ha'. Who knew the realities better than him, may Allah bless him and grant him peace? Who had greater care to observe rights and dues?

Then he placed the seal with what was like the first since it is also feminine (salat, prayer, is feminine), and he placed the masculine between them, as in existence. He began with "women" and ended with "prayer", both of which are feminine while perfume is masculine. The man is between the essence from which he appeared and then the woman appeared from him. So man is between two feminines, the form of the Essence (14) from which he appeared, and a real feminine, woman, who appeared from him. Similarly, women is a real feminine, and the prayer is not a real feminine. Scent is the masculine between the two, as Adam is between the essence from which he has existence and Hawwa' (Eve), who existed from him. If you wish, you can say "attribute (sifa)" which is also feminine. If you wish, you can say, "power (qudra)" and it is feminine. Be of whatever school you wish. You will always find that the feminine takes precedence, even among the people of cause ('illa) who make Allah a cause in the existence of the form, and cause is also feminine.

As for the wisdom of the perfume which he mentioned after women, because women have fragrance in their form, the most fragrant of perfumes is the embrace of the lover as they say in the common example. When the Prophet was created a slave, by the nobility of his origin, he did not lift his head at all to mastery rather, he continued to prostrate himself in humility and to remain passive in spite of who he was until Allah formed from Him what He had intended. He gave him the rank of action in the world of breaths, and the breaths are fragrant scents. So Allah made him love perfume. For that reason, he put perfume after women.

He observed the ranks which belong to Allah in His words, "Raiser of ranks is He, Possessor of the throne" (40:15) by His sitting on it by the name of the All-Merciful. There is none among those that the Throne encompasses but that divine mercy touches him. That is the words of Allah, "My mercy embraces all things," (7:156) and the Throne encompasses everything, and the One who sits on it is the Merciful. By its reality, mercy is diffused through the universe as we explained in another part in this book and in The Makkan Revelations.

Allah put perfume in this marital connection in the innocence of 'A'isha, (15) may Allah be pleased with her! He said, "Corrupt (16) men are for corrupt men, and corrupt men are for corrupt women; and good (17) women are for good men, and good men are for good women. The latter are innocent of what they say." (24:26) He made their scent fragrant because the word is breath, and it is the source of the scent. It goes out with fragrance and putrefaction according to what appears in the form of speech. As it is divine by the nobility of its origin, it is all good, and so it is good. As for what is not praised and is censured, it is good and bad. The Prophet said in respect to the badness of garlic, "It is a plant whose scent I dislike." He did not say, "I dislike it." The source is not disliked, but he disliked what appeared from it.

Dislike for that is either by custom or unsuitability of nature, by something in the Shari'a, or a lack of perfection or something other than what we have mentioned.

Since the command is divided into corrupt and good as we confirmed, he was made to love perfume rather than repulsive odours. He described the angels as being offended by unpleasant odours. He described the angels as being offended by unpleasant odours. Since there is putrefaction in this elemental structure as it is created of "dry clay from mud moulded (or fetid)," (18) so the angels dislike it by essence. The nature of the dung-beetle is offended by the scent of the rose which is one of the pleasant scents. For the dung-beetle, the scent of the rose is not a pleasant scent. If someone has the same sort of nature (as the dung beetle) in meaning and form, the truth offends him when he hears it, and he is gladdened by the false. It is what Allah said, "those who believe in falsehood and reject Allah." (29:52) He described them with loss, and said, "those, they are the losers" who have lost themselves. Whoever does not distinguish goodness from corruption, has no perception.

Allah made the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, love only the good (the perfume) of everything, and there is only that. Can it be conceived that there is a disposition in the universe which only finds good in everything but does not recognize the bad? We say that there is not. We find it in the very root from which the universe appeared which is Allah; we find that He hates and loves. The corrupt is only that which He hates, and the good is only that which He loves. The universe is the form of Allah, and man is in both forms. There is no nature which only perceives one matter in everything - rather, the nature distinguishes the good from the corrupt in spite of the fact that it knows that it is corrupt by tasting and good without tasting. The perception of the good in it diverts him from the sensation of its corruptness. This can happen. As for the removal of the corrupt from the universe that is, from phenomenal being it is not admissible. The mercy of Allah extends to both the corrupt and the good. The corrupt considers itself good, but the good in itself is corrupt. There is nothing but good but that an aspect of its disposition is bad, and vice versa.

As for the third by which uniqueness (fardiyya) is completed, it is the prayer. The Prophet said, "and the coolness of the eye (19) is in the prayer" because it is contemplation. That is because it is intimate discourse between Allah and His slave as Allah says, "Remember Me, and I will remember you." (2:152) It is worship ('ibâda) which is divided in two parts between Allah and His slave one part belongs to Allah and one part to His slave, as has come in sound transmission from Allah in which He says, "I divided the prayer into two parts between Me and My slave. One part is Mine and one part is My slave's, and My slave will receive what he asks for. The slave says, 'In the name of Allah, the All-Merciful, the Most Merciful,' and Allah says, 'My slave has mentioned Me.' Then the slave says, 'Praise belongs to Allah, the Lord of the Worlds,' and Allah says, 'My slave has praised Me.' The slave says, 'The All-Merciful, the Most Merciful,' and Allah says, 'My slave has glorified Me. My slave has given Me authorisation.'" (20) All this part belongs purely to Allah.

"Then the slave says, 'You alone we worship. You alone we ask for help,' and Allah says, 'This is between Me and My slave, and My slave has what he asks for.'" Sharing occurs in this ayat. "The slave then says, 'Guide us in the straight path, the path of those You have blessed, not of those with anger on them nor of the misguided,' and Allah says, 'This is for My slave, and My slave has what he asks for.'" This is purely for His slave as the first part is purely for Allah. The knowledge of this makes the recitation of the Fatiha obligatory. Whoever does not recite it has not prayed the prayer establish between Allah and His slave.

The prayer is then a secret conversation (munajat). It is remembrance/invocation (dhikr). When someone mentions Allah, he sits with Allah and Allah sits with him. It is a sound divine transmission that Allah said, "I sit with the one who mentions Me." (21) Whoever sits with the One he mentions and has sight, sees the One with whom he sits. This is contemplation (mushahada) and vision. If he does not have sight, he does not see Him. Thus the one who prays knows his rank, and whether or not he sees Allah with this vision in the prayer. If he does not see Him, then let him worship Him by belief (iman) as if he saw Him, imagining Him to be in the qibla of his conversation, and let him listen for Allah's reply.

Without a doubt, everyone who prays is an Imam, so the angels pray behind the slave when he prays alone, as is related in tradition. If he is the Imam for his particular world and the angels pray with him, then he has attained the rank of the Messenger in his prayer which is deputyship from Allah. When he says, "Allah hears whoever praises Him," (22) he informs himself and whoever is behind him that Allah has heard him. The angels and those present say, "Our Lord, praise belongs to You."

Allah says on the tongue of the slave, "Allah hears whoever praises Him." Look at the sublimity of the rank of the prayer and where it takes the one who has it! Whoever does not achieve the rank of vision in the prayer has not reached the goal nor does he have the coolness of the eye in it because he does not see the One he addresses. If he does not hear the answer of Allah, he is not one of those who listen. Whoever is not present in the prayer with his Lord, and does not hear nor see Him, is not one who prays at all, and he is not along those "who listen well, having seen the evidence." (30:37)

The prayer is the only form of 'ibada during which one is forbidden to perform any other action. The mention of Allah in it is greater than the words and actions it contains. We mentioned the attribute of the perfect man in the prayer in The Makkan Revelations and his nature, because Allah says that "the prayer precludes indecency and wrongdoing" (29:45) since it is set down in the Shari'a that the one performing the prayer cannot act in anything except this 'ibâda as long as he is in it, and he is called the one the prays (musalli). "The remembrance of Allah is greater still" (29:45) in it that is, the mention which is from Allah to His slave when He answers him in his request, and his praise of Him is greater than the mention of the slave of his Lord in it, because greatness belongs to Allah. (23) This is why He says, "Allah knows what you do," and He says, "He who listen well, having seen the evidence" he gives ear to what Allah mentions in the prayer.

Therefore, since existence is from an intelligible movement which transported the universe from non-existence to existence, the prayer encompasses all movements. There are three movements: vertical, which is the state of standing in the prayer, the horizontal, which is the state of bowing, and the downward movement, which is the state of prostration. The movement of man is vertical, the movement of the animal is horizontal, and the movement of plants is downward. The inanimate does not have a movement from its essence. If a rock moves, it moves by other means than itself.

As for the words of the Prophet, "The coolness of my eye is in the prayer," he did not ascribe the action of putting it there to himself, so Allah gives the one who prays a tajalli which stems from Him, not from the one who prays. If he had not mentioned this attribute from himself, he would have commanded the prayer without tajalli from Him to him. Since that is from Him by means of graciousness, the contemplation is also through graciousness. He said, "the coolness of my eye is in the prayer," and it is only contemplation of the Beloved by which the eye of the lover is delighted by continuance. The eye remains seeing Allah. It does not look with Him to other than Him in anything, and for that reason, it is forbidden to turn away in the prayer. The glance is something which Shaytan steals from the prayer of the slave in order to forbid him the contemplation of the Beloved. (24) If Allah had truly been the Beloved of the one who turns aside, he would not have turned aside in his prayer to another qibla. Man knows his state in himself, whether he is like that in this particular act of worship or not. "Man will be clear proof against himself in spite of any excuses he might offer." (75:14) He recognizes his lie apart from his truth in himself, because man is not ignorant of his state, his state has tasting (dhawq) for him.

The prayer has another portion. Allah commanded us to pray to Him, and He told us that He prays for us. The prayer is from us and from Him. When He prays, He prays by His name, the Last, for it comes after the existence of the slave, and it is the source of Allah which the slave created in his qibla by logical discernment or by imitation. He is the God of the one who has a creed. It varies according to what the place of the tajalli has and according to the established predisposition as al-Junayd said when he was asked about recognition of Allah and the gnostic. He said, "The color of water is the color of its vessel." It is a masterly answer giving information about the matter for what it is. This is Allah who prays for us. If we pray, we have the name, the Last, so we are in it, as we mentioned, in the state of the One who has this name we are with Him according to our state. He only regards us by the form which we bring to Him.

The one who prays is behind the one who precedes him in the place. It is His words, "Each one knows its prayer and its glorification " (24:41) that is, its rank in being behind the worship of its Lord and the extolling which his predisposition accords him of disconnection (tanzih). "There is nothing which does not glorify Him with praise" of its Lord, the Forbearing, the Forgiving. For that, we do not understand the extolling of the universe distinctly, (25) creature by creature.

Then a rank refers the pronoun to the extolling slave in His words, "There is nothing which does not glorify Him with praise," that is, the praise of that thing. The pronoun which is in His word, "His praise (bi-hamdihi)" refers to the thing - that is, with the praise that is from it.

As we said of the one who has a creed other than Islam, he praises the God who is in his creed and attaches himself to Him. What is from his work returns to him, so he only praises himself. It is from the praise of fabrication the artisan is praised without a doubt, and so the excellence of what he creates or its lack of excellence returns to the artisan. The god of a creed is the product of the one who looks at it, and it is his fabrication; his praise for what he believes is his praise for himself. For this reason, he condemns the creed of another if he had been fair, he would not have done that. Indeed, the possessor of this particular object of worship is certainly ignorant in his rejection of other than what he believes about Allah, since had he recognized what al-Junayd said, "The color of water is the color of its vessel," he would have conceded to everyone who has a creed what he believed in, and he would have recognized Allah in every form of worship of every person with a creed, He has opinion but does not know it. For that reason, Allah says, "I am in My slave's opinion of Me," (26) that is, I only appear to him in the form of his creed. If he wishes, he generalizes, and if he wishes, he limits. The god of creeds is taken from definition, so He is the God which the heart of His slave encompasses. (27)

the source of Himself. It is not said of the thing that it encompasses itself, not that it does not encompass itself, so understand! "Allah speaks the truth and He guides to the Way." (33:4)

A KUBRAWĪ TREATISE ON MYSTICAL VISIONS: THE RISĀLA-YI NŪRIYYA OF 'ALĀ' AD-DAWLA AS-SIMNĀNĪ

The practice of dhikr is a central component of Sufi life and instruction. The word is normally translated as "recollection" or "remembrance," referring to the systematic repetition of God's name or of one of His attributes. At heart, this constitutes a meditational exercise, the goal of which is to rid the mystic of preoccupation with the self and other worldly concerns, thereby devoting him or herself completely to the contemplation of God. Various Sufi orders have prescribed the content and method of dhikr for their adherents, and the differences between them are so distinct as to constitute one of the primary distinguishing characteristics of these orders.¹

Although the content of these dhikr exercises is accessible in guide-books and compendia written by Sufi shaykhs as well as in a number of secondary works, very little information is available describing the experiences a mystic undergoes while practicing dhikr. The Risāla-yi nūriyya of 'Alā' Ad-Dawla As-Simnānī (d. 736/1336) constitutes one of the few treatises providing such information.

Simnānī was a prominent figure in the Kubrawī Sufi order. In its formative period, the Kubrawiyya appears to have been a loose conglomeration of individuals who derived their mystical affiliation from a visionary Sufi named Najm Ad-Dīn al-Kubrā (d. 618/1221). Their influence on Sufi thought and practice has been far reaching, and many subsequent orders in Iran, Central Asia, and India derive their mystical affiliation directly from these Kubrawī masters.²

² There is very little by way of doctrine, ritual or belief that identifies these early figures as belonging to one order. Despite the fact that Kubrā was himself a Sunni, two prominent Kubrawī shaykhs, Sa'd Ad-Dīn Ḥamūya (d. 650/1252) and his son Šadr Ad-Dīn (d. 722/1322), were Shī'īs. Kubrawī mystics are found on both sides of the debate over the doctrine of "Oneness of Being" (waḥdat al-wujūd), one of the main issues dividing Sufis in their day. Furthermore, they appear to have had no shared stance regarding involvement in politics: Najm Ad-Dīn al-Kubrā allegedly met his death fighting the Mongols; Simnānī's teacher, Nūr Ad-Dīn al-Isfarā'īnī (d. 717/1317) maintained contact with the Ilkhanid court, while Simnānī himself was deeply involved in the intrigues of various princes and was respected by the Ilkhanid rulers. Wjāyātū Khudābanda (r. 703/1304-716/1316) and Abū Sa'īd (r. 716/1316-736/1335). For a survey of Kubrawī history, see the introduction to Najm Ad-Dīn Dāya ar-Rāzī, The Path of God's Bondsmen from Origin to Return, tr. Hamid Algar (Delmar: Caravan, 1982); also Marijan Molé, "Les Kubrawiyya entre sunnisme et shiisme aux huitième et neuvième siècles de l'Hégire," Revue des Études Islamiques 29 (1961), 61-142.

One of the distinguishing features of the Kubrawī order in its formative period is the emphasis placed upon visionary experiences. Colors and visions encountered in meditation are seen not only as markers signifying progress along the mystical path, but also as symptoms of psychic and spiritual troubles ailing the individual. As such, treatises on visionary experience function as a materia medica of spiritual ailments in addition to their primary use as manuals of mystical instruction. Descriptions of mystical visions are found in several Kubrawī works such as the Fawā'ih al-jamāl wa-fawātiḥ al-jalāl of Najm Ad-Dīn al-Kubrā³ and the Mirṣād al-ibād min al-mabdā' ila'l-ma'ād of Najm Ad-Dīn Dāya ar-Rāzī (d. 654/1256).

One treatise, the Risāla-yi nūriyya, stands out for its explicit and systematized discussion of mystical lights and visions. Although color symbolism and its association with mystical advancement forms the basis of much of Simnānī's thought, the Risāla-yi nūriyya is the only work in which he provides a systematic description of these lights as they are encountered during the practice of dhikr.⁴

This work has sometimes been falsely attributed to Shihāb Ad-Dīn As-Suhrawardī (d. 587/1191) and 'Alī-yi Hamadānī (d. 786/1385). Based on internal evidence, however, there can be no doubt that the treatise belongs to Simnānī: it is explicitly stated that the work was written at the request of a student named Muḥammad-i Khurd (possibly Khirād), who is known to have been one of Simnānī's closest disciples.⁵ The doctrines expressed in the treatise are identical to those found in Simnānī's other writings, and the style is also characteristically his.

The treatise begins by providing a general description of the forms of light found in the visible and invisible dimension. Simnānī then proceeds to the main subject of his treatise, which is a detailed outline of the lights encountered as one engages in mystical recollection (dhikr) in order to perfect one's spiritual nature. These lights are hierarchical, corresponding to the subtle substances (laṭā'if) or organs which make up the mystical body. In order to make his discussion more comprehensive, Simnānī additionally describes the light of Satan, and those of ablution and recollection.

Sadr, Sharḥ-i aḥwāl-u al-kār-u āsār-i Shaykh 'Alā' ad-dawla as-Simnānī (Tehran: Dānish, 1955), 45.

In addition to its systematic treatment of lights and colors, the Risāla-yi nūriyya also contains graphic descriptions of the specific visions encountered along the mystical path. These include sparks, smoke, experiences of levitation, and visions of buildings and animals. Simnānī's descriptions are often vivid, relying on everyday objects as metaphoric points of reference.

Four manuscripts of this work are known to exist, representing two stemmae. The oldest is dated 851/1447 and is contained in a collection of treatises attributed to 'Alī-yi Hamadānī, a prominent Kubrawī mystic who was affiliated with Simnānī through two of the latter's disciples: Sharaf Ad-Dīn-i Mazdaqānī (d. 766/1364-65) and 'Alī-yi Dūsī (or Dūstī, d. 734/1334).⁶ The manuscript is clearly written, but is incomplete and contains many lacunae which are noted by the scribe.

The two other manuscripts belonging to the first stemma are both inaccurate. One is dated dhu'l-Ḥijja 1048/April 1639 but is incomplete.⁷ The second, though complete, cannot be accurately dated.⁸

By far the most valuable copy of the treatise is preserved in the Süleymaniye Library under the title Risālat al-anwār.⁹ Dated Sha'bān 899/May 1494, this manuscript is complete, and is accurately and clearly written. It is the sole representative of the second manuscript stemma.

Gratitude and thanks to the Creator Who, through love and perfect knowledge, changed the light of intention (nūr-i irādat) into the seed of the tree of bliss (shajara-yi sa'ādat) in the soil within the human being which is the invisible realm of the souls. With the power of omnipotence, He planted this seed therein and brought forth the tree of bliss, and bore it to the heaven of His intimacy. And with the wisdom of sovereignty, He brought forth the fruit of the light of sainthood (nūr-i wilāyat) from that tree, and raised it above all His beings and placed it at their head. and peace upon the purified spirit of the Prophet—it is only in the garden of His laws (sharīʿat) that this tree can reach fruition. 2. Know that it has been some time since the “champion of reality,” Muḥammad-i Khurd, who is one of my disciples, has desired that a treatise about the nature of illumination and the description of various lights be written for the guidance of the novice traveller and the satisfaction of the accomplished mystic. But I wished that these secrets should remain hidden from strange eyes, so I did not take his entreaties into consideration until this moment. Now the pen has set out to describe the Eternal One, and all volition has passed to my fingers, so that the figures which were drawn on the page of my heart are now reproduced on this page in summary form. God willing, may they be a source of pleasure for those who read them and proof for those who hear them, and may they remain far from the impure and hidden from outsiders.

3. Know, O friend, that God has illuminated your heart with “sacred lights” (anwār qudsiyya), which is what the light of a thing is called in actuality so that it may know itself and see all things and know them. It can see and know all things with it. This absolute light (nūr-i muṭlaq) is a particular attribute of God.

4. Know that the light of intention (nūr-i irādat) is earthly and the light of sainthood (nūr-i wilāyat) is celestial, as He says in His Glorious Book: “Allah is the light of the heavens and the earth” (24:35). And the light of sainthood, which is His special attribute, cannot be seen except with the light of intention which is an attribute of His essence; it is for this reason that He says: “My saints are beneath My tents—no one knows them but Me.”¹¹ Once you know the meaning of this, know that, in the invisible dimension of the spiritual realm (ghayb-i anfus), light is associated with the inner mystery (khafī), spirit (rūh), inmost being (sirr), heart (dil), intellect (ʿaql), and soul (nafs),¹² and in the visible dimension of the spiritual realm (shahādat-i anfus) with the light of the eyes and the conceptual faculties which are stored in the brain. In the invisible dimension of the physical realm (ghayb-i āfāq) they are attributed to spirits of the angels and jinn, and in the visible of the physical realm (shahādat-i āfāq) with the sun, moon,¹³ stars, candles, and lamps.

¹¹ This is a non-canonical prophetic tradition.

¹³ Not in Car.

5. This is to say that when the mystic turns his face from the visible and invisible dimensions of the physical realm, he should also turn away from the visible of the spiritual realm and face the invisible of the spiritual realm. The first curtain that appears before him is turbid.¹⁴ As soon as he strikes the stone of his heart with the flint of the profession of faith, "There is no deity but God," the hidden fire which is placed in him becomes apparent, and he stands in the fireship of the soul (ḥarrāqa-yi nafs); he feeds it with the firewood of the body until it becomes ignited and that turbid curtain is transformed to dark blue. And as the fire becomes stronger and the firewood of existence is dried of the moisture of [remaining] morsels of sensual delight (nadawāt-i luqmāt-i ḥuḏuḏī), the colors become purer and the smoke is decreased. When the morsels (luqmāt) are entirely made up of what is just, then no smoke remains and a pleasant odor reaches the nose. Colorful lights also appear, and one witnesses [true] spiritualists.¹⁵ All that has been described results from the blessing of the strength of recollection and from guarding the morsel from the moisture of sensual delight.

6. The difference between the colors red, white, blue, yellow, black and green in this stage is the result of the strength of the fire of recollection. It may so happen that the essence of the fire of recollection may come out from behind the curtain and shout: "It is no other!" and say: "I am everything."¹⁶ It is necessary that the individual not be arrogant at this stage since this is the stage of the beginner in recollection.

7. The next fire which appears to the mystic on the path is undefined, but insofar as it can be described it is the fire of reality, and of recollection, and of love, and of longing, and of desire, and of anger, and of evil, and of the physical body of which the human being is composed. It is possible to differentiate between all these fires with signs that occur along the path, but the beginner should not [45r] attempt to differentiate between them without the guidance of a master lest Satan whisper suggestions to his soul in order to influence it, causing the novice to fall into the trap of arrogance and turn away from the path. It is, therefore, necessary that the disciple tell everything he sees to the master so that he [the master] may explain the mystical experiences and visions.

¹⁵ Dān: "spiritual witnessing comes to pass;" Car: "one witnesses spirituality." This is probably a reference to the appearance of the mystical guide in the unseen realm (shaykh al-ghayb), a phenomenon frequently mentioned in Sufi texts.

¹⁶ Simnānī is paraphrasing a distinctive passive from the Fawā'id al-jamāl wa fawā'id al-jalāl of Najm Ad-Dīn al-Kubrā (d. 618/1221): "dhikr is a fire which neither abides nor spreads. When it enters an abode it says 'It is I and no other!' and that is a meaning of lā ilāha illā 'llāh. And if there is wood in the abode it burns it [the wood] and it becomes fire; if there is darkness in the abode it [the dhikr] becomes a light and destroys it [the darkness] and illuminates the abode; and if there is light in the abode it does not oppose it but this light is also recollection (dhikr) and the one who recollects (dhikr) and the object of the recollection (madhkur) which habit together, light upon light." (Meier, 4-5). This passage has been borrowed by other writers, most notably by Ibn 'Aṭā' Allāh al-Iskandarī (d. 708/1309) in his Miftāḥ al-salāḥ wa-misbāḥ al-arwāḥ (Cairo: Maṭba'a Muḥammad 'Alī Ṣabīḥ, n.d., 6).

8. After this, when the existence soiled by the morsels of sensual delight and tarnished by the filth of disobedience is completely burned, and annihilation (fanā') has been obtained as a result of the fire of recollection, then the light of the soul becomes apparent, the curtain of which is of a pleasing, dark blue color.

9. After this the light of the heart appears, the curtain of which is ruby red in color. Upon seeing this light the mystic experiences a great mystical taste (dhawq) which reaches his heart and causes him to obtain permanence (istiqāmat) on the path.

10. After this, the light of the inmost being (sirr) shines forth, the curtain of which is white. In this stage the mystic acquires knowledge of the delight of unveiling.¹⁷

11. After this the light of the spirit shines forth, the color of which is an extremely pleasing yellow. The soul is weakened and the heart is strengthened by seeing it.

12. After this the light of the inner mystery (khafī)— to which the Holy Spirit is a reference—is manifested. Its curtain is black, a pure and awesome blackness. Sometimes, through fear at seeing this black curtain, the mystic is annihilated and his body begins to tremble.

13. This is to say that the water of eternal life is arrayed in this darkness. Whoever makes a place for himself in the luminescence of the light of the Prophet (may peace be upon him) and remains in the shadow of obedience to him, like Khidr¹⁸ that person reaches the spring of the water of life which is the source of the lights of the attributes. He drinks a cupful of love from the heavenly river (kawthar) of grace and becomes deserving of that which the Lord, Most High, manifests to him through His attributes of beauty and majesty. At this stage, it is necessary that one not incline oneself towards the jewels (jawāhir) that are placed in this darkness, so that, like Alexander, he is not deprived of the spring of the water of life. He should travel in this darkness with sincere steps and keep his heart strong. Under no circumstances should he fear any of the dreadful forms and sounds [that he encounters]. The light of the inner mystery then becomes apparent from its potentiality in the invisible, and fear is transformed into intimacy.

14. When he has fulfilled the requirements of this stage, "absolute light" (nūr-i mutlaq) is manifested. This is a particular attribute of God, [45v] exalted above indwelling in (ḥulūl) and union with (ittiḥād) any other, sanctified beyond association and disassociation. Its curtain is green in color, this greenness being a sign of the life of the tree of existence. The manifestation of the "absolute light" is not possible except in paradise. The effects that appear in it, that is in this manifestation, are: firstly, the annihilation¹⁹ of the mystic, then standing on the boundary, splitting of the sky, transformation of the earth, the flying of mountains, the dispersal of fixed stars, the changed rising of the sun and moon, the dimming of planets, the assemblage in open spaces, judgement of accounts on the balance, traversing the path, being thrown into the abyss, and being lifted up in levels.²⁰ When the mystic sees these signs, he should know himself to be in the eternal garden. Then he should pay complete attention to the beauty of His presence in accordance with the command "Neither did sight falter nor exceed the bounds" (53:17). He should not incline to anything so that the "holy essence" (dhāt-i muqaddas) may be manifested. Witnessing this instantaneously and miraculously returns light to his ailing eyes.

¹⁷ An alternate reading would be: "the inspirational knowledge of unveiling."

15. The manifestation of the light of the "real" (nūr-i ḥaqq) is exalted above all causes; nothing resembles it and it resembles nothing. The light of the inner mystery is manifested above the head and no light resembles it in the visible realm; it annihilates the mystic in the beginning of its manifestation. The light of the spirit is greater and more awesome than that of the sun, and is generally manifested behind the back, though sometimes also from the left and right. The light of the inmost being resembles that of Venus but is brighter and subtler than it; its manifestation occurs opposite the mystic and strikes his eyes, enters his body and annihilates him. When the mystic returns from that state, he sees much knowledge collected within him which he had never known or heard before. When this light falls on his eyes it permeates all parts of his body. He then sees himself like illuminated water, since his skin and the clothes that are on his body are illuminated. The light of the heart resembles the moon at first, although the true point (nūḡta-yi ḥaqīqī) that is in that moon as well as in the mystic's heart also appears. This light manifests itself on the left side of the mystic and annihilates him. Effort in the heart is decreased in this stage,²¹ and strange and wondrous lights and states occur to the mystic. The light of the [46r] soul surrounds the mystic. It resembles a polished door on which the sun is shining and from which the reflection is falling on a wall.

16. The manifestation of the light of the soul does not possess the power to annihilate. As for other lights that he sees, such as a candle, lamp or lantern: these are the lights of the spirits of humans and jinn,²² classed according to their

²⁰ These are standard Islamic eschatological images. They are described in vivid detail in ḥadīth collections and in popular literature. See Y. Haddad and Jane I. Smith, The Islamic Understanding of Death and Resurrection (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1981).

²¹ Naw: "Effort is lost in his heart," Dān: "... and gets lost in the heart."

differing abilities and disparate levels of attainment. The sky, stars, sun and moon that he sees comprise the heavens of the physical "human realm" (malakūt-i mulk-i āfāq) and the earth of the spiritual "Realm of Sovereignty" (mulk-i malakūt-i anfus). Sometimes, however, they are the lights of the archangels, and of the prophets and saints (upon them be peace).

17. The sparks of fire that he sees in the beginning are signs of the mystic having traversed the element of fire in his own body. His flying and walking through the air is a sign of his passing the element of air. Swimming in the sea or in rivers, and walking on water indicates that the mystic has passed the element of water in his body. Rising up above streets, houses and walls is a sign of the mystic's having traversed the earthy portion of himself which is also part of the composition of a human being. Each time the mystic's bodily parts are purified of the darkness of the morsels of sensual delight, beautifully colored, pure, swirling and swiftly moving fires become visible. He also witnesses clean, bright air; illuminated waters; wide streets; clean and majestic palaces; beautifully spread carpets; and sumptuous feasts laid out. But if the mystic's bodily parts are sullied by morsels of sensual delight and soiled by desires of the soul, he sees the opposite of this, such as frightening, slow-moving, smoke-filled fires in which he falls and is burned. He sees a cauldron into which he is hurled; he sees dark winds, lightening, frightening thunderbolts, and terrifying darkness in which he is trapped; turbid waters full of filth in which he falls and is polluted; and he sees narrow, dark streets, and ruined, filthy palaces in which he gets lost. Whenever he tries to come out of this wilderness, he is surrounded on all sides by high walls and hills of sand on which he walks with great difficulty. He sees deep, dark pits into which he falls. Dangerous beasts such as the snake,²³ scorpion, lion, leopard, bear, boar, and their like become apparent at this stage and cause him grief. [46v] The mystic must transcend the attributes of the inciteful soul in order to be delivered [from this state]. To the degree that the darkness of the morsels of sensual delight is exchanged for the purity of the morsels of that which is just, blame-worthy attributes are transformed into praiseworthy ones, and these detestable images are transformed into noble ones, such as sheep, deer, and colorful and melodious birds.

18. There comes a time when the animal form gets discarded and the individual is dressed in human form, at which point he sees himself as a mystical traveller. And as the purity of the morsel of that which is just increases, so too does its beauty. The good conduct of the mystic is the visible sign of the beauty of this invisible form.

19. There comes a time when the dark human person is illuminated; in fact, he becomes light personified.²⁴ At this stage, the mystic learns of the reality of the subtle substance of I-ness (laṭīfa-yi anāniyyat), and of the cultivation of the acquired body (badan-i muktasab) which will abide with him. He obtains knowledge of the inner meaning of the words of the "master of ascetics," Ibrāhīm b. Adham (d. 162/778-9) (may God sanctify his spirit), who said: "Consider your food lawful, and do not stay awake by night and fast by day."²⁵ Exert great effort in obtaining lawful sustenance, which is a lawful morsel and with which the human body is strengthened and from which the profession of faith (kalima-yi ṭayyiba) is obtained, since the Prophet (upon him be peace) says:²⁶ "Any flesh that derives from the unlawful, is more appropriate for the fire [than for eating]."²⁷

²³ Naw and Dān: add "and ant (mūr)."

²⁴ Naw and Dān: "the dark person becomes like light personified."

20. Know for certain that the mystic's advancement on the path is four-sixths worship of God through observing the [lawful nature of] the morsel, one sixth recollection, and one-sixth following the guidance of the master. If, God forbid, he is plagued by an unlawful morsel, he should not eat even the minutest amount. If there is any doubt [about its lawful nature], he should abstain from satiation, and if it is lawful he should avoid excess. He should eat in such an amount that he remains hungry, so that he does not feel sluggish and be overtaken by sleep and turn away from recollection. He should observe moderation lest he fall into the misfortune of excess or deficiency (ifrāt wa tafrit). He must also guard against temptation. Know that God (may He be exalted) says: "Indeed, Allah does not love transgressors" (5:87); these are the people who forbid lawful morsels unto themselves. And He says: "Indeed, He does not love the wasteful" (7:31);²⁸ these are the people who engage in gluttony. "Eat and drink, but do not be wasteful" (7:31) should be taken as a model, and he should emulate the tradition of God's prophet (may peace be upon him) and not transgress it, since "to exceed perfection is an error." Thus today you must try to adorn your being with praiseworthy attributes and pleasant qualities so that [47r] tomorrow you might not be trapped in bitter agony in the deepest pits of hell. Embody noble characteristics so that you may be rewarded with eternal blessings in the gardens of Paradise.²⁹ Whosoever does not purify his body today yet hopes for Paradise is like a person who does not sow seeds in the ground in autumn but hopes for grain at harvest time. In fact, there is no one more bootless than him,³⁰ for the Prophet of God (may He be exalted) has said: "This world is the field from which

²⁶ Ganj ends at this point.

²⁷ Paraphrase of a ḥadīth found in at-Tirmidhi, ad-Dārimī, and Ibn Ḥanbal.

²⁸ Naw: missing "Indeed, Allāh does not love transgressors"... unto themselves. And He says:" Dān: missing "These are the people... wasteful."

²⁹ Dān: "And do not embody detestable characteristics so that you may be rewarded with eternal blessings in the gardens of Paradise."

³⁰ Naw and Dān: "In fact, more ignorant than him."

the harvest is reaped in the afterlife."³¹ When this world comes to an end and the tools which he could have used for sowing are taken away, and the seeds of worldly appetites do not turn green, then such a person will say: "O Lord! We have seen and heard, so send us back. We shall do the right thing, for we have come to believe with certainty" (32:12).³² But this plea will not be heard, and it will be said in reply: "Remain condemned in it, and do not speak to Me" (23:108).

21. My friend, accept this advice and do not share in the arrogance of Satan (a verse):

Sow seeds today, for tomorrow
Nothing will come of begging.

22. Pleading: "Pour a little water over us or give us a little of what God has given you" (7:50) will only increase [their] thirst, and no heart will be forgiven for crying: "O Lord! Our misery overwhelmed us" (23:106). Do not leave today's task onto tomorrow. One must be industrious, not lazy; one must be extraordinary, not common;³³ one must be thankful, not disbelieving. Unbelief consists of not recognizing the nature of God's blessings contained in what He has said regarding the reality of your being. As a consequence, you make this life—which is itself a great blessing—into an assemblage of disobedience to God. Indeed, a disbeliever is not only one who has not physically uttered the profession of faith; anyone who is deprived of the meaning of this formula is also a disbeliever. One must strive so that not one precious soul is lost, and that you accord the just due of every soul, which is a noble substance (jawharī az jawāhir-i sharīfa). Thus might you be among those who are thankful for God's blessings.

23. I was talking about lights and suddenly I left that issue. Let me now return to the subject at hand. When I was describing the lights of the inner mystery, spirit, inmost being, heart and soul, I did not remember the light of Satan. It appears necessary that I explain the light of fire and describe its characteristics lest the mystic in seclusion (khalwatī) think that Satan does not enter into anything which possesses the attribute of luminescence.

24. One must know, then, that the light of Satan, which is manifested in the beginning, is like a puppet of foul-colored fire. He sees its curtain on the face of the earth covering everything with a dark red fire; a drop of black blood becomes obscured on the face of this redness,³⁴ and the heart [47v] is constricted³⁵ by looking at it so that the mystic can only engage in recollection with difficulty. All his body parts ache, such that you might say he was suffer-

³¹ Not a canonical ḥadīth but a well known proverb.

³² Car: missing "for we have come to believe with certainty."

ing a seizure at this time. But when he recalls his master with complete concentration and occupies himself with recollection, the puppet falls to the earth and the foul-colored curtain turns to nought. The mystic's body feels light, and pure recollection flows on his tongue. Then the fire of recollection starts to rise, and the mystic experiences a state of pleasure and ease.

25. One must know, furthermore, that every part of the mystic's body has a specific light, and every act of devotion also has a light. The details of these lights are beyond the scope of this treatise. "None knows the armies of your Lord save Himself" (74:31). Earlier masters, may God sanctify their spirits, have not written as much as I have committed to paper lest pretenders present these as their own ideas and ensnare mystics in the net of their deception.³⁶ But the strength of that friend's [i.e. Muḥammad-i Khurd] will was such that I have explained an infinitesimal amount of the secrets of illumination. And in this state it occurred to me that God (may He be exalted) says: "Thereby He leads many astray, and thereby He guides many; yet He leads astray none but those who transgress, who, having sealed it, break God's covenant, dividing what He ordained joined; and those who spread corruption in the land will surely suffer" (2:26-27). Know that going astray and being rightly guided are by His command Who "thereby guides whosoever He wishes, and leads astray whosoever He wishes." "Whoever is guided by God is rightly guided, but whosoever goes astray will not find a guide to show him the right path" (18:17).³⁷ I eliminated my own volition and was content with God's judgement, and entrusted control of the pen of elucidation to the fingers. And inasmuch as He wishes, He writes the meanings of the invisible dimension on the page of the visible, and seats the blessed people at His sumptuous table, and relegates the wretched to the torments and pits of hell for disbelieving in the lights.³⁸ "God does as He wishes" (14:27) "and ordains what He wills" (5:1).

26. The purpose of this is to say that when the mystic sees the effect³⁹ within himself (which is the acceptance of the words of mystical saints), he put his foot forward on the mystical path with full confidence. He then witnesses the lights, obtains knowledge of the signs of the path, and comprehends the real nature of the removal of the veils and lifting of the covers. It is vital that, until his dying breath, he should not be heedless for one instant, since the veil of darkness falls in every instant in the visible realm which is itself nothing but absolute darkness and nothingness. If he is not occupied with the removal of this veil, veils upon veils [48r] will descend and the lights will disappear

³⁷ Dān: "Going astray and perishing are not by His command: 'He leads astray whom He will and guides whom He will' (93:16 and others), 'and he is rightly guided, but whosoever goes astray will not find a guide to show him the right path' (18:17)."

³⁸ Dān: missing "and relegates the wretched... the lights."

behind the curtain. [The mystic must be constantly occupied with their removal] lest Satan communicate false ideas to the soul and turn it away from the path so that it apostatizes.⁴⁰ The masters, may God sanctify their souls, have said: "one who apostatizes from the religious law (sharīʿa) attains his former status if he says the profession of faith: "There is no deity but God, and Muḥammad is the messenger of God" just once; but all the efforts of the humans and jinn cannot return to his former status one who apostatizes from the mystical path." May God protects us from apostasy after belief, from paucity after plenty.

27. Know, in addition, that ablution possesses a great light which illuminates the dark seclusion. This light resembles the sun and appears opposite the forehead of the mystic. As soon as the mystic raises his eyes to see it, it rises upwards until a mountain appears above the place of seclusion and that disc shines forth from above the head of the mystic and illuminates the entire place of seclusion. Most often this light appears when the mystic has returned from performing his ablutions and has occupied himself with offering thanks for their successful performance. However, in the end he sees the disc, which he [previously] saw above him, in the center of his own breast which is the place from which it comes out. This disc is subtler than the sun and its light is pure, having come out from behind the colored garment.

28. The novice mystic sees lights and a variety of colors just outside the place of seclusion, which is illuminated with a light by which one can see all the people of the world. This is the result of the fire of recollection's power. And sometimes a circle appears opposite the mystic and colored lights come out of it, just like a spring out of which water flows. This is the sign of the transformation of the inciteful and censorious soul (nafs-i ammāra wa lawwāma) through the attributes of comfort and contentment. But know that seventy thousand veils of light and darkness are in the mystic's path, just as the Prophet (may peace be upon him) has said but which is not explained in any book. I will discuss them here cursorily, summarizing them in seven curtains.

29. The first curtain is of the invisible realm of Satan which is turbid, and 10,000 veils must be lifted at this stage. After this is the curtain of the invisible realm of the soul, the curtain of which is blue, and 10,000 additional veils must be removed at this stage. After this is the curtain of the invisible realm of the heart which is red and ruby-colored, and 10,000 veils must be destroyed in this stage. Then there is the curtain of the invisible realm of the inmost being, the color of which is white and extremely fine, and there are also 10,000 veils in this stage which must be lifted. After this is the curtain [48v] of the invisible of the spirit. The color of this curtain is a very pleasing yellow and there are 10,000 more veils at this stage which must be illuminated. After this there is the curtain of the invisible of the inner mystery, the color of which is an awesome pure black, and 10,000 more veils must be lifted at this stage. After this is the curtain of the hiddenmost mystery (ghayb al-ghuyūb); the color of its curtain is green and 10,000 additional veils lie at this threshold. And all these veils relate to the mystic's being. It is he who is veiled by these veils which are brought about by God, not God that is veiled. Nothing can veil God.

30. After the lifting of these 70,000 veils he reaches the veil of "Divine Grandeur" (ḥijāb-i kibriyā) just as the Prophet (upon him be peace) says: "His veil is of light (fire, according to another tradition). If it were lifted, the splendor of His face would burn whatever turned its eyes towards it."⁴¹ It is necessary at this stage that he place his head on the threshold of supplication (āstāna-yi 'ajz) so that a rapturous occurrence (jadhba) from that realm might shine down on his body, overcome him and transport him to the divine presence, for this is the desired effect. If this does not happen, then he must become a servant at the threshold of eternity (āstāna-yi samadiyyat) and place his head upon the threshold of servitude (āstāna-yi 'ubūdiyyat) until such time that God opens that door through grace and bounty. The key to that door is in the hands of His beloved (upon him be peace), and one should not seek it from anyone but him lest one be eternally debarred.

31. It is my hope that my associates will want to discover this state through striving, not through words alone, so that they might become people who strive in religion. When their hearts' eye (dida-yi jānishān) is illuminated with these lights, let them remember this poor [mystic] with a small prayer. And let them deem it necessary to pray continually for the spirits of the masters, without the guidance of whose efforts, one cannot conclude this formidable journey. Let their tongues be continuously moving with prayers for the spirit of the "Joy of the World" [i.e. Muḥammad], upon him be the most eminent salutations and best prayers. Praise be to God at all times.⁴²

This is the first English translation of the last known philosophical work of the great eleventh-century Ismaili thinker, poet, and Fatimid emissary, Nāṣir-i Khusraw. Appointed from Cairo by command of the Fatimid Imam-caliph al-Mustanṣir to serve first as a dāʿī, and then as the ḥujjat, for the entire region of Khurasan, he maintained his allegiance to both his mission and his Imam for the rest of his life, even when threatened and driven into exile.

Written during his exile in Badakhshan in the year 1070 CE, Nāṣir-i Khusraw here develops a powerful presentation of both Aristotelian philosophy and Ismaili exegesis, or taʿwīl, and strives to show that they are ultimately in harmony. The work is presented as a learned commentary on a long philosophical poem, written in the previous century and sent to Nasir by the amīr of Badakhshan, ʿAlī b. Asad, who copied the poem out in his own hand from memory and asked the poet-philosopher to explicate it.

In doing so, Nasir ranges over a huge span of topics from logic and language to the nature of the physical world, from the spheres of the highest heavens to the plants and animals of the earthly realm, and, most importantly, hidden spiritual realities: the esoteric (bāṭin) as well as the exoteric (ẓahir) realms. He thus discusses the nature of God, the creation of human beings, and the mysteries concealed in the physical world, itself a reflection of a higher, transcendent realm.

Between Reason and Revelation: Twin Wisdoms Reconciled is an annotated translation of the Persian text prepared by Henry Corbin and Mohammed Muʿin based on the single surviving manuscript of the work, now in the Süleymaniye Mosque Library in Istanbul. It is a work of great philosophical and spiritual insight, which is also a pioneering attempt to tackle difficult intellectual problems in the Persian language; it is at once lucid and lyrical, precise and speculative. Nasir's influence has been immense as both a poet and a thinker, and the Kitāb-i Jāmiʿ al-Ḥikmatayn is his crowning work.

Fifty-two or so Arabic most likely Isma'ili related epistles ultimately set down in the late 4th AH /10th cent. CE.

"The Encyclopedia is divided into fifty-two epistles (rasa'il) of varying lengths, which make up four books. Each book develops different topics: Book 1: the mathematical sciences (14 rasa'il) include theory of number, geometry, astronomy, geography, music, theoretical and practical arts, ethics and logic. Book 2: the natural sciences (17 rasa'il) comprehend matter, form, motion, time, space, sky and universe, generation and corruption, meteorology, minerals, plants, animals, human body, perception, embryology, man as microcosm, development of souls in the body, limit of knowledge, death, pleasure, and language. Book 3: the psychological and rational sciences (10 rasa'il) comprehend intellectual principles (Pythagoras and Ikhwan), universe as macrocosm, intelligence and intelligible, periods and era, passion, resurrection, species of movement, cause and effect, definitions and descriptions. Book 4: the theological sciences (11 rasa'il) include doctrines and religions, way to God, doctrine of Ikhwan, essence of faith, divine law and prophethood, appeal to God, hierarchy, spiritual beings, politics, magic and talisman."

Manuscripts: The Hunt for Topkapi

Getting images of manuscripts from Topkapi, Istanbul, is notoriously difficult. Here I describe how I succeeded in obtaining them. I am not saying my way is the only way. In fact, if you know of better ways, please do get in contact with me. All I am doing here is share my own experience.

The first step of that experience was to realize, after more than a year, that I was not going to do it without going there myself. I tried several connections, and some of them really went the extra mile for me, but in the end it did not work out.

So, I went there. Istanbul is great and if my readers would like to see a more general guide to manuscript hunting in Istanbul, I would be happy to write it. Please leave a response either here or on Facebook. I planned to stay for a week. This turned out to be too short. My suggestion is to be there for two weeks.

What you need to do at home is:

Know exactly which manuscripts you need. I have found out that the catalogue is lacking many details and contains wrong information. I suggest to use scholarly literature; you need to know about a call number from someone who has seen the manuscript itself. In my case the “Philologika” articles from Helmut Ritter were helpful. There is no reading room at Topkapi and you will not be allowed to peruse a bunch of manuscripts. You can only go there and say: “I want pictures of the manuscript with call number #####”.

What I took with me was:

2 hard copies and a digital copy of the Topkapi CD Request Form.

2 hard copies and a digital copy of my passport.

2 hard copies and a digital copy of a letter of endorsement from my supervisor, printed on paper with university letterhead.

2 hard copies and a digital copy of a letter explaining my purpose.

2 passport quality photographs (did not need them).

I stayed at the Netherlands Institute in Turkey. This came in really handy as I found out that you really need to either speak Turkish or have someone at your disposal who speaks Turkish to make things happen. The librarian was kind enough to help me out.

She translated the letter in which I explained my purpose into Turkish.

With her help, calling to Topkapi, I also learned that you first need to get a letter of approval from the Ministry of Culture and Tourism. They are located in the Atlas Pasaji, on Istiklal Cadessi. Coming from Taksim, it will be on the left, a little before the Galatasaray Lisesi. In the Atlas Pasaji, the entrance is on the left, right next to the Tattoo Parlor (!). You will need a few Turkish words and a letter in Turkish explaining your purpose to talk yourself in. I had to go to the second floor where I was pointed to a door (they're all bind with no signs). I opened it and saw a civil servant watching a television show on his computer. He only spoke Turkish. A colleague of him came, and his German was very good (English only limited).

The question they will ask you is: "Do you have permission from Ankara?"

The correct answer is: "I do not need to physically hold the manuscript, I only want photographs."

With that established, they were actually very helpful. However, the letter I needed required a signature of someone who was not there. I agreed to come back the next day. Sometime in the morning, the next day, I actually received an e-mail saying the letter was signed. I went to pick it up and went to Topkapi Palace.

Once you have that letter, it is probably better to call ahead to Topkapi and make an appointment. I did not. When you are there, you can speak to the doorkeeper. You will receive a visitor's pass and be on your way, from the entrance you take a right. I ended up talking to a lady who was, yet again, very helpful. I was asked again about Ankara and I repeated again that I only needed photographs. I asked her why it is a bit more difficult to get images from Topkapi than it is from Suleymaniye. She said that when Topkapi Palace was turned into a museum (Topkapi Palace Museum), all the manuscripts were logged as museum items, and so the library (Topkapi Palace Museum Library) uses different protocols in handling the manuscripts than other manuscript libraries do. Unlucky for me, they had not made photos of the manuscripts I was after (ergo: not all manuscripts are digitized). But I was surprised to learn how willing they were to do it, and they did not bill me any extra money.

About the money, the photos are not dirt cheap. For large quantities it is 2 liras per photo. I wanted to see three sizable manuscripts which amounted to €500,-. I think that's a fine price, but I am just saying, it ain't a bargain.

All of the above happened in a span of 3 days. But, of course, those photos needed to be taken, so I returned home empty-handed. She said that from here we would be able to handle it over the Internet. When I had returned home, it took several e-mails and 22 days to finally have the pictures.

In a next post, I will discuss the quality of these pictures, in comparison with other collections that offer digitalization.

Thanks for this post. Topkapi is definitely not the easiest place to deal with, but the University of Istanbul is equally difficult, and I am not going to mention impossibilities of the TIEM. Good luck with your research and I look forward to the next part.

Medieval Islamic Views of the Cosmos: The Book of Curiosities

Book of curiosities

Image Source: upload.wikimedia.org

World map from the Fatimid treatise, Book of Curiosities of the Sciences and Marvels for the Eyes; copy of manuscript originally written in the first half of the 11th century.

Bodleian Library.

In 2002 the Bodleian Library at Oxford acquired one of the only known copies of an illustrated anonymous cosmography compiled in Egypt during the first half of the 11th century. This manuscript contains a series of early maps and astronomical diagrams, most of which are unparalleled in any other known Greek, Latin or Arabic material. The rhyming title of the volume, Ḳitāb Gharā'ib al-funūn wa-mulāḥ al-ʿuyūn, loosely translates as The Book of Curiosities of the Sciences and Marvels for the Eyes. The Bodleian's copy may have been made in the late 12th or early 13th century.

"Its unique maps and diagrams include: diagrams of star-groups and comets; a rectangular map of the world with a graphic scale (the earliest surviving example of such a map); a circular world map; individual maps of islands and ports in the eastern Mediterranean, including Sicily, Tinnis, Mahdia, Cyprus, and the Byzantine coasts of Asia Minor; maps illustrating the Mediterranean Sea as a whole, the Indian Ocean, and the Caspian Sea; and maps of five major rivers (the Nile, Indus, Oxus, Euphrates, and Tigris)" (http://www.bodleian.ox.ac.uk/news/2007_mar_29, accessed 01-23-2014).

"The volume (now given the shelfmark MS. Arab. c. 90) consists of 48 folios (96 pages), each measuring 324 x 245 mm. Pages without illustrations have 27 lines of text per page. The treatise begins with a dedication to an unnamed patron and an abbreviated table of contents. The manuscript copy is incomplete, however, for the copyist has omitted the eighth and ninth chapters of the second book, and the manuscript has lost part of the penultimate chapter and all of the last one.

The Paper

"The lightly glossed, biscuit-brown paper is sturdy, rather soft, and relatively opaque. The paper has thick horizontal laid lines, slightly curved, and there are rib shadows, but no chain lines or watermarks are visible. The thickness of the paper varies between 0.17 and 0.20 mm and measures 3 on the Sharp Scale of Opacity; the laid lines are 6-7 wires/cm, with the space between lines less than the width of one line. The paper would appear to have been made using a grass mould. Paper of such construction was produced in Egypt and Greater Syria in the 12th and 13th centuries (greater precision is not possible). For similar Islamic papers, see Helen Loveday, Islamic Paper: A Study of the Ancient Craft (London, 2001); we thank the author for examining and discussing with us the paper in this particular manuscript.

Authorship, date and provenance

"The author of The Book of Curiosities is not named and has not been identified, although he refers to another composition of his titled Ṣal-Muḥīt ('The Comprehensive'). On the basis of internal evidence, we can suggest that the treatise was composed in the first half of the 11th century, probably in Egypt. The copy we have today is more recent and appears to have been made some hundred and fifty to two hundred years later. Although the copy is undated and unsigned, the paper, inks, and pigments appear consistent with Egyptian-Syrian products made from the early 13th through the 14th century.

"Our author recognized the legitimate authority of the Fāṭimid imāms who came to power in Ifrīqiyah (modern Tunisia) in 909 and ruled at Cairo from 973 until their dynasty was brought to an end by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (Saladin) in 1171. At their heyday, the Fāṭimids ruled all over Syria, Egypt and North Africa. Whereas the 'Abbāsīd caliphs of Baghdad were recognized as the rightful leaders of the Muslim community by the Sunnī majority, the Fāṭimid imāms—who claimed to be the biological descendants of the Prophet Muḥammad through his daughter Fāṭimah—were recognized as legitimate by a faithful minority of Ismā'īlī Muslims. Our author not only opens his work with an explicit acknowledgement of the Fāṭimids but also, further on, gives a brief but highly doctrinaire history of the rise of the dynasty, from the accession of the first imām, al-Mahdī, to the defeat of Abū Yazīd (al-dajjāl, the Antichrist) by his son, al-Qā'im.

"The geographical focus of The Book of Curiosities is Muslim commercial centres of the 9th- to 11th-century eastern Mediterranean, such as Sicily, the textile-producing town of Tinnīs in the Nile Delta, and Mahdiyyah in modern Tunisia. The author is equally acquainted with Byzantine-controlled areas of the Mediterranean, such as Cyprus, the Aegean Sea, and the southern coasts of Anatolia. The author's occasional use of Coptic terms and Coptic months, together with the allegiance to the Fāṭimid caliphs based in Cairo, suggest Egypt as a likely place of production.

"The treatise was almost certainly composed before 1050. The tribal group of the Banū Qurrah are mentioned in chapter 6 of Book 2 as inhabiting the lowlands near Alexandria. As the Banū Qurrah are known to have been banished from the region of Alexandria by the Fāṭimid authorities in 1051–1052, it is very likely that this treatise was written before that date. Since Sicily is described as being under Muslim rule, the treatise could definitely not have been composed later than the Norman invasion of Sicily in 1070.

"The last dated event mentioned in the treatise is the construction buildings for merchants in the city of Tinnīs in 1014-1015. Moreover, al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh, the Fāṭimid ruler of Egypt and Syria from 996 to 1021, is referred to in the chapter on Tinnīs as if he were no longer reigning. Therefore, the treatise was probably composed after 1021" (<http://cosmos.bodley.ox.ac.uk/content.php/boc?expand=732>, Offsite Link accessed 01-23-2014)

The Mesnevi by Maulana Jalal al-Din Rumi

"The Mesnevi" by Maulana Jalal al-Din Rumi is a philosophical and spiritual epic poem written in the 13th century. This foundational work of Sufi literature explores profound themes of love, spirituality, and the nature of existence through allegorical storytelling and poetic dialogue. The text often employs narratives featuring various characters to convey moral lessons and insights into the human condition, aiming to guide readers on a mystical path to understanding divine love ... İḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn

İḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn

The Revival of the Religious Sciences (İḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn) is widely regarded as the greatest work of Muslim spirituality, and is perhaps the most read work in the Muslim world, after the Qur'ān.

The Revival of the Religious Sciences is divided into four parts, each containing ten chapters. Part one deals with knowledge and the requirements of faith—ritual purity, prayer, charity, fasting, pilgrimage, recitation of the Qur'ān, and so forth; part two concentrates on people and society—the manners related to eating, marriage, earning a living, and friendship; parts three and four are dedicated to the inner life of the soul and discuss first the vices that people must overcome in themselves and then the virtues that they must strive to achieve. Below we list the contents of the book, English translations, and links to printed editions in the original Arabic.

For a listing of Arabic language printed editions you may follow this link here.

Printed Editions: A link with details on at least fourteen (14) printed editions including the most recent editions printed in the twenty first century follow this page.

Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-Dīn was first printed at Būlāq, 1269/1853 followed by a lithograph in India in 1863, then in 1894 on the margins of its commentary which is one of the most reliable editions to date. In the 25 Spetember 1939 Cairo edition by the Ḥalabī press it was edited by a committee of scholars headed by the Azhari scholar Aḥmad sa'ad 'Alī it was printed with the now standard addendum and marginal text of al-'Irāqī. All later publishers would follow suit with few modern exceptions.

al-Ghazālī. Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-Dīn. Cairo: Lajnat Nashr al-Thaqāfa al-Islāmiyya, 1356–57 (1937–38). This is the edition that the Dār al-Sha'ab based their edition on. It has been recreated here with the pagination in red on the pdf files. Thanks is due to Prof. Frank Griffel for this information, his help in recreating this edition and providing the scans of the missing pages. Do note that this is a very readable and an accurate edition that is used for scholarly work.

SUMMARIES: There are many summaries of the Iḥyā', though only a handful are published; the others remain in manuscript form. For more information about the summaries of the Iḥyā' in Arabic, see this short article (Arabic html).

Summary by Aḥmad al-Ghazālī (pdf) Lubāb al-iḥyā', published as Mukhtaṣar Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn. The publisher claims that it is by Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī, though I believe this is incorrect. (PDF). This book has been translated into English: Imam Al-Ghazālī Mukhtaṣar Iḥyā' 'ulūm ad-dīn translated from the Arabic, and annotated by Marwan Khalaf. Lympha/Nikosia, Cyprus: SPOHR, 2014.

The Iḥyā' was summarized in a book entitled Minhaj al-qāṣidīn by Ibn al-Jawzī (d. 597 AH/1201 CE), (PDF1, PDF2) which was further summarized in Mukhtaṣar minhāj al-qāṣidīn by Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620 AH/1341 CE). (link Arabic HTML). This book has been widely distributed and reprinted several times, one of which by Dār al-Khayr, Damascus, 1998; with ḥadīth verification by M. W. Salman and A. A. H. Abulkhair (PDF) also other editions are available: 'A. Ḥ. M. Darwish edition: PDF, S. 'Āref edition: PDF, 'A. Ḥ. 'A. Ḥalabī edition: PDF, and 'A. Q. al-'Arnāout edition: PDF, and Z. Shāwīsh edition: PDF)

Tahdhīb mū'aẓat al-mū'minīn, Jamāl al-Dīn al-Qāsimī n.p. n.d. Note that he also did a summary of Qūt al-Qulūb (PDF), (PDF) .

Modern summary of the Iḥyā' comes from Salih Aḥmad al-Shāmī, al-Muhadhab min iḥyā' 'ulum al-dīn, 2 vols. (Beirut: Dār al-Qalam, 1993). Sample translation (link) Also another edition is available from Dār ibn al-Qayīm: PDF. This is an admirable attempt that closely follows the structure of the original book.

The late Sa'īd Ḥawwa (d. 1989) wrote a summary for a training curriculum: al-Mustakhlaṣ fī tazkiyat al-anfus (Cairo: Dar al-Salam, 1984). (PDF) The author/activist was a prolific writer.

COMMENTARY: A commentary (sharḥ) of al-Iḥyā' by Murtaḍā al-Zabīdī's [d. 1791] Itḥaf al-sada al-muttaqīn bi sharḥ iḥyā' 'ulum al-dīn, printed in Cairo 1894 in 10 large volumes. This work is still in print in facsimiles of this edition as well as well as an unreliable DKI edition. Note that the link provided is for the complete 1894 edition. (download page)

Defense: As many were critical of al-Ghazālī there were as many if not more who rallied to his defense:

In his own defense, al-Ghazālī wrote: al-Imlā' fī ishkalat al-iḥyā' (Notes on issues of the Iḥyā') printed as an appendix in some editions of the Iḥyā' (pdf)

'Abd al-Qādir al-'Aydrūs, Ta'arīf al-aḥyā' bi faḍl al-iḥyā' (Introducing the living to the benefits of the Iḥyā' printed as an appendix in some editions of the Iḥyā' (pdf). Note the pun in the title, which is, of course, intentional.

al-Suyūṭī, Tashyat al-'arkān fī laysa fī al-imkan 'abda' mimā kān (Fortifying the foundations of [the statement] "the best of all possible worlds") printed as an appendix in some editions of the Iḥyā' (PDF). Note also this work was the basis of a study done in Theodicy in Islamic Thought: The Dispute over Al-Ghazālī's "Best of All Possible Worlds" by Eric L. Ormsby (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1984).

Unknown author: Risala fi bayan faḍil iḥyā' 'ulum al-dīn (mss in al-Azhar number 1956 [majami 91] folios 76-86).

Unknown author: Risāla fī al-rad 'ala min 'atraḍa 'ala al-ghazālī fī qawlihi ana al-musabibāt ratabat 'ala al-'asbāb (mss in Dār al-Kutub al-miṣriyya [majāmi' 210])

Refutations: The Iḥyā' has generated some heated discussions mostly revolving around the traditions that al-Ghazālī included.

Ibn al-Jawzī (d. 597 AH) i'lam al-aḥya' bi aghlat al-iḥyā' (not printed and no known mss copies) al-Dhahabi mentioned that Abū al-Ḥasan b. Sukar wrote Iḥyā' mayit al-aḥya fi al-rad 'ala kitab al-iḥyā' (not printed and no known mss copies)

Aḥmad b. Munir al-Iskandarī (d. 1284) wrote al-Ḍiya' al-mutalali fi ta'qub al-iḥyā' lil ghazālī as mentioned by Zabīdī (in commentary above) vol. 1. p .33, ln 10) (not printed and no known mss copies)

A Shi'a 'recension': under the title: al-Maḥajjah al-bayḍā' fī tahdhīb al-Iḥyā' by Muḥammad b. al-Murṭaḍa al-maḍ'ū bi-al-Mawla Muḥsin al-Kāshānī (d. 1681) Thanks to Prof. Alger for referring to this book in his monograph on Ghazali. (PDF)

Fatawas (judicial decrees) by scholars and these are too many list or know but Ibn Taymiyya is known to have written one as well as al-Ṭarṭuṣhī. Even in modern times there have been fatwās issued by Saudi 'ulamā'. A typical critique along those lines is by 'A. R. Dimashqīya: PDF.

Mishkāt al-Anwār or The Niche of Lights is an exegetical text written by the Islamic theologian Al-Ghazali (1058-1111) that discusses the Quran's Verse of Light.

The commentary, probably written toward the end of the author's life, interprets this verse and a related hadith from a Sufi perspective. Among other things, it describes the metaphysics of light and the relationship between divine light and the human soul. It is written in terse language and cites numerous Quranic passages in its argument.

The text has three chapters. Chapter one analyzes the first sentence of the verse, and chapters two and three expand on the interpretation outlined. God's light, also identified with existence and knowledge, is described as the source underpinning creation. Al-Ghazali frequently uses analogies between the natural and supernatural world in his argument. He describes the role of purification in the soul's attempt to grasp divine illumination and the "holy prophetic spirit".[1]

The Laṭā'if (Arabic: اللطائف) are special organs of perception and psycho-physiological functioning in Sufi spirituality. Depending on context, the laṭā'if (plural) are also understood to be the experiential qualities or forms of those perceptions and functions.

The Arabic word laṭīfa (singular) means “subtlety” and the phrase laṭā'if-e-sitta means “six subtleties” (although the number of laṭā'if can differ depending on the specific Sufi tradition).

The laṭā'if are viewed as components of Man's spiritual “Organ of Evolution”, [2] known as Qalb (Heart) (See "Disambiguation: Qalb (Heart) or Qalb (laṭīfa)").

The integration of the laṭā'if into Qalb is considered by some Sufi orders -- especially the Naqshbandi -- to be a central part of the comprehensive spiritual development that produces the Sufi ideal of a Complete Human Being (Al-Insān al-Kāmil).

Different understandings of the laṭā'if

Not all Sufi orders teach about the laṭā'if. Of those which do, descriptions and understandings can differ depending on the specific Sufi lineage and exponent representing it.

In addition, individual Sufi teachers (see Sheikh (Sufism)) sometimes understand aspects of laṭā'if theory and practice according to how the laṭā'if have been uniquely revealed to them.[3]

In general, there are at least three major historical understandings of the laṭāʾif:

(13th century) The Kubrāwī order, exemplified by Ala ud-Daula Simnani (1261–1336), views the laṭāʾif as potential psychospiritual organs/capacities that can be realized as progressive stages in those undergoing spiritual development;

(17th century) The Mujaddidīyya branch of the Naqshbandi order, exemplified by Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624), views the laṭāʾif as psychospiritual organs/capacities that are potential receptors of Divine energy[3] when activated in those undergoing spiritual development;

(20th century) The Punjab tradition within the Naqshbandi order, exemplified by Idries Shah (1924–1996), views the laṭāʾif as actual human psycho-physiological organs/capacities that are implicit in everyday life and made explicit in those undergoing spiritual development.

Kubrāwī laṭāʾif (13th century)

According to the view of the Kubrawi Order there are seven laṭāʾif. They are understood cosmologically as “descending” levels through which reality is created and structured.[4]
[5]

In the process of spiritual development, the Sufi student is understood to “ascend” back through these levels progressively (see ontological Arcs of Descent and Ascent in Sufism).

The attainment of each level is associated with the activation/realization of a corresponding spiritual organ/capacity, interpreted symbolically through Islamic cosmology and the prophets and messengers in Islam.[6]

In ascending order they are:

Qalab (associated with an experience of the color gray) represents the acquisition of a new organ, an embryonic subtle body. It is understood symbolically as “the Adam of one’s being”, since Adam was the first human being.

Nafs (color blue) is an organ that corresponds to the animal soul and is a testing ground for struggle with desires and passions. It is understood symbolically as “the Noah of one’s being”, since Noah faced the same situation in dealing with the hostility of his people.

Qalb (color red) is the organ that will develop to become the True Ego, the real personal individuality. It is understood symbolically as “the Abraham of one’s being”, since the prophet Abraham historically represents the establishment of real religion.

Sirr (color white) is an organ of superconsciousness. It is understood symbolically as “the Moses of one’s being”, since the prophet Moses participated in spiritual communication with God through this consciousness.

Ruḥ (color yellow) is an organ through which an individual becomes capable of acting as vice-regent of God. It is understood symbolically as “the David of one’s being”, since the prophet David fulfilled that role.

Khafi (color black) is the subtle organ that receives spiritual inspiration. It is understood symbolically as “the Jesus of one’s being”, since the prophet Jesus was characteristic of such inspiration.

Ḥaqq (color green) is the subtle organ that is the final achievement of spiritual development: the True Ego. It is understood symbolically as “the Muḥammad of one’s being”, since Muḥammad was the final prophet.

Naqshbandi laṭā’if (Mujaddidiyya) (17th century)

According to the view of the Mujaddidiyya branch of the Naqshbandi order there are five laṭā’if.[7] The reception of each laṭīfa’s “spiritual energy” from its corresponding cosmic realm is interpreted symbolically through the prophets and messengers in Islam, similar to the interpretation of the Kubrawi order:

Ikhfa (color green; located at sternum) (Muḥammad)

In this understanding, the laṭā’if all have their physical association in the chest and so are said to be “of the Heart” (Qalb, the potential human “Organ of Evolution” -- see “Disambiguation: Qalb (Heart) or Qalb (Laṭīfa)”).

Naqshbandi laṭā’if (Punjab tradition) (20th century)

According to the Punjab tradition within the Naqshbandi order, which emphasizes modern-day psychological aspects of Sufism,[8] there are five laṭā’if:[9]

Qalb (color yellow; experienced in left side of the body)

Ruḥ (color red; experienced in right side of the body)

Sirr (color white; experienced in solar plexus)

Khafi (color black; experienced in forehead)

Ikhfa (color green; experienced in center of chest)

Spiritual development and the laṭā'if

For Sufi traditions that teach the laṭā'if, spiritual development is undertaken on two dimensions:

refinement of the egoic, psycho-physiological "self", known as "Nafs"[17] activation (realization/opening/awakening/energizing/illumination (tajalli)) of the laṭā'if.

The egoic Self is said to proceed through seven stages of development, the primitive stages of which distort or "veil" (see Hijab (Sufism)) full realization of the laṭā'if. In most Sufi traditions, accordingly, a general, progressive refinement of the Nafs precedes any explicit activation of the laṭā'if.

In the Naqshbandi tradition, however, it is the reverse: the activation of specific laṭā'if is used to facilitate the progressive refinement of the Nafs. This is why the Naqshbandi teaching method is known as "where others end, there marks our beginning" ("indiraj al-nihayat fi'l-bidayat").[18]

See also: "Disambiguation: Nafs (Egoic Self) or Nafs (Laṭīfa)".

Activation of the laṭā'if

Just as interpretations of the laṭā'if vary depending on different Sufi traditions and teachers, so do methods of their activation.

The process of activating each laṭīfa consists of various methods, singly or in combination, such as:

Dhikr ("remembrance"): recitation of a Quranic phrase accompanied by postures, breathing, and movement[19]

Muraqabah ("watching"): persistent awareness directed to the part of the body associated with the laṭīfa[20]

Tawajjuh ("attention"): intentional transmission of the laṭīfa directly from teacher to student.[21]

Kubrawi

In the Kubrawi tradition, Sufi Ala ud-Daula Simnani (1261–1336) describes a dhikr type practice that involved certain postures, the rotation of attention and breath to different parts of the physical body, and the recitation of a Quranic credal formula.[22][23]

Khwajagan

In the Khwajagan tradition, Rif'at Bey describes a practice in which the name of Allah is imagined "written in letters of light" at the physical location associated with a laṭīfa and repeated silently until the color associated with it is seen surrounding the letters.[13]

Naqshbandi (Mujaddidiyya)

In the Mujaddidiyya tradition, the laṭā'if are opened through practice one-by-one in "ascending" order, beginning with Qalb. Viewed as a progressive activation, each laṭīfa (or progressive combination of laṭā'if) is considered to be a level of spiritual realization.

The method of opening each laṭīfa typically begins with a direct transmission of Barakah (spiritual Presence) by teacher to student, and can also include physical touch (except for women) and the disclosure of a specific one of the Divine Names of God in Islam.

The student then continues the practice by silent dhikr of the Name, concentrating attention on the laṭīfa's location; sometimes a visualization of the Name, the corresponding prophet, or the teacher is also added.[24]

Naqshbandi (Awaisi)

In the Awaisi tradition,[25] the laṭāʾif are illuminated through a dhikr cycle that begins with Qalb and continues with the other six laṭāʾif in order. The student inhales vigorously into the Qalb(Heart) with a silent, attentive “Allah” and exhales out to the specific laṭīfa with a silent, attentive “Hu”.

(See also: corresponding video in "External Links").

Naqshbandi (Punjab)

In the Punjab tradition, Idries Shah describes a type of muraqabah in which the student concentrates awareness on the part of the body that is associated with a laṭīfa.[26]

Direct experiences of the laṭāʾif

With rare exceptions, direct and explicit experiences of the laṭāʾif only arise in human beings who have undergone a spiritual evolution. These experiences can be of several different types, singly or in combination, among them:

“Visual” experiences

“Tactile” experiences

Kubrawi

In Persian Sufi Illuminationism (see: Najm al-Din Kubra), all creation is a successive outflow from the original Supreme Light of Lights (Nur al-Anwar) (see: Nūr (Islam)). The cosmology of this tradition is a kind of Emanationism in which immaterial Light descends from the Light of Lights in ever-diminishing intensity. In other words, Creation at all levels of its existence—including that of the laṭāʾif—is made up of varying degrees of Light.

Accordingly, the experiences of the laṭāʾif are both an external “visual” experience of photisms (“acts of light”) and a tactile inner sensation, as described by Henry Corbin. [27]

Khwajagan

The laṭāʾif are experienced primarily as colors seen surrounding the name of Allah at the physical location associated with each laṭīfa, as described by Rifaʿt Bey.[13]

Naqshbandi (Punjab)

Direct and explicit realizations of the laṭāʾif are experienced primarily as differentiated, localized forms of an overall tactile spiritual Presence (“Ḥuḍūr”[28]) in the body.[29]

Indirect experiences of the laṭāʾif

Beyond direct and explicit experiences of the laṭāʾif, Sufi traditions can differ in their understanding of how the laṭāʾif affect human experience indirectly and implicitly.

Kubrawi

In traditions similar to the Kubrawi, for example, the laṭāʾif are only activated after the Nafs has been refined by other means.

As a result, the experiences of the laṭāʾif are viewed as higher spiritual capacities and virtues that are unrelated to the conventional experiences and capacities of the lower egoic Self (Nafs).

Naqshbandi

In traditions similar to the Naqshbandi, however, the process of activating the laṭāʾif is understood to itself contribute to the refinement of the Nafs. This refinement is experienced both as a reduction in specific vices and an increase in corresponding virtues.

Such changes in the egoic Self can therefore be understood as indirect, secondary effects of the (partially or wholly) activated laṭāʾif.

The activation of the Ruḥ laṭīfa, for example, is often connected with overcoming personal weakness and anger and replacing it with healthy strength and assertiveness.

Naqshbandi (Punjab)

Finally, traditions similar to the Naqshbandi (Punjab) understand the laṭāʾif to be spiritual organs/capacities that also underlie ordinary forms of human perception and functioning.

As such, they are thought to be activated and operating implicitly at all times and appear indirectly through the corresponding experiences that they pattern on the conventional mental/emotional/somatic level of the egoic Self.

Naqshbandi influenced [30] spiritual teacher Hameed Ali (A. H. Almaas) (1944–) understands some of these laṭāʾif and psycho-physiological correspondences as follows: [31]

Qalb (Enjoyment)

Ruḥ (Vitality)

Sirr (Confidence)

Khafi (Stillness)

Ikhfa (Sensitivity)

(See also: corresponding video in "External Links").

Disambiguation of the laṭāʾif

Even among traditions that recognize the laṭāʾif, Sufi teachings often include other features or terminology that have ambiguous relationships to the laṭāʾif.

In addition, there is perennial potential for ambiguity in discussing the laṭāʾif (both in primary sources and in their English translation) arising from the way that words in Arabic can have different meanings in different contexts.[32]

Arabic, Quranic, or Sufi meaning of laṭāʾif

The word laṭāʾif is the plural of the transliterated Arabic word laṭīfa, from the tripartite verb la-ṭa-fa, which means “to be subtle”. [33]

It assumed a spiritual meaning in the Qurʾan where Al-Laṭīf is one of the 99 names of God in Islam, reflecting His subtle nature.[33][34]

And it was subsequently adopted by Sufism to refer to various aspects of reality that are not gross, material qualities of the physical world (see, for example, "Disambiguation: Ten, five, or six laṭāʾif"). [35]

Transliteration or translation or interpretation of the laṭāʾif

English language authors use one or more of three methods when referring to specific laṭāʾif:

a transliteration of the Arabic word associated with the laṭīfa a translation of the word's general Arabic meaning an interpretation of the corresponding experience that is the word's specific Sufi meaning.

Laleh Bahktiar[4] uses both a transliteration and a translation:

Laṭāʾif (“Subtle [Organs]”)

Qalabīya (“Mold”)

Nafsīya (“Soul”)

Qalbīya (“Heart”)

Sirrīya (“Secret”)

Ruḥīya (“Spirit”)

Khafīya (“Inspiration”)

Haqqīya (“Seal”)

Idries Shah also[36] uses both a transliteration and a translation:

Laṭāʾif (“[Five] Subtleties”)

Qalb (“Mind”)

Ruḥ (“Spirit”)

Sirr (“Consciousness”)

Khafi (“Intuition”)

Ikhfa (“Deep perception of Consciousness”)

Hameed Ali[37] uses a transliteration and an interpretation:

Laṭāʾif

Qalb (“Joy”)

Ruḥ (“Strength”)

Sirr (“Will”)

Khafi ("Peace")

Ikhfa ("Compassion")

Ten, five, or six laṭā'if

In the version of Sufi cosmology proposed by Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624),[38] God created the universe in three stages:

First came the "World of God's Command" (alam al-amr), which emerged instantly when God said, "Be!" The five subtle qualities (laṭā'if) of God's Command were: Qalb, Ruh, Sirr, Khafi, and Ikhfa.

Then came the "World of God's Creation" (alam al-khalq), which emerged through a process of evolution. The five subtle qualities (laṭā'if) which patterned that Creation were: Consciousness (Nafs), Air (Baad), Fire (Nar), Water (Ma), and Earth (Khak). Finally, God created human beings, which combined the "World of God's Command" with the "World of God's Creation".

In this usage, then, there are ten laṭā'if in two categories:

five relating to the "World of God's Command" and five relating to the "World of God's Creation".

In contrast, in most Sufi usages outside this cosmological one (including most of this webpage), there are either:

five laṭā'if (from the first category alone, the "World of God's Command") or six laṭā'if (the five from the first category . . . plus Nafs from the second category, the "World of God's Creation") .

Inter-relationship of laṭā'if

Most Sufi traditions arrange the individual laṭā'if in some specific order.

For example, the laṭīfa Qalb is often given first priority because its activation is the student's first orientation to the related presence and importance of Qalb (Heart) -- Man's spiritual "Organ of Evolution".

In the Kubrawi tradition, the laṭā'if are understood to reflect the hierarchy of successive historical prophets and messengers, beginning with Adam and culminating with Muhammad. The student's spiritual development is thought to unfold from an earlier, more limited revelation to a later, more complete one.

In the Naqshbandi (Mujaddidi) tradition, the realization of the laṭā'if is sometimes understood to be not only progressive but also cumulative; each new laṭīfa's realization is a comprehensive combination of that laṭīfa and all previously realized laṭā'if.

Finally, in those traditions that emphasize modern day psychological aspects of Sufism, the order of activation of the laṭā'if is sometimes determined by the individual student's personal history. A student might, for example, have one or another laṭīfa that is less "veiled" than another, in which case it could be the first laṭīfa emphasized for activation.

Nafs (Egoic Self) or Nafs (laṭīfa)

The Nafs in Sufism is considered to be a person's egoic consciousness[39] or egoic, psycho-physiological "Self". It is the subtle (laṭīfa) quality of "God's Creation" that becomes individual and can undergo a spiritual development. This makes it unlike the five laṭā'if of "God's Command", which are transcendent, unchanging qualities.

Ruḥ (Spirit) or Ruḥ (laṭīfa)

The word "Ruḥ" is used in Sufism in two different ways, on two different levels:

"Ruḥ", as one of the laṭā'if described in the foregoing

"Ruh" (Spirit), as the Divine Spirit or "essence" in human beings, created by God from his own Spirit.[40]

Qalb (Heart) or Qalb (laṭīfa)

The word "Qalb", like "Ruḥ", is used in Sufism in two different ways, on two different levels:

"Qalb", as one of the laṭā'if described in the foregoing

"Qalb" (Heart), as the "Organ of Evolution" in human beings, the potential integration of Ruḥ (the Divine Spirit) and Nafs (the egoic Self).[41]

Sirr (Secret) or Sirr (laṭīfa)

The word "Sirr", like "Ruḥ" and "Qalb", is also used in Sufism in two different ways, on two different levels:

"Sirr", as one of the laṭā'if described in the foregoing

"Sirr" ("Secret"), as a super-conscious state of Qalb (Heart) or Ruḥ (Spirit) experienced as unity with God.[42]

Laṭā'if and the Jism Latif

The integration of the laṭā'if into Qalb (Heart) is understood by Sufism to also represent the development of a corresponding subtle body known, in some traditions, as the "Jism Latif".[43]

Whereas Qalb (Heart) emphasizes the psycho-physiological functions of the laṭā'if, the Jism Latif emphasizes their underlying spiritual substance and persistent spiritual Presence ("Ḥuḍūr"[44]).

The Jism Latif is said to exist in one of ten forms, corresponding to the level of spiritual development an individual has undergone in life. As such, it is also the corresponding level at which a human being survives physical death.[45]

See also: "Disambiguation: Qalab or Sultan al-Azkar".

Qalab or Sultan al-Azkar

The laṭīfa named "Qalab" in the Kubrawi tradition is equivalent to the laṭīfa named "Sulṭan al-Azkar" ("King of Zikrs"[46]) in the Naqshbandi (Awaisi) tradition.[47] Traditions that recognize this laṭīfa consider its realization to be the realization of a subtle body.

(See also "Disambiguation: Laṭāʾif and the Jism Latif").

Some (like the Kubrawi) consider Qalab to be a preliminary realization of the subtle body and therefore the first laṭīfa to be activated in spiritual practise. In this perspective, the realization of subsequent laṭāʾif is considered to be a refinement and differentiation of the subtle body.

Other traditions (like the Awaisi) consider Sultan al-Azkar to be a comprehensive realization of the subtle body and therefore the final laṭīfa to be activated in practise.[48] In this perspective, the subtle body is considered to be a unification and integration of previously realized laṭāʾif [49].

Ḥal (State), Maqam (Station), or laṭīfa

In addition to the laṭāʾif, some[50][51] Sufi traditions also speak about two other categories of conscious experience that can arise during spiritual practice:

“Ḥal” (State), is a temporary altered state of consciousness arising from psychological or spiritual influences acting upon a student. They are considered to be gifts from God that arise in experience and disappear, usually immediately.

“Maqam” (Station or Stage), is one of seven permanent stages of a Sufi's spiritual development/embodiment/transformation achieved by his own effort.

There appears to be no consensus that the laṭāʾif are directly related to either of the categories Ḥal or Maqam.

Laṭāʾif and the number "Seven"

The number "seven" appears repeatedly in Islam and in Sufism, to reflect the relationships between entities within various categories.

In Islam, "seven" appears in the Quran, in the Hajj pilgrimage, and in the "Seven Heavens", among others. In Sufism, it appears in seven laṭāʾif, seven stages of Nafs development, and seven Maqamat.

In some cases this use of "seven" is understood literally . . . while in other cases it is understood to be a metaphor for an "infinite" or "complete" number of entities.[52]

Additionally, there is not always a consensus about correlating one category of seven things with another.

For example, Ala ud-Daula Simnani explicitly correlates the seven progressive laṭāʾif with the seven ontological levels of Islamic cosmology, whereas other Sufi orders, which recognize only five laṭāʾif, do not.

Divine Names or laṭāʾif

The Divine Names of God in Islam are understood by Sufism to refer (in the great majority of cases) to the relational action, functioning, or appearance of transcendental

Divine Attributes/Qualities in immanent, manifest reality.[53]

The laṭāʾif, in contrast, while capable of being experienced indirectly through the somatic, emotional, and mental states they pattern in conventional experience, are primarily direct transcendental experiences of Divine Attributes themselves.[54]

There appears to be no consensus that the laṭāʾif are directly related to the Divine Names.

The laṭāʾif outside Sufism

In addition to Sufism itself, the laṭāʾif are also found in certain spiritual teachings whose founders have been influenced by Sufism.

The Fourth Way

The Fourth Way is an approach to human self-development introduced to Europe in the early 20th century by George Gurdjieff (1867-1949) and his student P.D. Ouspensky (1878-1947). Substantial parts of the teaching are thought to be derived from Naqshbandi Sufism.[55]

For example, there are said to be seven Centers (Fourth Way) within human beings that organise specific functions:

Five “lower” centers: the "Intellectual", "Emotional", "Moving", "Instinctive", and "Sexual", which are understood to operate explicitly in humans from birth.[56]

Two “higher” centers: the "Higher Emotional" and "Higher Intellectual", which are understood to operate implicitly in humans but which can become explicit in those who undergo a spiritual development.[57]

In this teaching, the qualities of the Higher Emotional Center (equivalent to Qalb (Heart) in Sufism) are known as “Positive Emotions” or “sacred impulses”. [58]

John G. Bennett (1897-1974), a contemporary student of both Ouspensky and Gurdjieff, researched the sources of Gurdjieff’s teaching and concluded that these Positive Emotions were in fact derived from the laṭāʾif of Sufism.[59]

Nevertheless, specific knowledge and realization of the Positive Emotions as laṭāʾif are rarely emphasized in schools of the Fourth Way teaching today.

The Diamond Approach

The Diamond Approach is a spiritual teaching developed by Hameed Ali (A. H. Almaas) (1944–) and Faisal Muqaddam (1946-) beginning in the 1970s. The history of the teaching was influenced both by Idries Shah and by Gurdjieff’s Fourth Way.[60]

It confirms the Naqshbandi (Punjab) understanding of five fundamental laṭāʾif and then expands it to include dozens of similar human capacities for which the more general term “Essential Aspects” is adopted.[61]

Unlike the Gurdjieff/Ouspensky Fourth Way, the Diamond Approach uses various mental, emotive, and somatic methods for realizing the laṭāʾif, as a central part of its overall teaching and practice.[62]

History of the laṭāʾif

The spiritual experiences identified by Sufism as the laṭāʾif have their immediate historical antecedents in the Emanationism of Neoplatonism[63] (3rd century AD), which is known to have influenced the subsequent development of Sufism (see: Platonism in Islamic philosophy). The Emanations of Neoplatonism, in turn, arose from the Theory of forms of Plato (4th century BC).

The general concept of spiritual “subtle centers” originated within Persian Sufism: Junayd of Baghdad (835–910), al-Hallaj (858–922),[64] and Shahab al-Din Abu Hafs Umar Suhrawardi (1145–1234).[65]

Kubrawi Sufi Najm al-Din Razi (1177–1256) proposed five “inner means of perception” (Qalb, Ruh, Sirr, Khafi, and Ikhfa) that parallel the five physical senses. It’s unclear to commentators whether these inner senses were already understood as laṭāʾif at that time.[66]

The earliest systematic formulation of the laṭāʾif is thought to be that of Kubrawi Ala ud-Daula Simnani (1261–1336),[6] who proposed seven laṭāʾif, relating them to the seven ontological levels of Sufi cosmology.[67]

From the 17th to 19th centuries, the Indian Mujaddidis, beginning with Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624), returned to a standardized interpretation of five experiential laṭāʾif and associated their locations with parts of the physical body.[68]

The Punjab tradition within the Naqshbandi in the late 19th and 20th centuries continued with five laṭāʾif but identified the experience of their physical locations differently and viewed them as spiritual organs/capacities that also underlie ordinary forms of human consciousness.[69]

It is thought by some[70] that, just as with the nominal 99 Names of God in Islam and their underlying Divine Attributes,[71] the number of laṭāʾif and their potential realization by humanity might actually be unlimited.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

I HAVE greatly profited from hints, generously lavished in the course of correspondence, from Professors D.B. MACDONALD, R. NICHOLSON, and LOUIS MASSIGNON, in addition to recent works by the last two. My cordial thanks to these; and also to Professor D.S. MARGOLIOUTH for discussing with me some of the difficult points in the translation.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE

I AM so conscious that my general equipment was insufficient to warrant my having undertaken an introduction to this treatise (in addition to the translation), that my utmost hope is this,--that what I have written may be regarded by lenient Orientalists as something to elicit--provoke, if you will--the necessary supplementing and formative criticism; or as useful materials to be built into some more authoritative and better informed work: and that they may from this point of view be inclined to pardon what otherwise might seem an unwarrantable piece of rashness and indiscretion.

A still greater presumption remains to be forgiven, but this time on the ground of the great human simplicities, when I venture to inscribe this work, in spite of everything, to the beloved memory of

--that golden-hearted man--who in 1911 introduced me to the Mishkât; and to join with his

{p. viii}

who first introduced me to the Mishkât's author. Of these twain, the latter may perhaps forgive the lapses of a pupil because of the filial joy with which, I know well, he will see the two names joined together, howsoever or by whomsoever it was done. As for the former, . . . in Abraham's bosom all things are forgiven.

INTRODUCTION

The references in square brackets are to the pages of the Cairo Arabic edition, and to the present English translation.

THE MISHKÂT AL-ANWAR[1] is a work of extreme interest from the viewpoint of al-Ghazzâlî's[2] inner life and esoteric thought. The glimpses it gives of that life and thought are remarkably, perhaps uniquely, intimate. It begins where his autobiographical Al-Munqidh min al-Dalâl leaves off. Its esotericism excited the curiosity and even the suspicion of Muslim thinkers from the first, and we have deeply interesting allusions to it in Ibn Tufayl and Ibn Rushd,[4] the celebrated philosophers of Western Islam, who flourished within the century after al-Ghazzâlî's death in 1111 (A.H. 505)--a fact which, again, increases its importance and interest for us.

[1. The Mishkât al-Anwâr is numbered No. 34 in Brockelmann's Geschichte der Arabischen Literatur (vol. i, p. 423). It was printed in Cairo (matba`at as Sidq, A. H. 1322), to which edition the references in the present work are made. There is another edition in a collection of five opuscles of Ghazzâlî under the title of the first of the five, Faisal al-Tafriqa.

I. DATE, OBJECT, AND GENERAL CONTENTS

There is no way of fixing the Precise date of this treatise; but it falls among his later ones, perhaps among the latest; the most important hint we get from Ghazzâlî himself being that the book was written after his Magnum opus, the Ihyâ'al Ulûm (p. [9]). Other works of Ghazzâlî mentioned by him in this treatise are the Mi`âr al-`Ilm, Mahakk al-Nazar, and al-Maqsad al-Asnâ.

The object of the opuscle is to expound a certain Koran verse and a certain Tradition. The former is the celebrated Light-Verse (S. 24, 35) and the latter the Veils-Tradition. It is divided into three sections, of which the first is considerably the longest.

In this first section he considers the word "light" itself, and its plural "lights," as applied to physical light and lights; to the eye; to the intelligence (i.e. intellect or reason); to prophets; to supernal beings; and finally to Allah himself, who is shown to be not the only source of light and of these lights, but also the only real actual light in all existence.

In the second section we have some most interesting prolegomena to the whole subject of symbolic language in the Koran and Traditions, and its interpretation. Symbols are shown to be no mere metaphors. There is a real mystical nexus between symbol and symbolized, type and antitype, outer and inner. The symbols are infinitely numerous, very much more numerous than those mentioned in Koran, or Traditions. Every object on earth "perhaps" has its correlative in the unseen, spiritual world. This doctrine of symbols reminds us of the Platonic "ideas" and their earthly copies, and of the "patterns of things in the heavens" and "the example and shadow [on earth] of heavenly things" in the Epistle to the Hebrews. A notable deduction is made from this doctrine, namely, the equal incumbency of keeping the outward letter (zâhir) of the Law as well as its inner meaning (bâtin). Nearly all the most advanced Sûfis were zealous and Minutely scrupulous keepers of the ritual, ceremonial, and other prescriptions of the Sunna law, and Ghazzâlî here supplies a quasi-philosophical basis for this fidelity--a fidelity which some of the bolder and more extreme mystics found illogical and "unspiritual".

In the third section the results of this symbology are applied to the Verse and Tradition in question. In the former the beautiful, and undeniably intriguing expressions of the Koran--the Light, the Niche, the Glass, the Oil, Tree, the East and the West--are explained both on psychological and religio-metaphysical lines; and a similar exegesis is applied to the tradition of the Seventy Thousand Veils.

II. MYSTERIES LEFT VEILED IN THIS TREATISE

In the course of all this Ghazzâlî gives us, incidentally, much that excites our curiosity to the highest degree; though always, when we get to the crucial point, we meet a "perhaps," or a patronizing allusion to the immaturity of his less-initiated reader. (Ghazzâlî's hesitations--"it may be," "perhaps", etc.--are worthy of study in this treatise. They do not so much have the impression of hesitancy in his own mind, as of a desire to "fence" a little with his reader.) He himself writes "incommunicable mystery" across a number of these passages. Thus, the nature of the human intelligence and its peculiar affinity to the divine (pp. 16, 71); the mystic "state" of al-Hallâj, and other "inebriates," and the expressions they emit in their mystic intoxication (p. [20]) --"behind which truths," says Ghazzâlî, "also lie secrets which it is not lawful to enter upon"; the astounding passage (p. [24]) in which to the supreme Adept of the mystical Union with deity are ascribed features and functions of very deity; the real explanation of the word tawhîd, involving as it does the question of the reality of the universe and the nature of the soul's union or identification with deity; the nature of the Commander (al-Mutâ`) of the universe, and whether he be Allah or an ineffable supreme Vicegerent; who that Vicegerent is, and why it must be he and not Allâh who performs the prime function of the cosmos-ruler, viz. the issue of the command for the moving of the primum mobile, whereby all the motions of the Heavenly (and the Sublunary) spheres are set a-going; and the final mystery of Allah-an-sich, a Noumenal Deity, in whose case transcendence is to be carried to such a pitch that gnosticism and agnosticism meet, and the validity of every possible or conceivable predication is denied, whether of act or attribute (see p. [55])--all these things are incommunicable mysteries, secrets, from the revealing of which our author turns away at the exact moment when we expect the denouement. The art is supreme--but something more than tantalizing. Who were the adepts to whom he did communicate these thrilling secrets? Were these communications ever written down for or by his brother initiates? Or did he ever communicate them? Was there really anything to communicate? If so, what?

III. A GHAZZALIAN PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION

On the whole it is the final section on the Veils-Tradition which, though really of the nature of an appendix, contains the most numerous and the most interesting problems for the study of Ghazzâlî's inner life, thought, and convictions. This tradition speaks of "Seventy Thousand Veils of Light and Darkness" which veil pure Godhead from the human soul. The origin of the tradition is, it is safe to hazard, Neoplatonic, and it therefore lent itself completely to the gnostic and theosophical mode of thought which so soon invaded Muslim Sûfism after its less successful effort to capture orthodox Christianity. Accordingly Muslim mystics seem to have seized upon the tradition with avidity, though they interpret it variously. For an entirely Neoplatonic, theosophical interpretation, as expounded by Rifâ'i dervishes, the translator's "'Way' of a Mohammedan Mystic" may be consulted.[1] According to this version, the soul, in its upward Seven-fold Way to Union with pure Deity, is at every stage stripped of 10,000 of these Veils, the dark ones first and then the bright. After that the naked soul stands face to face with naked Deity, with Absolute Being, with an unveiled Sun, with unadulterated Light. Ghazzâlî's treatment is different. According to him, these Veils are various according to the varieties of the natures which they veil from the One Real. And it is the classification of these natures, which is thus involved, that supplies rich material for an unusually inside view of Ghazzâlî's real views concerning men, doctrines, religions, and sects. It is not the orthodox schoolman, the fierce dogmatist, the rigid mutakallim, who is now speaking. We have the sensation of overhearing Ghazzâlî as he speaks aloud to his own soul, or to a circle of initiates. It is hardly less than an outline of a philosophy of religion with which we have to do. He divides mankind into four classes: those veiled with veils of pure darkness; those veiled with veils of mixed darkness and light; those veiled with veils of pure light; and those who attain to the vision of the Unveiled. Every line of this part of the work merits and requires the closest study. It is not possible to give this detailed study here--it has been given elsewhere, and to that the reader must be referred.[1] But a summary of Ghazzâlî's classification of souls and creeds may be given here, for thus, even more effectively than by an extended study, may a vivid preliminary appreciation be gained of the importance of this section for students of the Ghazzâlî problem. He begins at the bottom and works up the light-ladder, rung by rung, to the very top, thus giving a gradation of human natures and human creeds in respect of their approach to absolute truth. Sometimes the grades are definitely identified by the author. In other cases they may be certainly, or nearly certainly, identified from the description he gives. In the following summary Ghazzâlî's own identifications are given between round brackets; inferred identifications certain or nearly certain, between square brackets.

{p. 9}

Class I.--Those veiled with Veils of pure Darkness

Atheists--

(a) Naturist philosophers whose god is Nature,

(b) Egotists whose god is Self.

Subdivisions of (b):--

(1) Seekers after sensual pleasures (the bestial attributes).

(2) Seekers after dominion ("Arabs, some Kurds, and (the very numerous Fools").

(3) Seekers after filthy lucre

(4) Seekers after vainglory

(2-4) (the ferocious attributes).

Class II.--Those veiled with Veils of mixed Darkness and Light

{p. 10}

A. THOSE WHOSE DARKNESS ORIGINATES IN THE SENSES

(1) Image-worshippers. [Polytheists of the Hellenic (? and Indian) type.]

(2) Worshippers of animate objects of physical beauty. (Some of the most remote Turkish tribes.)

(3) Fire-worshippers. [Magians.]

(4) Astrologizing Star-worshippers. [Star-worshippers of Harran: ?Sabîans.]

(5) Sun-worshippers.

(6) Light-worshippers, with their dualistic acknowledgement of a supreme correlative Darkness. (Zoroastrians of the cult of Ormuzd and Ahrimân.)

B. THOSE WHOSE DARKNESS ORIGINATES IN THE IMAGINATION

(1) Corporealists. {p. 11}

[Extreme Hanbalites: Zâhirites.]

(2) Karrâmites.

(3) Those who have eliminated all spatial ideas in regard to Allâh except the literal "up-above".

[Ibn Hanbal.[1] Hanbalites.[2]]

C. THOSE WHOSE DARKNESS ORIGINATES IN THE [DISCURSIVE][3] INTELLIGENCE

[Various sorts of Mutakallimîn]

(1) Anthropomorphists in respect of the Seven Attributes of Allah, "Hearing, Seeing," etc., and especially the "Word" of Allah.

(Those who said that the Word of Allah has letters and sounds like ours.) [Early literalists; Hanbalites: early Ash`arites.]

(2) Those who said that the word of Allah

[1. Faisal al-Tafriqa, p. 10.

2. Averroes adds to these (with justice) the Koran; Mohammed himself; the "Early Fathers"; al-Ash'ari; and the early Ash`arites--before the time of Abul Ma'âli," says Averroes, loc. cit. i.e. of al-Juwainî, The Imâm al-Haramain, our author's Shaikh, d. 478 (see his al-Kashf 'an manâhij al-adillâ', ed. Müller, p. 65, Cairo ed., p. 54.)

3. For according to Ghazzâlî the genuine axiomata of the pure intelligence are infallible. See p. [10], and an important autobiographical passage near the beginning of the Munqidh.]

{p. 12}

is like our mental speech (hadith al-nafs.)

[Later Ash`arites.]

Class III.--Those veiled by pure Light

[i.e. purged of all anthropomorphism (tashbîh)]

(1) Those whose views about the Attributes were sound, but who refused to define Allah by means of them: replying to the question "What is the Lord of the World?" by saying, "The Lord, who transcends the ideas of those attributes; He, the Mover and Orderer of the Heavens."

(2) Those who mounted higher than the preceding, in declaring that Allah is the mover of only the primum mobile (the Ninth and outermost Heaven), which causes the movement of the other Eight, mediated by their respective Angels.

[Sûfî philosophers. (?) Al-Fârâbî.]

(3) Those who mount higher than these {p. 13} again, in putting a supreme Angel in place of Allah, Who now moves the heavens by commanding this supreme Angel, but not immediately by direct action.

Class IV.--The Unveiled who Attain

Those who will predicate nothing whatsoever of Allah, and refuse to allow that He even issues the order for the moving of the primum mobile. This Commander (Mutâ`) is now a Vicegerent, who is related to the Absolute Being as the sun to Essential Light or live coal to the Element of Fire.

(1) Adepts who preserve self-consciousness in their absorption in this Absolute, all else being effaced.

(2) Adepts whose self-consciousness is also effaced ("the Fewest of the Few") [al-Hallâj and the extreme Mystics],

(a) who attain to this State with a single leap--as Abraham "al-Khalîl" did, {p. 14}

(b) who attain to it by stages,--as Mohammed "al-Habîb" did [at the Mi`râj].

IV. GHAZZALI PROBLEMS RAISED BY THE FOREGOING

The mere perusal of this graded scale of systems and of souls shows at once its extraordinary interest because of its revelation of Ghazzâlî's innermost thought about these things, and because of the piquancy and difficulty of some of the problems raised. In the discussion of the whole subject the reader is referred to, the monograph upon the Mishkât to which allusion has been made. The problems may be indicated here in the form of questions, for the sake of defining them as particularly as possible:--

(1) How is it that some reputable Moslems are grouped with Idolators and Dualists in the second division ("mixed light and dark")?

(2) How is it that Jews and Christians are neither mentioned nor alluded to in this rather full sketch for a philosophy of religion? And where could they have been fitted in if they had been mentioned?

{p. 15}

(3) How is it that the later Ash`arites, the standard orthodox Theologians, are placed so low, viz. in the division where there are still veils of darkness?

(4) How is that the Mu`tazilites are neither mentioned nor alluded to; and that, according. to the differentia of the highest section of the second division, it would be inevitable to place them above the orthodox Ash`arites?

(5) How is it that the most pious believers of the earliest and most venerated type come no higher than the lowest section of the third division?

(6) How is it that to such men is ascribed any special concern about Allah as "mover of the Heavens"[1]

(7) How is it that the various doctrines about the mode of this Moving of the Heavens is made the main if not the sole differentia of the (ascending) grades of this division, though in other works Ghazzâlî treats this very matter with marked coolness[2]? How is it that on this

[1. This is all the more marked because the words are Ghazzâlî's own gloss on a quotation from the Koran; see below.

2. E.g. Tahâfut, pp. 57, 60.]

is explicitly said to turn the superiority of the schools of Sûfî's over the pious Believers, and the superiority of one school of Sûfî's over another?

(8) How is it that this matter of Moving the Heavens is considered so particularly to threaten the Unity of Allah, and that that Unity is only saved when He is relieved from even the function of Commanding the (outermost) Heaven to be moved?

(9) And who is this Commander who thus commands, and who orders all things, and who is related to pure Being as the Sun to Elemental Light? And what was "the mystery (in this affair), the disclosure of which this book does not admit of"?

(10) What becomes of a Deity of whom nothing whatsoever can even be said or predicated? And how, then, can a "relation" between Him and His Vicegerent be asserted, still more described as above? And how can this Unknowable, Unimaginable and Inconceivable be nevertheless "reached" by mystic souls?

(11) What was "the book" into which Ghazzâlî himself says he put all his esoteric teaching (Jawâhir, p. 31); which he implores any into whose hands it may fall not to publish; which Ibn Tufail denies could have been this Mishkât (Hayy, ed. Gautier, pp. 13-15, trans. Gautier. pp. 12-14), nor any other of the supposed esoteric books that "had come to Andalus"?

{p. 17}

V. THE PROBLEM OF THE VICEGERENT IN IBN RUSHD AND IBN TUFAIL

After this it will cause no surprise that it is this figure of the Vicegerent (al-Mutâ` . . . alladhî amara bi tahrîk il-samâwât) who excited the curiosity and suspicion of thinkers in the century after Ghazzâlî's death. The passage is at least twice singled out, once by Ibn Rushd in the treatise already cited, and once by Ibn Tufail in his Hayy ibn Yaqzân.

(1) Ibn Rushd uses the passage to level at Ghazzâlî a direct accusation of gravest hypocritical insincerity over a matter which Ghazzâlî had ostentatiously singled out as the prime test of orthodoxy, namely.. the doctrine of emanation. According to Ibn Rushd the passage about the Vicegerent was the explicit teaching of this doctrine of the Philosophers, for which, elsewhere, Ghazzâlî can find no words strong enough to express his censure and contempt. The words of Ibn Rushd are as follows:

"Then he comes on with his book known as Mishkât al-Anwâr, and mentions therein all the grades of the Knowers of Allah; and says that all of them are veiled save those who believe that Allah is not the mover of the First Heaven, He being the One from Whom this mover of the First Heaven emanated: which is an open declaration on his part of the tenet of the philosophers' schools in the science of theology; though he has said in several places that their science of theology (as distinct from their other sciences) is a set of conjectures." [1]

It is not within the scope of this Introduction to follow in detail the evidence for and against the truth of this radical accusation. This has been done at length and with considerable minuteness in the monograph in Der Islâm, which has already been cited (pp. 133-145). The reader must be referred to that; and it must suffice here to say that after the full consideration of all the evidence the verdict given there. is Not Guilty. On the other hand, the existence of an esoteric doctrine in regard to this Vicegerent and his function is undeniable (and undenied); and it is clear, from the comparison of the Mishkât itself with the Munqidh, that that doctrine differed vitally from the one professed by Ghazzâlî exoterically (Munqidh, p. 11). Ghazzâlî himself, in a passage of remarkable candour,[1] admits that every "Perfect" man has three sets of opinions (madhâhib), (a) those of his own environment, (b) those he teaches to inquirers according as they are able to receive them, and (c) those which he believes in secret between himself and Allah, and never mentions except to an inner circle of friends or students.

Ibn Rushd's accusation was an attempt to identify the figure of the Vicegerent, al-Mutâ` with that of Al Ma`lûl al Awwal, the First Caused, in the emanational scheme of the Neoplatonizing[2] philosophers of Islâm, with [1. Mîzân al `Amal, p. 214.

2. The unquestionable Neoplatonism of much of the forms and expression of Ghazzâlî's thought, if not of the thought itself {footnote p. 20} Contd. (see especially pp. 15, 16. 29, 47 seq.]), exposed him in a very special way to this charge of emanational pantheism. And it cannot have made it easier for him to steer clear of such dangers in fact.]

{p. 20}

al-Fârâbi and Ibn Sinâ at their head. This was the Demiurge, the Being who first emanates from the Absolute Being, and mediates between It and all the lower stages or relational existence, with their increasing limitedness and grossness, thus relieving the predicateless Absolute from all part in the creation or administration of the universe.

There can be no doubt that whatever Ghazzâlî's doctrine of the Vicegerent was, and whatever else his esoteric doctrine contained, the emanational theory formed no part of that doctrine. For this particular piece of pseudo-metaphysics he appears to have had a very particular dislike and contempt; and if Ibn Rushd was really serious in levelling his accusation he can hardly be acquitted of being blinded by his bitter prejudice against "Abû Hâmid". The only possible ground for Ibn Rushd's accusation which I have been able to discover is as follows:--it is a fact that the extreme (ghulât) Imâmîtes did identify al-Rûh "The Spirit of Allah" with the First Emanation[1]. If, as is contended hereafter, Ghazzâlî identified al-Mutâ` with al-Rûh, and Ibn Rushd was aware of this, he may have thought, or been pleased to think, that Ghazzâlî therefore thought that al-Mutâ` was the First Emanation. This would be an indirect confirmation of the identification which it is attempted presently to prove, namely, al-Mutâ` = al-Rûh.

{p. 21}

(2) We now pass to the other criticism of the passage, by Ibn Rushd's contemporary Ibn

Tufail, in the introduction to his philosophical romance entitled Hayy Ibn Yaqzân.[2]

Ibn Tufâil's allusion to this perplexing passage is as follows:--

"Some later writers[3] have fancied they have found something tremendous in that passage of his that occurs at the end of al-Mishkât, which (they think) impales Ghazzâlî on a dilemma from which there is no escape. I mean where, after speaking of the various degrees of the

3. Or "a later writer" presumably Ibn Rushd himself, in the passage already cited and discussed.]

{p. 22}

Light-Veiled, and then going on to speak of the true Attainers, he tells us that these Attainers have discovered that this Existing One possesses an attribute which negates unmitigated Unity; insisting that it necessarily follows from this that Ghazzâlî believed that the Absolute Being has within His Essence some sort of plurality: which God forbid!"

The excursus on this passage in the article cited from Der Islâm (pp. 145-151) can only be summarized here. It seems to have escaped the critics quoted by Ibn Tufail, that the Unveiled, according to Ghazzâlî himself, abandoned the position of the last of the Light-Veiled just because of this dread, viz. that the identification of al-Mutâ` with Allah would endanger "the unmitigated Unity" of Deity. Ibn Tufail himself, though he admits the serious contradictions which appear in Ghazzâlî's books, flatly refuses to see in this passage anything so monstrous, or anything sinister at all.

Unfortunately he does not give us his own exegesis of the passage; but it may perhaps be inferred from his own schematization of the grades of being. In this he makes elaborate use of the schema of reflectors, and reflectors of reflectors, which Ghazzâlî has already suggested in this book (pp. [15, 16]). "The essences of the Intelligences of the Spheres" are represented as successive, graded reflections of the Divine Essence. The highest of them is not the essence of the One Real nor is he the Sphere itself, nor is he other than both. He is, as it were, the image of the sun which appears in a polished mirror; for that image is neither the sun, nor the mirror, nor other than them both." It is probable that Ibn Tufail, who professed to have won through to his position after studying al-Ghazzâlî and Ibn Sînâ (the juxtaposition is singular!), would have more or less equated this conception of the highest Essence of the Intelligences of the Spheres with the conception of al-Mutâ` in the Mishkât, though he says nothing about the business of Heaven-moving in relation to this Being. It need not follow that al-Ghazzâlî would have accepted this explanation[1]; though both men were evidently striving equally to avoid a total pantheism, and both disbelieved in the emanational theory as taught by al-Fârâbî and Ibn Sinâ.

{p. 24}

VI. ONE SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEM OF THE VICEGERENT

In the absence of "the book" into which Ghazzâlî put these secret opinions, or inconceivable mysteries, including, we may suppose, the secret of this mysterious Vicegerent, we are not likely to reach any authoritative settlement of the question: nor, even if we be put on the right track, clear up the whole of the mystery. For want of direct help from our author, therefore, the only thing to be done is to examine minutely al-Mishkât itself, to see if it yields any indirect help. It would seem that from this examination two possible solutions emerge. In this section the first of these will be discussed.

This solution, which was first suggested to the writer by the distinguished French Orientalist, M. Louis Massignon, identifies the mysterious figure of this Vicegerent, al-Mutâ`, with the Qutb ("Axis") or some other Supreme Adept. According to the developed doctrine, this Qutb was an earthly Mystic of supremest attainment, who during his lifetime administered the affairs of the heavens and the earth. There was nothing about him, during his lifetime, to suggest to any observer that he was, engaged in so stupendous a task, and it was not known till after his death that he had been "the Axis of his time" (qutbu zamânihi).

The beginnings of this doctrine go back far beyond al-Ghazzâlî--a rudimentary form of it was held by even the ultra-orthodox Hanbalites,[1] and a developed form of the conception is expressed quite definitely in al-Hujwârî's Kashf al-Mahjûb,[2] and must have been widely held, in orthodox circles too, in the fifth century, at the close of which our treatise was written.

Moreover, at least from the time of al-Hallâj, to whom, as we shall see, our author in this treatise refers in terms by no means of repudiation, the very word under discussion, al-Mutâ` or some other form of the same verb, occurs in significant connexion with supreme sainthood. One of the accusations levelled against al-Hallâj was that he taught that "having attained to sainthood the Adept becomes al-Mutâ` he who says to a thing 'Be!' and it becomes".[1] It sounds startling enough, but it was a true accusation, though it has to be taken in connexion with the whole of Hallâj's philosophy of mystical union with the Divine. For he did definitely adopt from a predecessor, Ibn `lyâd, the aphorism "Man atâ`a Allaha atâ`ahu kullu shay",[3] an aphorism which received a later redaction (quite in the spirit of Hallâj, as has been shown), "man hudhhiba ... fa yasîru mutâ`an, yaqûlu lish shay'i `Kun' fa yakûn," "He who has passed through the mystic askesis becomes Obeyed; he says to this or that, 'Be!' and it is."[4]

[1. Massignon, Passion d' al-Hallâj, p. 754.

Since then al-Hallâj did so teach, and did use this very word, and since al-Ghazzâlî in this treatise betrays a very considerable admiration of al-Hallâj, and a sort of tremulous half-assent to his wildest utterances, including the notorious

[1. Massignon, op. cit., p. 791; ib., p. 472.

2. The sense in which he did use the expression, and the proof that it did not in his thought mean self-deification, is given very clearly in Massignon, op. cit., 519-521.

{p. 27}

"Ana-l Haqq" itself, it would seem that a strong prima-facie case has been made out for identifying the Mutâ` of our treatise, in spite of the cosmic nature of his functions, with some supreme Adept. But only a prima-facie case. To make out the thesis itself, the treatise itself must be interrogated; for it by no means follows that because a Hallâj held an opinion a Ghazzâlî adopted it.

There are, certainly, some passages that do suggest that the solution is along this line.

(1) The description of the adventures of a soul in highest state of Union (Mish., p. [24]) tends to bear out the Identification, or the general idea underlying it. The person there described is a supreme Adept, and in particular al-Hallâj himself. Having reached Union with the One divine Real, he ascends in and with Him "to the throne of the Divine Unity and from thenceforth administers the Command throughout His (or 'his,' for in this extraordinary passage the pronouns remain the same throughout) storied Heavens." The words translated "administers the Command", yudabbîru-l amr, are remarkable, for they contain an Arabic word (amr) which, as we shall see presently, is to the last degree significant, being the very word used in the Mutâ` passage (p. [55]), where Ghazzâlî confesses it is an obscure mystery. The Mutâ` (Commander) is said to move the outermost Heaven by precisely the amr (command). The words yudabbîru-l amr could no doubt be translated in a less significant way, owing to the troublesome double meaning of amr, ("affair," "command"), namely, "he disposes things." But in view of the fact that this amr was a notable Sûfî term, and a mysterious problem alluded to by Ghazzâlî in this very treatise, it seems inevitable to take it as "command" here. And a "Command" necessitates an "Obeyed".

(2) On p. [23], where the reference throughout is purely general, and presumably applies to anyone who has the necessary qualifications and attains this supreme mystical "state", Ghazzâlî says that when the mystic Ascent is complete, "if there be indeed any change, it is by way of 'the Descent into the Lowest Heaven', the radiation from above downwards." This also suggests supreme divine activity in the Universe below, especially if the word ishrâq refers, as it probably does, to causative activity.

(3) On pp. [13, 14] occurs another passage which strongly supports the general identification, though it leaves its particular and personal reference still obscure. In this the adepts, who in their mystical Ascent (mi`râj) "attained to that supreme attainment", are said to be "the Prophets", who "from thence looked down upon the entire World Invisible [precisely the world of the Heavens]; for he who is in the world of the Realm Supernal is which Allah, and hath the keys of the Unseen. I mean that from where he is descend the causes of existing things; for the world of sense is one of the effects of yonder-world of causes", etc. This looks almost like a reasoned, philosophic doctrine behind the mystical one, that to attain to the world of Reality is ipso facto to attain to the fount of causation; which involves the ability to direct the Causes which control all the Effects in the Heavens below and the Earth beneath. The Vicegerent does no more than this.

A close scrutiny of these passages leaves, one, nevertheless, with the impression that the

Adepts whose celestial adventures are there described are too generalized, or perhaps one should say too pluralized, to be identifiable with this single, solitary figure of al-Mutâ` as he is presented in our passage. As far as these three passages go, this assumption of the reins of the Universe is only granted to Adepts in their mystic "States", to Prophets in their highly exceptional "Ascent". There is nothing to show that two or more such Attainers might not exist at one time, or that even one must always be existing; in other words, there is no trace of the complete and fully developed Qutb doctrine in this treatise. But these considerations make it impossible to identify any one of these Adepts, or all of them together, with the cosmic al-Mutâ`, whose function, related as it is to the very mechanism of the Heavens, is ceaseless, and coextensive with Time itself. And these last four words suggest a further consideration which in itself seems fatal to the proposed identification; namely, that al-Mutâ` was Vicegerent from the very foundation of the world; he is the one "who commanded the Heavens to be moved" (p. [55, 1. 12]). No

{p. 31}

Hallâj, no Adept, no Qutb, no Prophet even, ever claimed, or had claimed for him, such priority as this,[1] or even priority at all. But if not, none of them--and, if so, no terrestrial being at all--can claim to fill the role of this Vicegerent. The three passages were probably intended only to assert and account for the karâmât of the Saints in their wonder-working which was parallel to that of the Koranic Jesus.

The a-priori question of our author's attitude to the Qutb doctrine--whether, consistently with his published writings, he could have sustained such a doctrine in this work--is one which can only be indicated here. Professors R. Nicholson and D.S. Macdonald have both communicated to the writer, in reference to the passage under discussion, their opinion that there is an a-priori impossibility. To al-Ghazzâlî the doctrine was tainted with Imâmism, his special bete noire (see his attack on the Ta`lîmites in his Munqidh;[2] that since an omnipotent.

[1. The question of the priority claimed by a certain school for Mohammed, and of the nûr Muhammadi, will be considered, later.

2. See Nicholson, The Idea of Personality in Sûfism, p. 46]

{p. 32}

Administrator must also be an infallible Guide (whom Ghazzâlî would not have at any price), there is no room for the former in Ghazzâlî's thought (thus Professor Macdonald).

If the Mutâ` is not Mohammed, he is certainly no Saint (thus Professor Nicholson).

Be this as it may, the above considerations, drawn from the study of the text itself, and from the passages which prima facie seemed to point to the Qutb-Mutâ` identification, seem finally, when more closely examined, to rule that identification out.

VII. ANOTHER SOLUTION

But there are other passages in our treatise which, when carefully studied, lead to the belief that in Ghazzâlî's own mind--though the identification is nowhere explicitly stated or significantly hinted--the Mutâ` is none than al-Rûh, THE SPIRIT OF ALLAH.[1]

In S. 17, 87, Mohammed himself had left this enigmatic entity as a divinely uncommunicated,

[1. Nicholson. The Idea of Personality in Sûfism, pp. 44, 45. The identification had occurred independently to the present writer before appearance of Professor Nicholson's work. It had also occurred independently to Professor D. B. Macdonald.]

{p. 33}

and therefore incommunicable, mystery. The passage runs as follows: "They ask thee of The Spirit: say, The Spirit pertains to my Lord's Word-of-Command, and ye have not been communicated knowledge [of It] save a little." The Arabic of the words italicized is min amri rabbî; and we are again faced, at the outset, with the troublesome double meaning of the word amr. The phrase min amr might merely mean--perhaps did only mean--"a matter of"[1] (my Lord's), a vague phrase, common in Arabic, meaning "something that pertains to" so and so. But in a case like this, we are not concerned with what Mohammed may originally have meant, but what mystic writers have taken him to mean. And enormously though this verse attracted puzzled, and baffled commentators and mystics of all ages, the latter seem to have taken the word amr, with practical unanimity, in the far more significant sense of "Command". The Hebrew root means "speak", and this meaning is implicit in the Arabic root also, which signifies spoken command. And just as later Jewish writers made out of a derivative of this root a Logos doctrine (Memra), so the Mohammedan mystics came near to making a Logos doctrine out of the word amr, taking their start from this very text.

A mystery having been definitely started by this text, a haze of mystification was thrown over the entire subject of "spirit": over angels as "spirits", over the human "spirit", the prophetic "spirit"; the interrelation between these, and the relation of all to "the Spirit"; finally its relation to Allah. In our treatise there is a full measure of this mystification.

"The Spirit" is ar-Rûh. With this may be absolutely identified Rûh Allah "The Spirit of God"; Rûhuhu "His Spirit"; and al-Rûhu-l Qudsî[1] (or Rûhu-l Qudsî) "The Transcendent Spirit"--all Koranic expressions.

What then are the considerations which suggest that we have in this Figure of Mystery

[1. This is the Arabic for the Christian "The Holy Spirit". But in Arabic as in early Hebrew the word emphasized the idea of separation or transcendence rather than of righteousness or holiness.]

the key to the mystery of the Vicegerent? On this supposition there would be no wonder that Ghazzâlî left the figure of the latter a mystery, and declined to divulge the secret of it (p. [55]). He could not divulge the whole secret, because by the decree of Allah and the Book, he could not know it himself--"save a little." And, there is no wonder he declined to discuss it, considering the interminable complexities and baffling obscurities of the recorded musings of Sûfî doctors on the theme.

At the very outset we are struck by the fact that the word Mutâ` occurs in the Koran (S. 81, 23), and not only so, but it occurs as an attribute of the mysterious Agent of Revelation, the vision of whom Mohammed saw at the first (S. 53, 5-16). The text 87, 23, is not definitely cited in Mishkât; and in later Islâm the commentators, with their arid tameness, made a stereotyped identification of this Figure with the Angel Gabriel. But the Koran gives no warrant for this; and there is nothing in the Mishkât to show that Ghazzâlî thus taught. On the contrary, Gabriel is assigned a low place in the angelic hierarchy. No one can read those two Koranic passages (in S. 87 and S. 53) without feeling that Mohammed's awful visitant on those two occasions was the One of absolute supreme rank in the heavenlies: not a spirit but the Spirit. And it was mutâ`--"one who is obeyed." Is it not but a very short step from this to al-Mutâ`, The Obeyed-One?

The identification, however attractive, would nevertheless be precarious if there was not so much in the Mishkât itself that supports this identification.

(1) On p. [15] the ultimate kindling-place of the graded Lights, of which the Prophets occupy the lower and terrestrial ranks and the Angelic Beings the higher and celestial, is the theme of discussion. Both these ranks of beings are compared to "lights" and all of them are contrasted with the Highest of all, who is compared to "fire", from whose flame these graded lights are successively lit, from top to bottom. Who and what is this Highest of all next to Allah? He is said to be an Angel with countenances seventy thousand'. . . {p. 37} This is he who is contrasted with all the angelic host, in the words: 'On that day whereon THE SPIRIT ariseth, and the Angels, rank on rank.'" It is thus explicitly clear that this Being is the highest of all possible beings in heaven or earth next to Allah; and so, if the Vicegerent of p. [55] is also the highest of all, it would seem inevitable to equate them.

(2) In the very next page, p. [16], Ghazzâlî schematizes this conception, and, comparing Allah with the Sun (the source of light in the terrestrial system), he compares the highest of the ministrant lights to the Moon (all others being reflections, or reflections-of-reflections, of it). This "Highest is the one who is nearest to the Ultimate Light: . . . that Nighest to Allah, he whose rank comes nighest to the Presence Dominical, which is the Fountainhead of all these Lights" This "Nighest" and "Highest" cannot be other than THE SPIRIT spoken of in the preceding page. And on p. [31]--unless Ghazzâlî has suddenly changed all the symbols--the Sun is said to be the Sovereign, while "the antitype of the Moon will be that Sovereign's Minister (wakîl), for it is through the moon that the sun sheds his light on the world in its own absence, and even so it is through his own wakîl that the Sovereign makes his influence felt by subject who never beheld the royal person". Does not this wakîl who stands "highest and nighest" to his Liege-Lord, and who makes himself obeyed by all that Lord's subjects, strongly suggest "the Obeyed One", al-Mutâ`, the Vicegerent of the conclusion, whose function is, precisely, this?

(3) But what perhaps clinches the matter is the tell-tale word amr in that passage about al-Mutâ` himself on p. [55]. Those who stopped short of complete illumination, he says, identified al-Mutâ` with Allah just because he moves the primum mobile (and so all things) "with his Word of Command" (amr). "The explication of which amr (he continues), and what it really is, contains much that is obscure, and too difficult for most minds, besides going beyond the scope of this book." And then he says that the perfect Illuminati perceived that, al-Mutâ` the Obeyed One is not more than the Highest--other-than-Absolute-Deity, and is related to Him as the sun to Essential Light

(mysterious enough this!) or as a glowing coal to the Elemental Fire: and therefore they turned their faces from that Being "who commanded (amr) the moving of the Heavens" to the One Existent, Transcendent, Incomparable, Predicateless.

With this word amr thus impressed on us with such penetrating significance we turn back to the Koran text: "The Spirit pertains to my Lord's Word of Command (amr)" Unless the word min introduces a quite upsetting element, the identification between this SPIRIT and the Commander who is Obeyed seems complete.

But the history of the Sûfî teaching on the text shows that min need introduce no such upsetting element, and that the practical identification of Amr with Rûh, of The Word of Command with The Spirit, was with the Mystics a familiar idea. It was the explicit teaching of al-Hallâj[1] and the typical "word of command" which this Divine Spirit gave was the fiat "Kun!"

[1. Massignon, op. cit., pp. 519-21.]

{p. 40} "Be!"[1] We have seen the fascination which this treatise shows al-Hallâj had for al-Ghazzâlî. Does it not seem likely, nay almost certain, that in his meditation on the inscrutable text he followed al-Hallâj in this equation, with whatever mental reserve regarding the Spirit itself--whether divine or creaturely, eternal or originate? Not that it was only Imâmîtes or extreme Sûfî Sunnites like al-Hallâj who asserted the divinity of The Spirit. The ultra-orthodox Hanbalites "admitted in some manner the eternity of the Rûh Allah".[2] Ibn Hanbal himself had given them the lead with a characteristic hedging aphorism (which reminds us of similar remarks on the Sifat, the Kalâm Allah, and the Qur'ân) "Whoever says that al-Rûh is created, (makhlûq) is a heretic: whoever says that It is eternal (qadîm) is an infidel."[3] His followers held fast on to "uncreate", and it was hard to keep "eternal" from following. No wonder al-Ghazzâlî

[1. This mediation of the creative function would carry with it the mediation of the administrative. In this connexion use would unquestionably be made of S. 7, 53, "the sun, the moon, and the stars are compelled-to-work by His amr--His Word-of-Command--His Spirit--exactly the function of al-Mutâ`.

gave a unique and mysterious tinge to his similitude for "The Obeyed", and that It figures, virtually, as an Arian Logos. The more one reflects on what is said about the function of this Being in M., p. [55], and especially Its comparison with the Sun (Allah being Essential Light), or with glowing coal (Allah being Elemental Fire), the more unique It appears, and: the more mysterious our author's thought about It becomes. For such functions, and such a relation to Absolute Deity, are in very truth entirely unique, in kind as well as degree; and, thus described, the Vicegerent becomes, in a secondary way, as unique a Figure as is Deity Itself. No wonder the passage raised doubts as to the soundness of our author's monotheism! No wonder he was not anxious to go more deeply into the matter, out of consideration for the limited spiritual capacities of his readers! Perhaps, to preserve his own faith in the Unity, Indivisibility, and absolute Uniqueness of Allah,. he was glad to leave the dark problem of the Vicegerent where Allah Himself had left that of--the Spirit--an uncommunicated and incommunicable mystery, which now he only knew in part, and only saw as in a glass, darkly.

It remains to consider whether there is any evidence that Ghazzâlî extended the equation $Mutâ` = Amr = Rûh$ to include the Nûr Muhammadî (as suggested tentatively by Professor R. Nicholson in his lectures on "The Idea of Personality in Sûfism"), the archetypal spirit of Mohammed, the Heavenly Man created in the image of God, and regarded as a Cosmic Power on whom depends the order and preservation of 'the universe. If this could be sustained it would to some extent modify the conclusion reached before that al-Mutâ` had nothing to do with any human being, idealized or not, whether a Prophet or even Mohammed; though even so, there would be a vast difference between this archetypal Spirit and the historical Prophet.

While the germs of this idea, as of every other one, may be found much earlier than Ghazzâlî's century (the fifth), the study of the sketch which M. Massignon gives of the history of the doctrine (Hallâj, pp. 830 seqq.) does not create the impression that it was developed or received in orthodox circles[1] up to Ghazzâlî's time. Professor Nicholson does not find it in an orthodox Sûfî writer earlier than `Abdu-l Qâdir al-Jîlânî (b. 571, d. 561), in the generation immediately succeeding that of Ghazzâlî.[2] After which the doctrine developed and spread amazingly, reaching its height with Ibn al-`Arabî al-Jîlî several centuries later.[3]

Thus the a-priori evidence is this time decidedly against Ghazzâlî's having anything to do with this doctrine. Unless, therefore, very clear actual evidence were found in his writings, it would be surely justifiable to assert definitely that it is not Ghazzâlîan. It appears not to be found in his works other than al-Mishkât. If this is so, it may be further asserted with confidence that it is not found in al-Mishkât either.

On the contrary, there is much there that shows a relatively simple, primeval conception of Mohammed on the part of Ghazzâlî. For him the archetypal man is Adam, as in the Koran, [1. It was at first prevalently Imâmîte and Shî'ite (Nicholson, Idea of Personality in Sûfism, p. 58).

2. He described Muhammed as al-rûh al-qudus and rûh jasad al-wajûd "the Transcendent Spirit, the Spirit of the body of the Universe."

3. Nicholson, op. cit., p. 59.]

{p. 44}

not Mohammed.[1] An examination of the passage[2] in which the idea of the "Khalîfa" appears shows that here also his thought was not esoteric, and that Mohammed was not in his mind: he is thinking of the whole human race, or of Adam himself, the first and representative human being, the only "Khalîfa" particularized by the Koran. And the one passage in the Mishkât which at first sight does look as if it contained a "high doctrine of the person" of Mohammed, turns out on closer inspection to, prove the exact reverse, viz. that essentially he belonged to this world and to the time-order--to the prophets, above whom are ranked the celestial "Lights" culminating, as we have seen, in the Supreme Angelical, The Spirit. This passage is on pp. [14, 15]. Here we have the Transcendent Spirit Prophetical (al-Rûh al-qudus al-nabawî) attributed to Mohammed as prophet, by reason of which he is called a Luminous Lamp (sirâj munîr). If this stood by itself we might be suspicious of something esoteric. But immediately after this the other prophets, and even saints, are said to be

[1. M., p. [34].

2. M., p. [22].]

{p. 45}

"Lamps", and to possess, as its name implies this Spirit Prophetical. The sequel shows that this Spirit is the Fire from which all the Angelical lights above and the Prophetical lights beneath are lit, and that this Spirit is the Supreme Angelical, "The Spirit," as in the passage already discussed.'

To sum up the conclusion to which I have been led by a consideration of the evidence of the Mishkât itself, top-ether with the a-priori evidence which supplements it and is checked by it,--the heavenly Vicegerent is the Spirit of Allah, the Transcendent Spirit of Prophecy, the divine Word-of-Command; he is not a Qutb or any Adept; he is not Mohammed nor the archetypal spirit of Mohammed.

Whether this mystery of the Vicegerent was connected in our author's mind with that of the divine-human, archetypal Sûra, as developed by al Hallâj and other advanced Mystics, will be discussed later.

[1. See above, pp. 36-37 The only thing that puzzles is that Ghazzâlî sometimes distributes and pluralizes the Spirit, see p. [15, l. 4] and p. [22. l. 8]. In each case the regulative singular, however, is close by. This reminds one of Rev. iv, 5 and v. 6, compared with Rev. ii. 7.]

VIII. AL-GHAZZALI AND THE SEVEN SPHERES

The Seven Planetary Heavens played a great part in Platonic,[1] Neoplatonic, and Gnostic-theosophical schemes. The naive adoption by Mohammed (in the Koran) of the Ptolemaic celestial construction was one of the things which added picturesqueness to early Mohammedan tradition and theology; caused endless trouble to generations of later theologians; made it easier for Neoplatonic ideas to graft themselves on to Islam; gave to the raptures of the Mystics sensuous form and greater definition; and afforded to the Philosophers a line of defence, and even of attack, in their war with the Theologians. [2] And the allusions of the Koran were heavily reinforced by the legend of the Mirâj, the exact origin of which is obscure, but which appears in a highly developed form almost from the first. The influences of the Mi`râj are indeed evident in page after page of the Mishkât.

Al-Ghazzâlî's sympathies in regard to this subject were divided. He disliked the Philosophers, and this made him displeased with their confident assertions about the Heavens, while he detested the "philosophical" profit to which they put them. On the other hand, he was a Sûfî and thus in closest touch with persons who made very similar assertions about the Heavens, and also put them to profit in their own way. Finally, he was an Ash`arite Theologian, belonging to a school which had recently, after much trouble, eliminated from theology the dangerous ideas to which Mohammed's naive attitude to the Heavens, had given rise.

[1. See the Vision of Er in the Republic, bk. X.

2. See Averroes' Ki tab al Kashf an manâhij al adillâ, quoted above on p. 11, note 2.]

{p. 47}

This uncertainty of touch comes out, as, might be expected, in a treatise like al-Mishkât with its blend of scholasticism and Neoplatonically-tinctured mysticism. The Heavens figure continually in its pages. They seem to play a most important part both in thought and in experience--towards the close of the book a determining part. Yet it is impossible to make out exactly what that part was, in the mind of al-Ghazzâlî himself.

On p. [23] we have a correlation of the human microcosm and the macrocosm of the celestial realm, Ptolemaically construed, in describing the Ascension of a God-united soul. The adept's body-and-soul structure is conceived of as subsisting in three planes or Spheres, which are correlated with the three lower spheres of the Seven Planetary Heavens. From the highest of these (the Intelligence) the soul takes its departure and ascends through the four upper Heavens (ila saba`i tabaqât) to the Throne [beyond the outermost Heaven]. Thus he "fills all things" by his upward Ascent just as Allâh did by His downward Descent (nuzûl). In all this the pronoun "he" stands for the soul who is now Allâh-possessed and united, as described in what immediately precedes. It is the upward ascent of Allah (corresponding to His nuzûl illa-l samâ'i-l dunyâ), and not of the Adept only.

On the other hand, in p. [29], this Ascent is described in purely psychological terms, without this schema of the Heavens. And on p. [13] we have the following: "Do not imagine that I mean by the World Supernal the World of the [Seven] Heavens, though they are 'above' in respect of part of our world of sense-perception. {p. 49} These Heavens are equally present to our apprehension and that of the lower animals. But a man finds the doors of the Realm Celestial closed to him, neither does he become of or belonging to that Realm (mala-kûfî), unless this earth to him 'be changed into that which is not earth; and likewise the heavens;'[1] . . . and his 'heaven' come to be all that transcends his sense. This is the first Ascension for every Pilgrim who has set out on his Progress to the nearness of the Presence Dominical." And he continues: "The Angels ... are part of the World of the Realm Celestial, floating even in the Presence of the Transcendence, whence they gaze down upon our world inferior.

The last lines hardly give us the same ultra-spiritualizing impression which is conveyed by their predecessors. And, as we have already seen (Introduction, pp. 12-17), the part played by the Spheres with their Angels in the last section of the book is decisive, and there does not seem to be there any spiritualizing whatever.

{p. 50}

How far, therefore, these passages are mere word-play, pious picturesqueness, or how far they represent speculation of a rather far-reaching character, is one of the puzzles of the book. In the Tahâfut, demolishing the arrogant claim of the Philosophers to prove their doctrine of the Spheres by syllogistic demonstration (burhân), he said: "The secrets of The Kingdom are not to be scanned by means of such fantastic imaginations as these; Allâh gives none but His Prophets and Saints (anbiyâ' and awliyâ') to scan them, and that by inspiration, not by demonstration." [1] So then there were mysteries and secrets in regard to the Spheres. In the Mishkât we are able to see pretty clearly that Ghazzâlî had his; but we are not able to see just what they were. He has kept this secret well.

IX. ANTHROPOMORPHISM AND THEOMORPHISM IN AL-MISHKAT

The doctrine of mukhâlafa--that the divine essence and characteristics wholly and entirely "differ from" the human--appears to be

[1. Tah., p. 60. Quoted in the writer's article in Der Islâm, see pp. 134-6, 151, 152, where parts of the subject are gone into in greater detail.]

{p. 51}

assorted, as this treatise's last word, in its most extreme and intransigent form. For the conclusion of the whole matter, the end of the quest for truth for those who "Arrive", is "an Existent who transcends ALL that is comprehensible by human Insight . . . transcendent of and separate from every characterization that in the foregoing we have made." [1]

Nevertheless, the Mishkât itself seems to be one long attempt to modify or even negate this its own bankrupt conclusion. Indeed, it goes unusual lengths in asserting a certain ineffable likeness between Allâh and man. It is true that the usual anthropomorphic expressions--the Hand, the Sessions on the Throne, the Descent to the Lowest Sphere, etc., those

[1. In Ghazzâlî the most extreme Agnosticism and the most extreme Gnosticism meet, and meet at this point; for, as he says (p [25]), things that go beyond one extreme pass over to the extreme opposite." For him "Creed because Incredible" becomes "Gnosis because Agnoston". What saved the Universe for him from his nihilistic theologizing was his ontology (see below, pp. 108 seqq.). What saved God for him from his obliterating agnosticism was the experience of the mystic leap, his own personal mi`râj. This may have been non-rational, but it was to him experience. Even those who regard the sensational experience of Sûfism as having been pure self-hypnotism cannot condemn them and the sense of reality they brought, in relation to the man who had thought his way out of both atheism and pantheism, and yet would have been left at the end of the quest, by his thinking alone, with an Unknown and Unknowable Absolute.]

perennial sources for Mohammedan theologizing-are used and are discounted in the usual way. But they are, in reality, only discounted by being replaced by a Sûfî system of theomorphism. This has three main aspects--

(1) a quasi-Platonic doctrine of terrestrial type and celestial antitype;

(2) the relation of the divine and human rûh (spirit);

(3) the relation of the divine and human sûra ("image," "form").

(1) The whole of the first two parts of the treatise are practically an exposition of an Islamico-Platonic typology. It is not explicitly said that earthly things are more or less faint copies of "the patterns of things in the heavens," though this is probably implicit in what is said, namely, that the heavenly realities (haqâ'iq), (ma`ânî), all have their symbols on earth. These symbols or types, as their Arabic term itself suggests (amthâl), do possess a "resemblance" to their celestial antitypes, for, as al Ghazzâlî remarks, "the thing compared (al-mushabbah, the antitype) is in some sort parallel, and bears resemblance, to the thing compared therewith (al-mushabbah bihi, the type or symbol), whether that resemblance be remote or near; a matter again which is unfathomably deep." [1] Ghazzâlî. can hardly be allowed to elude the application of this true principle to Allâh Himself, considering that this very Koran-verse which it is the object of the entire treatise to expound begins with a simile. "Light" is the chosen, or rather the God-given symbol, wherewith Allah is "compared", and which therefore He must "in some sort resemble". This analogy of light floods the whole book. Now Allah is the Sun: now the Light of lights: and at the end, in the same breath in which Abu Hâmîd, with the incorrigible inconsistency which so angered Averroes, denied the validity of the similitude, description, relation, or even predication in regard to Allâh, we are told that He stands in relation to His Vicegerent (or "wakeel" in a parallel passage) as the pure Light-essence to the sun, or as the Elemental Fire to a glowing coal. Theomorphism has "in some sort" been admitted.

(2) In the lhyâ' al `Ulûm Ghazzâlî speaks of the human rûh as amr rabbâni "a divine affair" (amr must surely bear here its other meaning); and he is there very anxious, not to say agitated, over the esoteric character of the doctrine; it must be kept a dead secret from the Many! it must not be set forth in a book![1] "The specific characteristic which differentiates humanity [from the lower creation] is something which it is not lawful to indite in a book." [2] The thing that agitates him is the relation of this human rûh to the Spirit of God, rûh Allâh, and its relation to Allâh. The matter is esoteric--it is to be "grudged" to the "commons"--because it is dangerous ground. It is dangerous ground because one has to talk warily in order to avoid a violation of the uniqueness of Allâh, which would involve confusing Creator with created, and so passing gradually to ishrâk, which is the worst "infidelity."

This particular anxiety is not reflected in the present treatise; it is strange that the mystery of rûh does not figure in the list (see above, p. 5) over which the author's favete linquis! is inscribed.[1] He is mainly occupied with working out what the New Testament calls the "operations", rather than the nature of the spirit. In so doing the singular "spirit" becomes plural "spirits", arwâh, which, as already observed, happens also in the Book of the Revelation. Ghazzâlî works out the theory of the several "spirits" of the human psychology; then the graded "spirits" of the heavenly hosts; and then the Neoplatonic or theosophic idea of the gradation of all these (in maqâmât), and the way in which they are "lit" (muqtabasa) from each other in order: we must not say "derived", for that would involve him in the emanationism he was ever anathematizing yet, for ever incurring the suspicion of.[2] In all this his tone is open, easy, confident. The special mystery of The Spirit had been already discounted in the Koran, so that was harmless. As for the identification of Rûh Mutâ`, if our theory is correct, that was a grand secret. But that secret he never intended even to hint at, and it would really seem as if we had surprised and betrayed a sirr maknûn!

2. Ihyâ, iv, p. 294, quoted in a letter to the writer from Professor R. Nicholson.]

{p. 55}

[1. The human 'aql does figure on that list, pp. [6, 7].

2. See the writer's op. cit. in Der Islâm, pp. 138-141.]

{p. 56}

(3) It was the sûra tradition,[1] "ALLAH CREATED ADAM AFTER HIS IMAGE," that above all else led Moslem thinkers into temptation--the temptation of trenching on the uniqueness of Allâh. Its very riskiness seems, however, to have fascinated them supremely from the very outset. Not one of them could let it alone. In this very treatise Ghazzâlî returns to it again and again. Perhaps it would accord with inner truth to say rather that both he and others returned to that tradition not so much as moths fascinated by a dangerous glare, but as those who are feeling cold return for warmth and cheer to even an alien fire. The aphorism, sacred as a Koran text, was the assertion and pledge that man somehow is, or may become, "like God." The word sûra became the symbol and the guarantee of theomorphism.

In the first allusion in the Mishkât to this tradition (p. [9]), the point of the similarity is the human intelligence (ʿaql). In virtue of his intelligence, Ghazzâlî hints, man is "after the image of Allâh." The ʿaql is "Allâh's balance-scale upon earth." [1] In its own sphere it is infallible. [2] From the ʿaql, as from a firm "taking-off" place, souls make their mystic Ascension to the heavenlies. [3] It is because it is thus the specifically human faculty that it is a determinative element in the human sûra. [4]

The second allusion (M., p. [23]) carries us very much further--even to that verge from which Moslem mystics so often looked dizzily down, but from which they so seldom fell, into the pantheistic abyss. Behold a human soul in completest Union (jamʿ) with Deity, sitting on The Throne, and administering all things in heaven and earth! "Well might one," says our author, "in looking upon such an one," get a new view of this tradition. Is not such a uniate, indeed, "after the image of Allâh"? But, he continues [5], "after contemplating that word more deeply one becomes aware that it has an interpretation like [al-Hallâj's] 'I am the One Real.'" [5] Unfortunately he has omitted to

[1. M., p. [29].

2. Ib., p. [10].

3. Ib., p. [24]

4. Ib., [40].

5. How {to} translate this "Ana-l-Haqq"? Not by Jesus, "I am the Truth", tempting though this is. "I am the Absolute" would be a parallel rendering in modern philosophic parlance. Professor Nicholson's "I am God" is startling, but illuminating because perfectly justifiable: for al-Haqq and Allâh are mutually and exclusively convertible.]

{p. 58}

indicate what precisely that interpretation is. We have a tantalizing author to deal with.

What was that interpretation?

Probably we do not find it in the third passage (pp. [34, 35]), though it is deeply influenced by Hallâjîan thought. There is in the celestial world something which "developpe, modalise, et concerte entre elles les creations divines ... une certaine structure interne particuliere a l'acte createur".¹ This living order, this organised "Presence" (hadar), is symbolized by the word Image, or Form. And this macrocosmic hadra has its earthly counterpart in an analogous human form, or sūra, which has the same "structure interne particuliere" (it is alluded to on p. [22, l. 1], and p. [34, l. 3], and described in detail on pp. [39-41]). Therefore, man, formed in this Form, is "after the Form, the Image, of this Merciful One (al Rahmân)". Ghazzâlî's explanation of his preference for this variation of the tradition, to which, however, he by no means always adheres, is difficult to follow.

[1. Massignon, op. cit., p, 519, describing Hallâj's doctrine of the divine rūh, and exactly hitting off Ghazzâlî's difficult thought on p. [24, ll. 2, 3], (cf. p. [22, l. 2]). But from this point of view rūh and sūra merge into each other, as a careful comparison of the two Mishkât passages just cited shows.]

{p. 59} But the general idea clearly is that "but for this 'mercy' [i.e. of these two correlative and coincident Forms] every son of Adam would have been powerless to know his Lord, for 'only he who knows himself knows his Lord". The wheel has, indeed, brought us round a strange circle! Through the eternal grace of theomorphism we win back to a higher anthropomorphism, so that the proper study of God is--man! And this from the writer whose last word is that Allah must not have so much as an attribute predicated of Him, or the divine uniqueness will be violated! Truly, thus the whirligig of thought brings in his revenges.

We have already seen many indications that before he wrote this treatise Ghazzâlî must have been deep in the study of al-Hallâj; and the passage we have just been considering may be added to these indications. Yet there is no overt trace in it, or elsewhere in the Mishkât, of al-Hallâj's profoundest thought on this matter of the Divine-Adamic; no trace of that strange Figure--that Epiphany of humanized Deity, or Apotheosis of ideal-Humanity--which was presented by Allah to the angels for worship or ever the first man was created, and in which He Himself, on behalf of the human race, swore unto Himself the Covenant (mîthâq) of allegiance. For this conception, which has the closest interrelations with all the moments of the above discussion--rūh, amr, sūra, nûr-Muhammadî--the reader must be referred to the grand work which has brought to light so many hidden things, A Louis Massignon's La Passion d' Al Hosayn-ibn-Mansour al-Hallaj. [I] Ghazzâlî's silence on this so remarkable development of the Sūra tradition would suggest that it was precisely here that he felt it dangerous to follow al-Hallâj. What was possible for the seer might send the theologian over the line where Islam ends and pantheism begins. On the other hand, is it possible that here we have the explanation of our author's embarrassed words on p. [55] "on account of a Mystery which it is not in the competence of this book to reveal"? His inmost thought may have been, "Perhaps al-Hallâj has penetrated here to something of what the Koran itself [in the Spirit-Verse] left obscure. I neither assert, nor deny. Allâhu a`lam!"

[1. Pages 485, 599-602. In a note Massignon hazards the tentative suggestion that this epiphanized God (called by al-Hallâj al-Nâsût) in contra-distinction from the unknowable al-Lâhût) is analogical to, or suggestive of Ghazzâlî's Vicegerent (p. 601, n. 5). The suggestion is thrilling, as we see. It must be repeated that there is no overt trace of the doctrine in M.]

Thus we come to the ultimate question--the ultimate question with every Sûfî writer and book--does he and it escape pantheism? What light comes from this "Niche for Lights" upon this obscure question?

X. PANTHEISM AND AL-GHAZZALI, IN AL-MISHKAT

The root question in regard to al-Ghazzâlî, and every other advanced mystic and adept in Islâm, is the question of Pantheism: did he succeed in balancing himself upon the edge of the pantheistic abyss, and finding some foothold for his creationist theism, some position that cleared his conscience towards his orthodox co-religionists? Or did he fail in this? The Mishkât contains a good deal that is relevant to this final issue.

It contains much, in the first place, which on the face of it reads like naked pantheism; and in particular the whole passage on pp. [19, 201 and [22-4], where not only is the most extreme language of the extreme wing of Sûfism (Ana-l Haqq[1] and the rest) quoted with guarded approval, but there is open eulogy of the formula lâ huwa illâ Huwa "there is no it but HE", which is declared to be more expressive of real, absolute truth than the Mohammedan creed itself lâ ilâha ill-Allâh "there is no god but God". This would seem to be as unreserved an assertion of flat pantheism as could be found in philosophic Hinduism itself. Equally worthy of philosophic Hinduism is Ghazzâlî's "He is everything: He is that He is: none but He has ipseity or heity at all . ." [9] (p. [22]). And then gain the experience of the advanced Initiates and Adepts is described in terms of thorough pantheism: to them "the plurality of things fell away in its entirety. They were drowned in the absolute Unitude [5] and their intelligences were lost in its abyss" (p. [19]); and when they return to earthly illusions again from that world of reality they "confess with one voice that they had seen nought existent there save the One Real

[1. Which, it must be remembered, might not unfairly be translated -I am God---; see footnote above.]

{p. 63}

(Allâh)". Existent! Do words mean what they say?

No, not precisely! with a Ghazzâlî, and with Mohammedan mystics, clinging desperately to orthodoxy! The matter, in fact, turns precisely on this word "existent". What is existence? What is non-existence? It was Ghazzâlî's ontological philosophy that seems to have yielded him a fulcrum on which he could precariously balance the pantheistic and the deistic moments of his religious thought.

This philosophy is poetically stated in our treatise, but in spite of the poetic, imaginative diction it can be recognized as identical with his usual doctrine. [1] It will be found on pp. [17-19, 21, 22]. We have there a picturesque representation of a doctrine well known to the schoolmen of Islâm, that Not-Being is a sort of dark limbo in which the Contingent awaits the creative word Kun "Be!"--compared in this "Light" treatise to a ray of light from the One Self-existing Being. Neither the Greeks nor the schoolmen could ever quite get over the feeling that, in predicating anything of Not-being or a Nonentity, in using the word "is" in a sentence with Not-being or a Nonentity as its subject, you have in some way ascribed, not existence, but a sort of quasi-being, to that subject. Hegel's solution was so to evacuate the category of mere, bare "Being" of all content, and to demonstrate its consequent total impoverishment and inanity, that it could be seen to be, the equivalent of Not-being. This was impossible for the schoolmen, above all for Oriental schoolmen, even of the most contradictory schools, who regarded the category of "pure" being (they would never have said "mere") as the sublimest and most radiant of all the categories, and the very object of the whole quest of life. But the obverse of the Hegelian paradox may nevertheless be seen in their ascription to contingent not-yet-being a sort of quasi-existence. The effect of the creative word was simply to turn this potential into actual being. Thus the universe, always contingent, indeed but formerly potential-contingent, now became actual-contingent.

{p. 65}

All this is schematized in al-Mishkât. The limbo becomes Darkness (p. 30); the potential-contingent, Dark Things;[1] the divine creator, the Sun; the creative act, a Ray from His real being, whereby a dark Nonentity flashes into being and becomes an Entity, but an Entity that depends continuously on the permanent illumination of that ray, for in the Mohammedan creational scheme, at any rate, Creator is equally capable of being Annihilator.

At this point Ghazzâlî's tortured thought is greatly helped out by the ambiguous word

[1. It is just here that, as it seems to the writer, the Philosophers with their Aristotelian doctrine of the eternity, the formless substrate of things--might well have forced a place for their thought, in spite of the Ghazzâlian wrath against them and it. For when the dark "self-aspect" of these contingencies of the Theologians is considered, prior to their "existence" (p. [59]), is there much to choose between the eternal potentiality asserted of them by Ghazzâlî, and the eternity asserted for hyle by the Philosophers? Ghazzâlî himself quotes a saying of Mohammed (p. [13]), on to which these Philosophers would eagerly have seized proving the point: "Allâh created the creation in darkness, then sent an effusion of His light upon it," For a man who was using this divine light-emanation to typify the act of creation, of Calling out of non-being to being it was dangerous surely to give, apparently so powerful an indication as this of a previous creation in "darkness" (= not being in Ghazzâlî's chosen symbology). It might very well have been claimed by the Philosophers that this creation-in-darkness is precisely their formless, chaotic hyle, eternal as darkness is eternal before the light shines. The Philosophers did pretend to prove their thesis from the Koran; see Averroes' Manâhij, ed. Müller, p. 13 (=Cairo ed. Faisafat Ibn Rushd, p. 12), where the following texts are cited in support, S. 11, 9; 14, 49; 41, 10.]

{p. 66}

wajh, which has two senses, or rather three, Face, Side, Aspect (logical). This gave him a formula: it was not the first time, nor the last, that the ambiguity of the chief word in a theological formula has been welcome to all concerned. He could take the Koran texts "the Wajh of everything faces (muwajjah) to Him and is turned in His direction," and "Whithersoever they turn themselves, there is the Wajh of Allâh;" and the hadîth qudsî, "Everything is a perishing thing except His Wajh;" and could then play on the word. In ancient and mediaeval times the merest plays on words were not considered figures of speech but profundities of thought. Quibbles masqueraded as discoveries. And so this word (a) enabled Ghazzâlî to keep his hold on creationism on the one hand, for these were "things" sure enough, all turned towards the central Sun and dependent for their existence on its creative light; and there was also the sound logical position, that under this aspect (wajh) of relatedness these things have actual being (p. [18j). So the actuality of the universe is saved, and the abyss of pantheism is avoided. And (b), on the other hand, he could say to the pantheistic Sûfî (and to himself in that mood), that equally under this "aspect" of relatedness things, if and when considered an sich, had no existence, were not existent at all. The only Existent was the Wajh Allâh (p. [22]) that is, Allâh Himself, for, as he carefully informs us i (p. [191]), Allah cannot possibly be said to be greater" (akbar) than His own wajh; and I must, therefore, be identical therewith. And thus the out-and-out pantheist might well feel his case complete; the last vestige of dualism disappears; Allah is All, and All is Allah, lâ mawjûda ill-Allâh (M. p. [18])! As Ghazzâlî himself put it, Allah is the Sun and besides the sun there is only the sun's light. Quid plura?

Nevertheless, it may be believed that Ghazzâlî himself contrived to use this ontology so as to keep, not lose, his hold on the reality^[1] and actuality of things, and that early training, central theological orthodoxy, and strong commonsense proved by its help too strong for the pull towards pantheism, with which his late

[1. I.e. in the modern or western sense of the word, = "objectivity" To the mediaeval eastern thinker the Arabic the word meant rather "ideality." It is a case of the difference between phenomenal and transcendental reality.]

{p. 68}

Sûfism with its Neoplatonic atmosphere and sensational ecstasies undoubtedly did pull him--as Sûfism pulled every Mohammedan mystical devotee. Is it not notable that even in the lyrical passages in this treatise, in which he describes (with a rather scared unction) the Mystics' intoxication and the verbal blasphemies which that state so happily permitted, and which were permitted to that state, Ghazzâlî keeps his head, and preserves the same cautious balance as he does in the ontological sections (see pp. [19, 20])? When these inebriates, he says, became sober again, "and they came under the sway of the intelligence they knew that that had not been actual Identity, but only something resembling Identity" (not homoousion but homoiouision!). If we correctly translate ittihad^[1] thus, the remark is of crucial importance; for the ultimate test of a complete Pantheism is whether things are identical with God, or only united with Him. All classes of mystics without exception assert at least the latter--it is the "Union" of the Christian, as of the Muslim, Catholic; but only those who have actually surrendered their balance and toppled over into the pantheistic abyss assert the former. And Ghazzâlî did not do so. He goes on to quote yet another "drunken" cry of a soul in Union, "I am He whom I love, and He whom I love is I," and shows how even here a distinction is preserved. And then that other, who likened the Union to a transparent Glass filled with red Wine--

[1. Professor Macdonald prefers "identification," to bring out the verb-aspect of the masdar more clearly.]

"The glass is thin, the wine is clear.
The twain are alike, the matter is perplexed
For 'tis as though there were wine and no wineglass there,
Or as though there were wine-glass and nought of wine."

And thus comments: "Here there is a difference between saying 'The wine is the wineglass' and 'tis as though it were the wineglass'." The former, he tells us, is Identity (tawhîd), the latter Unification (tawhîd), not in the commonalty's meaning of tawhîd, he honestly says (p. [20]), for them this is one of "the mysteries which we are not at liberty to discuss"--but at the same time not inconsistent With that meaning. What he had in mind was, perhaps, something like this: "I reject the herd's interpretation of tawhîd, the mere declaration-of-the-oneness of Allâh, as a bare truism, miserable in its inadequacy. I likewise reject the other extreme, the pantheist's interpretation of the word as an absolute denial of the actuality of things, or an assertion that things are Allâh. Against them both I assert that Allâh and the Universe constitute a UNITY, but one wherein the Universe is wholly relative to and dependent on Allâh, for existence or nonexistence; preservation or annihilation. All existing things are and must be 'united' to Allâh. But even this must not be declare, openly, for, then, what about Iblîs, Hell, and the Damned? I must not seem to teach 'universalism' any more than pantheism. Allâhu a'lam! "

{p. 70}

It therefore seems to the writer that Ghazzâlî's position, which he tortured rather than explained when he tried to describe and illustrate it, really amounted to nothing more than the inevitable distinction between absolute and relative being; between things when viewed relationally, in their relation to their

{p. 71}

Author, and things viewed apart from that relation. Neither Author nor Things were to be denied actuality, or reality, as we understand the latter term. As between Allâh and human intelligences he even goes great lengths (in this very treatise of all others) in asserting parallelism and comparability, similarity therefore[1]; but between Allâh and all else ONE fundamental all-sufficient difference had to be asserted; namely, ALLAH is self-subsistent, qayyûm; things are not so. This distinction was the minimum one; yet also the maximum, for it preserved at once Creator and created, and gave actuality to each. There is, in truth, a good deal of wilful paradox in the Mishkât, of Oriental hyperbole, of pious highfalutin[2] intended perhaps to scare the "unco" orthodox of the day, to make their flesh creep a little for their health's sake, and to "wake them out of their dogmatic slumbers". For it is in the Mishkât that we find the following words, too,

[1. And to assert similarity between two things is at once to have asserted two, and a distinction between them. See M, p. [7].

2. Is not this true for all Sûfî writers? Do we not take their language too seriously? It parades as scientific; it is really poetico-rhetorical.]

{p. 72}

which seem plain and harmless enough: "Being is itself divided into that which has being-in-itself, and that which derives its being from not-itself. The being of this latter is borrowed, having no existence by itself. Nay, if it is regarded in and by itself it is pure not-being. Whatever being it has is due to its relation to not-itself, which is not real being at all . . ." In other words, it is by a purely arbitrary mental abstraction that we "regard derived being in and by itself". The impossibility of really effecting this abstraction is precisely what preserves to derived being its measure of actuality --"whatever being it has . . ."[1] To us these last words are a clear concession of reality to conditioned being. It is true Ghazzâlî denies reality to it in the next sentence. But this only shows that when an Oriental talks of "Real" he means what we mean by "Unconditioned", and that when he is thinking of "Conditioned or Relative" he says "Unreal." The matter has become one of terms.

[1. Gh. has no more use for the Noumenon, for the Ding an sich, than had the post-Kantians; though for how different reasons.]

{p. 73}

It is impossible to demand more than this from Ghazzâlî as philosopher-theologian. He was, perhaps, not more successful than other eastern theologians in finding a place for the universe, philosophically, with or in Allâh. But has western philosophy been any more successful in finding a place for Allâh, philosophically, with or in the universe?

THE NICHE FOR LIGHTS (Mishkât al-Anwâr)

Praise to ALLAH! who poureth forth light; and giveth sight; and, from His mysteries' height, removes the veils of night!

And Prayer for MUHAMMED! of all lights the Light; Sire of them that do the right; Beloved of The Sovereign of Might; Evangelist of the forgiven in his sight; to Him devoted quite; to sinner and to infidel the Arm that knows to fight and smile!

You have asked me, dear brother--and may Allâh decree for you the quest of man's chiefest bliss, make you candidate for the Ascent to the highest height anoint your vision with the light of Reality, and purge your inward parts from all that is not the Real!--You have asked me, I say, to communicate to you the mysteries of the Lights Divine, together with the allusions behind the literal meaning of certain texts in the Koran and certain sayings in the Traditions.

And principally this text[1]:--

"Allâh is the Light of the Heavens and of the Earth. The similitude of His Light is as it were a Niche wherein is a Lamp: the Lamp within a Glass: the Glass as it were a pearly Star. From a Tree right blessed is it lit, an Olive-tree neither of the East nor of the West, the Oil whereof were well-nigh luminous though Fire touched it not: Light upon Light!

"But as for the Infidels, their deeds are as it were massed Darkness upon some fathomless sea, the which is overwhelmed with billow topped by billow topped by cloud: Darkness on Darkness piled! so that when a man putteth forth his hand he well-nigh can see it not. Yea, the man for whom Allâh doth not cause light, no light at all hath he."

What is the significance of His comparison of LIGHT with Niche, and Glass, and Lamp, and Oil, and Tree?

And this Tradition

"Allâh hath Seventy Thousand Veils of

[1. The Light-Verse in S. 24, 35. The Darkness-Verse. which almost immediately follows, and is mentioned in the exposition, has been added.]

{p. 77}

Light and Darkness: were He to withdraw their curtain, then would the splendours of His Aspect^[1] surely consume everyone who apprehended Him with his sight."

Such is your request. But in making it you have assayed to climb an arduous ascent, so high that the height thereof cannot be so much as gauged by mortal eyes [p. 3]. You have knocked at a locked door which is only opened to those who know and "are established in knowledge."^[2] Moreover, not every mystery is to be laid bare or made plain, but-

"Noble hearts seal mysteries like the tomb."

Or, as one of those who Know has said--

"To divulge the secret of the Godhead is to deny God."

Or, as the Prophet has said--

"There is a knowledge like the form of a hidden thing, known to none save those who know God."

If then these speak of that secret, only the Children of Ignorance will contradict them. And howsoever many these Ignorants be, the [1. Or Countenance; see Introduction, p. 66.

2. Cf. S. 3, 6.]

{p. 78}

Mysteries must from the gaze of sinners be kept inviolate.

But I believe that your heart has been opened by the Light and your consciousness purged of the darkness of Ignorance. I will, therefore, not be so niggardly as to deny you direction to these glorious truths in all their fineness and all their divineness; for the wrong done in keeping Wisdom from her Children is not less than that of yielding her to those who are Strangers to her. As the poet hath it--

"He who bestoweth Knowledge on fools loseth it,
And he who keepeth the deserving from her doeth a wrong."

You must, however, be content with a very summarized explanation of the subject; for the full demonstration of my theme would demand a treatment of both its principles and its parts for which my time is at present insufficient, and for which neither my mind nor my energies are free. The keys of all hearts are in the hands of Allah: He opens them when He pleases, as He pleases, and with what {p. 79} He pleases. At this time, then, it shall suffice to open up to you three chapters or parts, whereof the first is as hereunder follows.

PART I.--LIGHT, AND LIGHTS: PRELIMINARY STUDIES

1. "Light" as Physical Light; as the Eye; as the Intelligence

The Real Light is Allâh; and the name "light" is otherwise only predicated metaphorically and conveys no real meaning.

To explain this theme: you must know that the word light is employed with a threefold signification: the first [p. 4] by the Many, the second by the Few, the third by the Fewest of the Few. Then you must know the various grades of light that relate to the two latter classes, and the degrees of the reality appertaining to these grades, in order that it may be disclosed to you, as these grades become clear, that ALLAH is the highest and the ultimate Light: and further, as the reality appertaining to each grade is revealed, that Allâh alone is the Real, the True Light, and beside Him there is no light at all.

{p. 80}

Take now the first signification. Here the word light indicates a phenomenon. Now a phenomenon, or appearance, is a relative term, for a thing necessarily appears to, or is concealed from, something other than itself; and thus its appearance and its non-appearance are both relative. Further, its appearance and its nonappearance are relative to perceptive faculties; and of these the most powerful and the most conspicuous, in the opinion of the Many, are the senses, one of which is the sense of sight. Further, things in relation to this sense of sight fall under these categories: (1) that which by itself is not visible, as dark bodies; (2) that which is by itself visible, but cannot make visible anything else, such as luminaries like the stars, and fire before it blazes up; (3) that which is by itself visible, and also makes visible, like the sun and the moon, and fire when it blazes up, and lamps. Now it is in regard to this third category that the name "light" is given: sometimes to that which is effused from these luminaries and falls on the exterior of opaque bodies, as when we say "The earth is lighted up", or "The light of the sun falls on the earth", or "The lamp-light falls on wall or on garment"; and sometimes to the luminaries themselves, because they are self-luminous. In sum, then, light is an expression for that which is by itself visible and [p. 5] makes other things visible, like the sun. This is the definition of, and the reality concerning, light, according to its first signification.

We have seen that the very essence of light is appearance to a percipient; and that perception depends on the existence of two things--light and a seeing eye. For, though light is that which appears and causes-to-appear, it neither appears nor causes-to-appear to the blind. Thus percipient spirit is as important as perceptible light quâ necessary element of perception; nay, 'tis the more important, in that it is the percipient spirit which apprehends and through which apprehension takes place; whereas light is not apprehensive, neither does apprehension take place through it, but merely when it is present. By the word light, in fact, is more properly understood that visualizing light which we call the eye. Thus men apply the word light to the light of the eye, and say of the weak-sighted that "the light of his eye is weak", and of the blear-eyed that "the light of his vision is impaired," and of the blind that "his light is quenched." Similarly of the pupil of the eye it is said that it concentrates "the light of vision, and strengthens it, the eye-lashes being given by the divine wisdom a black colour, and made to compass the eye every way round about, in order to concentrate its "light." And of the white of the eye it is said that it disperses the "light of the eye" and weakens it, so that to look long at a bright white surface, or still more at the sun's light, dazzles "the light of the eye" and effaces it, just as the weak are effaced by the side of the strong. You understand, then, that percipient spirit is called light; and why it is so called; and why it is more properly so called. And this is the second signification, that employed by the Few.

You must know, further, that the light of physical sight is [p. 6] marked by several kinds of defects. It sees others but not itself. Again, it does not see what is very distant, nor what is very near, nor what is behind a veil. It sees the exterior of things only, not their interior; the parts, not the whole; things finite, not things infinite. It makes many mistakes in its seeing, for what is large appears to its vision small; what is far, near; what is at rest, at motion; what is in motion, at rest. Here are seven defects inseparably attached to the physical eye. If, then, there be such an Eye as is free from all these physical defects, would not it, I ask, more properly be given the name of light? Know, then, that there is in the mind of man an eye, characterized by just this perfection--that which is variously called Intelligence, Spirit, Human Soul. But we pass over these terms, for the multiplicity of the terms deludes the man of small intelligence into imagining a corresponding multiplicity of ideas. We mean simply that by which the rational man is distinguished from the infant in arms, from the brute beast, and from the lunatic. Let us call it the Intelligence, following the current terminology. So, then, the intelligence is more properly called Light than is the eye, just because in capacity it transcends these seven defects.

Take the first. The eye does not behold itself, but the intelligence does perceive itself as well as others; and it perceives itself as endowed with knowledge, power, etc., and perceives its own knowledge and perceives its knowledge of its own knowledge, and its know, ledge of its knowledge of its own knowledge, and so on ad infinitum. Now, this is a property which cannot conceivably be attributed to anything which perceives by means of a physical instrument like the eye. Behind this, however, [p. 7] lies a mystery the unfolding of which would take long.

Take, now, the second defect: the eye does not see what is very near to it nor what is very far away from it; but to the intelligence near and far are indifferent. In the twinkling of an eye it ascends to the highest heaven above, in another instant to the confines of earth beneath. Nay, when the facts are realized, intelligence is revealed as transcending the very idea of "far" and "near," which occur between material bodies; these compass not the precincts of its holiness, for it is a pattern or sample of the attributes of Allâh. Now the sample must be commensurate with the original, even though it does not rise to the degree of equality^[1] with it. And this may move you to set your mind to work upon the true meaning of the tradition: "Allah created Adam after His own likeness." But I do not think fit at the present time to go more deeply into the same.

The third defect: the eye does not perceive what is behind the veil, but the intelligence moves freely about the Throne, the Sedile, and everything beyond the veil of the Heavens, and likewise about the Host Supernal, and the Realm Celestial, just as much as about its own world, and its propinquate, (that is its own) kingdom. The realities of things stand unveiled to the intelligence. Its only veil is one which it assumes of its own sake, which resembles the veil that the eye assumes of its own accord in the closing of its eyelids. But we shall explain this more fully in the third chapter of this work.

The fourth defect: the eye perceives only the exterior surfaces of things, but not their interior; may, the mere moulds and forms, not the realities; while intelligence breaks through into the inwardness of things and into their secrets; apprehends the reality of things and their essential spirits; [p. 8] elicits their causes and laws--from what they had origin, how they were created, of how many ideal forms they are composed, what rank of Being they occupy, what is their several relation to all other created things, and much else, the exposition of which would take very long; wherein I think good to be brief.

[1. Reading ### which both sense and rhyme demand.]

The fifth: the eye sees only a fraction of what exists, for all concepts, and many percepts, are beyond its vision; neither does it apprehend sounds, nor yet smells, nor tastes, nor sensations of hot and cold, nor the percipient faculties, by which I mean the faculties of hearing, of smelling, of tasting. nay, all the inner psychical qualities are unseen to it, joy, pleasure, displeasure, grief, pain, delight, love, lust, power, will, knowledge, and innumerable other existences. Thus it is narrow in its scope, limited in its field of action, unable to pass the confines of the world of colour and form, which are the grossest of all entities; for natural bodies are in themselves the grossest of the categories of being, and colour and form are the grossest of their properties. But the domain of intelligence is the entirety of existence, for it both apprehends the entities we have enumerated, and has free course among all others beside (and they are the major part), passing upon them judgments that are both certain and true. To it, therefore, are the inward secrets of things manifest, and the hidden forms of things clear. Then tell me by what right the physical eye is given equality with the intelligence in claiming the name of Light? No verily! it is only relatively light; but in relation to the intelligence it is darkness. Sight is but one of the spies of Intelligence [p. 9] who sets it to watch the grossest of his treasures, namely, the treasury of colours and forms; bids it carry reports about the same to its Lord, who then judges thereof in accordance with the dictates of his penetration and his judgment. Likewise are all the other faculties but Intelligence's spies--imagination, phantasy, thought, memory, recollection; and behind them are servitors and retainers, constrained to his service in this present world of his. These, I say, he constrains, and among these he moves at will, as freely as monarch constrains his vassals to his service, yea, and more freely still. But to expound this would take us long, and we have already treated of it in the book of my lhyâ` al-`Ulûm, entitled "The Marvels of the Mind".

The sixth: the eye does not see what is infinite. What it sees is the attributes of known bodies, and these can only be conceived as finite. But the intelligence apprehends concepts, and concepts cannot be conceived as finite. True, in respect of the knowledge which has actually been attained, the content actually presented to the intelligence is no more than finite, but potentially it does apprehend that which is infinite. It would take too long to explain this fully, but if you desire an example, here is one from arithmetic. In this science the intelligence apprehends the series of integers, which series is infinite; further, it apprehends the coefficients of two, three, and all the other integers, and to these also no limit can be conceived; and it apprehends all the different relations between numbers, and to these also no limit can be conceived; and finally it apprehends its own knowledge of a thing, and its knowledge of its knowledge of its knowledge of that thing; and so on, potentially, to infinity.

The seventh: the eye apprehends the large as small. It sees the sun the size of a bowl, and the stars like silver-pieces scattered upon a carpet of azure. But intelligence apprehends that the stars [p. 10] and the sun are larger, times upon times, than the earth. To the eye the stars seem to be standing still, and the boy to be getting no taller. But the intelligence sees the boy moving constantly as he grows; the shadow lengthening constantly; and the stars moving every instant, through distances of many miles. As the Prophet said to Gabriel, asking: "Has the sun moved?" And Gabriel answered: "No--Yes." "How so?" asked he; and the other replied: "Between my saying No and Yes it has moved a distance equal to five hundred years." And so the mistakes of vision are manifold, but the intelligence transcends them all.

Perhaps you will say, we see those who are Possessed of intelligence making mistakes nevertheless, I reply, their imaginative and phantastic faculties often pass judgments and form convictions which they think are the judgments of the intelligence. The error is therefore to be attributed to those lower faculties. See my account of all these faculties in my Mî`âr al-`Ilm and Mahakk al-Nazar. But when the intelligence is separated from the deceptions of the phantasy and the imagination, error on its part is inconceivable; it sees things as they are. This separation is, however, difficult, and only attains perfection after death. Then is error unveiled, and then are mysteries brought to light, and each one meets the weal or the woe which he has already laid up for himself, and "beholds a Book, which reckons each venial and each mortal sin, without omitting a single one".[1] In that hour it shall be said unto him: "We have stripped from thee the Veil that covered thee and thy vision this day is iron."[2] Now that covering Veil is even that of the imagination and the phantasy; and therefore the man who has been deluded by his own fancies, his false beliefs, and his vain

[1. S. 50, 18.

imaginings, replies: "Our Lord! We have seen Thee and heard Thee! [p.11] O send us back and we will do good.[1] Verily now we have certain knowledge!"

From all which you understand that the eye may more justly be called Light than the light (so called) which is apprehended by sense; and further that the intelligence should more properly be called Light than the eye. It would be even true to say that between these two there exists so great a difference in value, that we may, nay we must, consider only the INTELLIGENCE as deserving the name Light at all.

2. The Koran as the Sun of the Intelligence

Further you must notice here, that while the intelligence of men does truly see, the things it sees are not all upon the same plane. Its knowledge is in some cases, so to speak, given, that is, present in the intelligence, as in the case of axiomatic truths, e.g. that the same thing cannot be both with and without an origin; or existent and non-existent; or that the same proposition cannot be both true and false; or that the judgment which is true of one thing is true of an identically similar thing; or that, granted the existence of the particular, the existence of the universal must necessarily follow.

For example, granted the existence of black, the existence of "colour" follows; and the same with "man" and "animal"; but the converse does not present itself to the intelligence as necessarily true; for "colour" does not involve "black", nor does "animal" involve "man". And there are many other true propositions, some necessary, some contingent, and some impossible. Other propositions, again, do not find the intelligence invariably with them, when they recur to it, but have to shake it up, arouse it, strike flint on steel, in order to elicit its spark. Instances of such propositions are the theorems of speculation, to apprehend which the intelligence has to be aroused by the dialectic (kalâm) of the philosophers. Thus it is when the light of philosophy dawns that man sees actually, after having before seen potentially. Now the greatest [p. 12] of philosophies is the word (kalâm) of Allah in general, and the Koran in particular.

{p. 93}

Therefore the verses of the Koran, in relation to intelligence, have the value of sunlight in relation to the eyesight, to wit, it is by this sunlight that the act of seeing is accomplished. And therefore the Koran is most properly of all called Light, just as the light of the sun is called light. The Koran, then, is represented to us by the sun, and the intelligence by the Light of the Eye, and hereby we understand the meaning of the verse, which said: "Believe then on Allâh and His Prophet, and the Light which We caused to descend;"[1] and again: "There hath come a sure proof from your Lord, and We have caused a clear Light to descend."[2]

3. The Worlds Visible and Invisible: with their Lights

You have now realized that there are two kinds of eye, an external and an internal; that the former belongs to one world, the World of Sense, and that internal vision belongs to another world altogether, the World of the Realm Celestial; and that each of these two eyes has a sun and a light whereby its seeing is perfected; and that one of these suns is external, the other internal, the former belonging to the seen world, viz. the sun, which is an object of sense. perception, and the other internal, belonging to the world of the Realm Celestial, viz. the Koran, and other inspired books of Allah. If, then, this has been disclosed to you thoroughly and entirely, then one of the doors of this Realm Celestial has been opened unto you. In that world there are marvels, in comparison with which this world of sight is utterly condemned. He who never fares to that world, but allows the limitations of life in this lower world of sense to settle upon him, is still a(brute beast, an excommunicate from that which constitutes us men; gone astray is he more than any brute beast, for to the brute are not vouched the wings of flight, on which to fly away unto that invisible world. "Such men," the Koran says, "are cattle, nay, are yet further astray!"[1] [p. 13] As the rind is to the fruit; as the mould or the form in relation to the spirit, as darkness in relation to light; as infernal to supernal; so is this World of Sense in relation to the world of the Realm Celestial. For this reason the latter is called the World Supernal or the World of Spirit, or the World of Light, in contrast with the World Beneath, the World of Matter and of Darkness. But do not imagine that I mean by the World Supernal the World of the [Seven] Heavens, though they are "above" in respect of part of our world of sense-perception. These heavens are equally present to our apprehension, and that of the lower animals. But a man finds the doors of the Realm Celestial closed to him, neither does he become of or belonging to that Realm unless "this earth to him be changed into that which is not earth, and likewise the heavens"[1]; unless, in short, all that comes within the ken of his sense and his imagination, including the visible heavens, cause to be his earth, and his heaven come to be all that transcends his sense. This is the first Ascension for every Pilgrim, who has set out on his Progress to approach the Presence Dominical. Thus mankind was consigned back to the lowest of the low, and must thence rise to the world of highest height. Not so is it with the Angels; for they are part of the World of the

[1. S. 64,8.

{p. 94}

{p. 96}

Realm Celestial, floating ever in the Presence of the Transcendence, whence, they gaze down upon our World Inferior. Thereof spoke the Prophet in the Tradition: "Allâh created the creation in darkness, then sent an effusion of His light upon it," and "Allâh hath Angels, beings who know the works often better than they know them themselves." Now the Prophets, when their ascents reached unto the World of the Realm Celestial, attained the uttermost goal, and from thence looked down upon a totality of the World Invisible; for he who is in the World of the Realm Celestial is with Allâh, and hath the keys [p. 14] of the Unseen. I mean that from where he is the causes of existing things descend into the World of Sense; for the world of sense is one of the effects of yonder world of cause, resulting from it just as the shadow results from a body, or as fruit from that which fructuates, or as the effect from a cause. Now the key to this knowledge of the effect is sought and found in the cause. And for this reason the World of Sense is a type of the World of the Realm Celestial, as will appear when we explain the NICHE, the LAMP, and the TREE. For the thine, compared is in some sort parallel, and bears resemblance, to the thing compared therewith, whether that resemblance be remote or near: a matter, again, which is unfathomably deep, so that whoever has scanned its inner meaning had revealed to him the verities of the types in the Koran by an easy way.

I said that everything that sees self and not-self deserves more properly the name of Light, while that which adds to these two functions the function of making the not-self visible, still more properly deserves the name of Light than that which has no effect whatever beyond itself. This is the light which merits the name of "Lamp Illuminant",[1] because its light is effused upon the not-self. Now this is the property of the transcendental prophetic spirit, for through its means are effused the illuminations of the sciences upon the created world. Thus is explained the name given by Allâh to Mohammed, "Illuminant." [2] Now all the Prophets are Lamps, and so are the Learned- but the difference between them is incalculable.

[1. S. 33, 46.

2. S. 46, 33.]

{p. 98}

4. These Lights as Lamps Terrestrial and Celestial: with their Order and Grades

If it is proper to call that from which the light of vision emanates a "Lamp Illuminant", then that from which the Lamp is itself lit may [p. 15] meetly be symbolized by Fire. Now all these Lamps Terrestrial were originally lit from the Light Supernal alone; and of the transcendental Spirit of prophecy it is written that "Its oil were well-nigh luminous though fire touched it not"; but becomes "very light upon light" when touched by that Fire. [1] Assuredly, then, the kindling source of those Spirits Terrestrial is the divine Spirits Supernal, described by Ali and Ibn Abbas, when they said that "Allâh hath an Angel with countenances seventy thousand, to each countenance seventy thousand mouths, in each mouth seventy thousand tongues wherewith he laudeth God most High". This is he who is contrasted with all the angelic host, in the words: "On the day whereon THE SPIRIT ariseth and the Angels, rank on rank." [2] These Spirits Celestial, then, if they be considered as the kindling-source of the [1. S. 24, 35; see p. [45] of translation.

2. S. 28, 78.]

{p. 99}

Lamps Terrestrial, can be compared alone with "Fire". [1] And that kindling is not perceived save "on the Mountain's side". [2]

Let us now take these Lights Celestial from which are lit the Lamps Terrestrial, and let us rank them in the order in which they themselves are kindled, the one from the other. Then the nearest to the fountain-head will be of all others the worthiest of the name of Light for he is the highest in order and rank. Now the analogy for this graded order in the world of sense can only be seized by one who sees the light of the moon coming through the window of a house, falling on a mirror fixed upon a wall, which reflects that light on to another wall, whence it in turn is reflected on the floor, so that the floor becomes illuminated therefrom. The light upon the floor is owed to that upon the wall, and the light on the wall to that in the mirror, and the light in the mirror to that from the moon, and the light in the moon to that from the sun, [16] for it is the sun that radiates its light upon the moon. Thus these four lights are ranged one above the other, each

2. S. 28, 29: also 19, 53.]

{p. 100}

one more perfect than the other; and each one has a certain rank and a proper degree which it never passes beyond. I would have you know, then, that it has been revealed to the men of Insight that even so are the Lights of the Realm Celestial ranged in an order; and that the highest is the one who is nearest to the Ultimate Light. It may well be, then, that the rank of Seraphiel is above the rank of Gabriel; and that among them is that Nighest to Allâh, he whose rank comes nighest to the Presence Dominical which is the Fountain-head of all these lights; and that among these is a Nighest to Man, and that between these two are grades innumerable, whereof all that is known is that they are many, and that they are ordered in rank and grade, and that as they have described themselves, so they are indeed--"Not one of us but has his determined place and standing,"[1] and "We are verily the ranked ones; we are they in whose mouth is Praise."[1]

5. The Source of all these Grades of Light: ALLAH

The next thing I would have you know is that these degrees of light do not ascend in an infinite series, but rise to a final Fountain-head who is Light in and by Himself, upon Whom comes no light from any external source, and from Whom every light is effused according to, its order and grade. Ask yourself, now whether the name Light is more due to that which is illumined and borrows its light from an external source; or that which in itself is luminous, illuminating all else beside? I do not believe that you can fail to see the true answer, and thus conclude that the name light is most of all due to this LIGHT SUPERNAL, above Whom there is no light at all, and from Whom light descends upon all other things.

Nay, I do not hesitate to say boldly that the term "light" as applied to aught else than this primary light is purely metaphorical; for all [p. 17] others, if considered in themselves, have, in themselves and by themselves, no light at all. Their light is borrowed from a foreign source; which borrowed illumination has not any support in itself, only in something not-itself. But to call the borrower by the same name as the lender is mere metaphor. Think you that the man who borrows riding-habit, saddle, horse, or other riding beast, and mounts the same when and as the lender appoints, is actually, or only metaphorically, rich? Or is it the lender who alone is rich? The latter, assuredly! The borrower remains in himself as poor as ever, and only of him who made the loan and exacts its return can richness be predicated--him who gave and can take away. Therefore, the Real Light is He in Whose hand lies creation and its destinies; He who first gives the light and afterwards sustains it. He shares with no other the reality of this name, nor the full title to the same; save in so far as He calls some other by that name, deigns to call him by it in the same way as a Liege-Lord deigns to give his vassal a fief, and therewith bestows on him the title of lord. Now when that vassal realizes the truth, he understands that both he and his are the property of his Liege, and of Him alone, a property shared by Him with no partner in the world.

You now know that Light is summed up in appearing and manifesting, and you have ascertained the various gradations of the same. You must further know that there is no darkness so intense as the darkness of No-being. For[1] a dark thing is called "dark" simply because it cannot appear to anyone's vision; it never comes to exist for sight, though it does exist in itself. But that which has no existence for others nor for itself is assuredly the very extreme of darkness. In contrast with it is Being, which is, therefore, Light; for unless a thing is manifest in itself, [p. 18] it is not manifest to others. Moreover, Being is itself divided into that which has being in itself, and that which derives its being from not-itself. That being of this latter is borrowed, having no existence by itself. Nay, if it is regarded in and by itself, it is pure not-being. Whatever being it has is due to its relation to a not-itself; and this is not real being at all, as you learned from my parable of the Rich and the Borrowed Garment. Therefore, Real Being is Allâh most High, even as Real Light is likewise Allâh.

6. The Mystic Verity of Verities

It is from this starting-point that Allâh's gnostics rise from metaphors to realities, as one

climbs from the lowlands to the mountains; and at the end of their Ascent see, as with the direct sight of eye-witnesses, that there is nothing in existence save Allâh alone, and that "everything perisheth except His Countenance, His Aspect"[1] (wajh); not that[2] it perisheth at some particular moment, but rather it is sempiternally a perishing thing, since it cannot be conceived except as perishing. For each several thing other than Allâh is, when considered in and by itself, pure not-being; and if considered from the "aspect" (wajh) to which existence flows from the Prime Reality, it is viewed as existing, but not in itself, solely from the "aspect" which accompanies Him Who gives it existence. Therefore, the God-aspect is the sole thing in existence. For everything has two aspects, an aspect to itself and an aspect to its Lord: in respect of the first, it is Not-being; but in respect of the God-aspect, it is Being. Therefore there is no Existent except God and the God-aspect, and therefore all things are perishing except the God-aspect from and to all eternity. These gnostics, therefore, have no need

2. Reading ###.]

{p. 105}

await the arising of the Last Uprising in order to hear the Creator proclaim, "To whom is the power this day? To ALLAH! the One, the Not-to-be-withstood"[1]; [p. 19] for that summons is.. pealing in their ears always and for ever. Neither do they understand by the cry "Allah is most great" (Allâhu akbar) that He is only "greater" than others. God forbid! For in. all existence there is beside Him none for Him. to exceed in greatness. No other attains so much as to the degree of co-existence, or of sequent existence, nay of existence at all, except from the Aspect that accompanies Him. All existence is, exclusively, His Aspect. Now it is impossible that He should be "greater" than His own Aspect. The meaning is rather that he is too absolutely Great to be called Greater, or Most Great, by way of relation or comparison--too Great for anyone, whether Prophet or Angel, to grasp the real nature of His Greatness. For none knows Allah with a real knowledge but He Himself; for every, known falls necessarily under the sway and within the province of the Knower; a state:

which is the very negation of all Majesty, all "Greatness". The full proof whereof I have given in my al-Maqsad al-Asnâ fî ma`ânî asmâ'i llâhi-l Husnâ.

These gnostics, on their return from their Ascent into the heaven of Reality, confess with one voice that they saw nought existent there save the One Real. Some of them, however, arrived at this scientifically, and others experimentally and subjectively. From these last the plurality of things fell away in its entirety. They were drowned in the absolute Unitude, and their intelligences were lost in Its abyss. Therein became they as dumbfounded things. No capacity remained within them save to recall ALLAH; yea, not so much as the capacity to recall their own selves. So there remained nothing with them save ALLAH. They became drunken with a drunkenness wherein the sway of their own intelligence disappeared; so that one[1] exclaimed, "I am The ONE REAL!" and another, "Glory be to ME! How great is MY glory!"[2] and another, "Within this robe is nought but Allâh!"[2] ... But the words of

2. Abû Yazîd al-Bistâmî. See Massignon's Hallâj, p. 513.]

{p. 107}

Lovers Passionate in their intoxication and ecstasy [p. 20] must be hidden away and not spoken of . . . Then when that drunkenness abated and they came again under the sway of the intelligence, which is Allâh's balance-scale upon earth, they knew that that had not been actual Identity, but only something resembling Identity; as in those words of the Lover at the height of his passion:--

"I am He whom I love and He whom I love is I;
We are two spirits immanent in one body."[1]

For it is possible for a man who has never seen a mirror in his life, to be confronted suddenly by a mirror, to look into it, and to think that the form which he sees in the mirror is the form of the mirror itself, "identical" with it. Another might see wine in a glass, and think that the wine is just the stain of the glass. And if that thought becomes with him use and wont, like a fixed idea with him, it absorbs him wholly, so that he sings:--

"The glass is thin, the wine is clear!
The twain are alike, the matter is perplexed:

[1. By al-Hallâj.]

{p. 108}

For 'tis as though there were wine and no wineglass there,
Or as though mere were wine-glass and nought of wine!"

He there is a difference between saying, "The wine is the wine-glass," and saying, "'tis as though it were the wine-glass." Now, when this state prevails, it is called in relation to him who experiences it, Extinction, nay, Extinction of Extinction, for the soul has become extinct to itself, extinct to its own extinction; for it becomes unconscious of itself and unconscious of its own unconsciousness, since, were it conscious of its own unconsciousness, it would be conscious of itself. In relation to the man immersed in this state, the state is called, in the language of metaphor, "Identity"; in the language of reality, "Unification." And beneath these verities also lie mysteries which we are not at liberty to discuss.

7. The "God-Aspect": an "advanced" Explanation of the Relation of these Lights to ALLAH

It may be that you desire greatly to know the aspect (wajh) [p. 21] whereby Allâh's light is related to the heavens and the earth, or rather the aspect whereby He is in Himself the Light of heavens and earth. And this shall assuredly not be denied you, now that you know that Allâh is Light, and that beside Him there is no light. and that He is every light, and that He is the universal light: since light is an expression for that by which things are revealed; or., higher still, that by and for which they are revealed; yea, and higher still, that by, for, and from which they are revealed: and now that, you know, too that, of everything called light, only that by, for, and from which things are revealed is real--that Light beyond which there is no light to kindle and feed its flame, for It is kindled and fed in itself, from Itself, and for Itself, and from no other source at all. Such a conception, such a description, you are now assured, can be applied to the Great Primary, alone. You are also assured that the heavens and the earth are filled with light appertaining to those two fundamental light-planes, our Sight and our Insight; by which I mean our senses and our intelligence. The first kind of light is what we see in the heavens--sun and moon and stars; and what we see in earth--that is, the rays which are poured over the whole face of the earth, making visible all the different colours and hues, especially in the season of spring; and over all animals and plants and things, in all their states: for without these rays no colour would appear or even exist. Moreover, every shape and size which is visible to perception is apprehended in consequence of colour, and it is impossible to conceive of apprehending them without colour. As for the other ideal, intelligential Lights, the World Supernal is filled with them--to wit, the angelic substance; and the World Inferior is also full of them--[p. 22] to wit, animal life and human life successively. The order of the World Inferior is manifested by means of this inferior human light; while the order of the World Supernal is manifested by means of that angelical light. This is the order alluded to in the passage in the Koran, "He it is Who has formed you from the earth, and hath peopled it with you, that He might call you Successors upon the earth" . . . and "Maketh you Successors on the earth," and "Verily I have set in the earth a Successor" (Khalîfa).[1]

{p. 109}

{p. 110}

Thus you see that the whole world is all filled with the external lights of perception, and the internal lights of intelligence; also that the lower lights are effused or emanate the one from the other, as light emanates or is effused from a lamp; while the Lamp itself is the transcendental Light of Prophecy; and that, the transcendental Spirits of Prophecy are lit from the Spirit Supernal, as the lamp is lit from fire; and that the Supernals are lit the one from the other; and that their order is one of ascending grades: further, that these all rise to the Light of Lights, the Origin and Fountainhead of lights, and that is ALLAH, only and alone; and that all other lights are borrowed from Him, and that His alone is real light; and that everything is from His light, nay, He is everything, nay, HE IS THAT HE is, none but He has ipseity or heity at all, save by metaphor. Therefore there is no light but He, while all other lights are only lights from the Aspect which accompanies Him, not from themselves. Thus the aspect and face of everything faces to Him and turns in His direction; and "whithersoever they turn themselves there is the Face of Allâh." [1] So, then, there is no divinity but HE; for "divinity" is an expression by which is connoted that towards which all faces are directed [2] in worship and in confession--that He is Deity; but which I mean the faces of the hearts of men, for they verily are lights and spirits. Nay, more, just as "there is no deity but He," so there is no heity but He, [p. 23] for "he" is an expression for something which one can indicate; but in every and any case we can but indicate Him. Every time you indicate anything, your indication is in reality, to Him, even though through your ignorance of the truth of truths which we have mentioned you -know it not. Just as one cannot point to, indicate, sunlight but only the sun, so the relation of the sum of things to Allâh is, in the visible -analogue, as the relation of light to the sun. Therefore "There is no deity but ALLAH" is the [1. S. 2. 115, see 144, 149, 150.

2. Gh.'s piece of amateur etymology here, by which he appears to derive the root 'lh ("god") from the root wty ("turn"), is about as absurd as my attempt to suggest it in the English.]

{p. 113}

Many's declaration of Unity: that of the Few is "There is no he but HE"; the former is more general, but the latter is more particular, more comprehensive, more exact, and more apt to give him who declares it entrance into the pure and absolute Oneness and Onliness. This kingdom of the One-and-Onliness is the ultimate point of mortals' Ascent: there is no ascending stage beyond it; for "ascending" involves plurality, being a sort of relatively involving two stages, an ascent from and an ascent to. But when Plurality has been eliminated, Unity is established, relation is effaced, all indication from "here" to "there" falls away, and there remains neither height nor depth, nor anyone to fare up or down. The upward Progress, the Ascent of the soul, then becomes impossible, for there is no height beyond the Highest, no plurality alongside of the One, and, now that plurality has terminated, no Ascent for the soul. If there be, indeed, any change, it is by way of the "Descent into the Lowest Heaven", the radiation from above downwards; for the Highest, though It may have no higher, has a lower. This is the goal of goals, the last object of spiritual search, known of him who knows it, denied by him who is ignorant of it. It belongs to that knowledge which is according to the form of the hidden thing, and which no one knoweth save the Learned[1] is Allah. If, therefore, they utter it, it is only denied by the Ignorant of Him.

There is no improbability in the explanation given by these Learned to this "Descent into the Lowest Heaven", [p. 24] namely, that it is the descent of an Angel; though one of those Gnostics[2] has, indeed, fancied a less probable explanation. He, immersed as he was in the divine One-and-Onliness, said that Allah has "a descent into the lowest heaven", and that this descent is His descent, in order to use physical senses, and to set in motion bodily limbs; and that He is the one indicated in the Tradition in which the Prophet says, "I have become His hearing whereby He heareth, His vision whereby He seeth, His tongue wherewith He speaketh." Now if the Prophet was Allah's hearing and vision and tongue, then Allah and He alone is

[1. Cf. S. 3, 7.

2. Al-Hallâjj.

3. A saying reported by Ibn Adham, d. 170.]

{p. 115}

the Hearer, the Seer, the Speaker; and He is the one indicated in His own word to Moses, "I was sick, and thou visitedst Me not." [1] According to this, the bodily movements of this Confessor of the divine Unity are from the lowest heaven; his sensation from a heaven next above; and his intelligence from the heaven next above that. From that heaven of the intelligence he fares upward to the limit of the Ascension of created things, the kingdom of the One-and-Onliness, a sevenfold way; thereafter "setteth he himself on the throne" of the divine Unity, and therefrom "taketh command"[2] throughout his storied heavens. Well might one, in looking upon such an one, apply to him the saying, "Allah created Adam after the image of the Merciful One"; until, after contemplating that word more deeply, he becomes aware that it has an interpretation like those other words, "I am the ONE REAL," "Glory be to ME!" [3] or those sayings of the Prophet, that Allah said, "I was sick and thou visitedst Me not," and "I am His hearing, and His vision; and His tongue". But I see fit now to draw rein in this exposition, for I think that you cannot hear more of this sort than the amount which I have now communicated.

8. The Relation of these Lights to ALLAH: Simpler Illustrations and Explanations

It may well be that you will not rise to the height of these words, for all your pains; it may be that for all your pains you will come short of it after all. Here, then, is something that lies nearer your understanding, and nearer your weakness. The meaning of the doctrine that Allah is [p. 25] the Light of Heavens and Earth may be understood in relation to phenomenal, visible light. When you see hues of spring-the tender green, for example-in the full light of day, you entertain no doubt but that you are looking on colours, and very likely you suppose that you are looking on nothing else alongside of them. As though you should say, "I see nothing alongside of the green." Many have in fact, obstinately maintained this. They have asserted that light is a meaningless term, and that there is nothing but colour with the colours. Thus they denied the existence of the light, although it was the most manifest of all things--how should it not be so, considering that through it alone all things become manifest?, for it is the thing that is itself visible and makes visible, as we said before. But, when the sun sank, and heaven's lamp disappeared from sight, and night's shadow fell, then apprehended these men the existence of an essential difference between inherent shadow and inherent light; and they confessed that light is a form that lies behind all colour, and is apprehended with colour, insomuch that, so to speak, through its intense union with the colours it is not apprehended, and through its intense obviousness it is invisible. And it may be that this very intensity is the direct cause of its invisibility, for things that go beyond one extreme pass over to the extreme opposite.

If this is clear to you, you must further know that those endowed with this Insight never saw a single object without seeing Allah along with it. It may be that one of them went further than this and said, "I have never seen a single object, but I first saw Allah"; for some of, them only see objects through and in Allah, while others first see objects and then see Allah in and through those objects. It is to the first class that the Koran alludes to in the words, "Doth it not suffice that My Lord seeth all?"[1] and to the second in the words, "We shall shew them our signs in all the world and in themselves." For the first class [p. 26] have the direct intuition of Allah, and the second infer Him from His works. The former is the rank of the Saint-Friends of God, the latter of the Learned "who are established in knowledge".[2] After these two grades there remains nothing except that of the careless, on whose faces is the veil.

Thus you see that just as everything is manifest to man's Sight by means of light, so everything is manifest to man's Insight by means of Allah; for He is with everything every moment and by Him does everything appear. But here the analogy ceases, and we have a radical difference; namely, that phenomenal light can be conceived of as disappearing with the sinking of the sun, and as assuming a veil in order that shadow may appear: while the divine light, which is the condition of all appearance, cannot be conceived as disappearing. That sun can never set! It abides for ever with all things. Thus the method of difference (as a method for the demonstration of the Existence of God from His works) is not at our disposal. Were the appearance of Allah conceivable, heaven and earth would fall to ruin, and thence, through difference, would be apprehended an effect which would simultaneously compel the recognition of the Cause whereby all things appeared. But, as it is, all Nature remains the same and invariable to our sight because of the unity of its Creator, for "all things are singing His praise"[1] (not some things) at all times (not sometimes); and thus the method of difference is eliminated, and the way to the knowledge of God is obscured. For the most manifest way to the knowledge of things is by their contraries: the thing that possesses no contrary and no opposite, its features being always exactly alike when you are looking at it, will very likely elude your notice altogether. In this case its obscureness results from its very obviousness, and its elusiveness from the very radiance of its brightness. Then glory to Him who hides Himself from His own creation by His utter manifestness, and is veiled from their gaze through the very effulgence of His own light!

[1. S. 41, 53.

{p. 119}

But it may be that not even this teaching is intelligible to some limited intelligences, [27] who from our statement (that "Allah is with, everything", as the light is with everything) will understand that He is in every place. Too high. and holy is He to be related to place! So far from starting this vein imagining, we assert to you that He is prior to everything, and above everything, and that He makes everything manifest. Now manifest is inseparable from, manifested, subjectively, in the cognition of the thinker; and this is what we mean by saying. that Allah accompanies or is "with" everything. You know, further, that manifest is prior to, and above, manifested, though He be "with" it; but he is "with" it from one aspect, and "above" it from another. You are not to suppose, therefore, that there is here any contradiction. Or, consider, how in the world of sense, which is the highest to which your knowledge can rise, the motion of your hands goes "with" the motion of its shadow, and yet is prior to it as well. And whoever has not wit enough to see this, ought to abandon these researches altogether; for

"To every science its own people;
And each man finds easy that for which he has been created apt."

PART II.--THE SCIENCE OF SYMBOLISM, PROLEGOMENA TO THE EXPLANATION OF THE SYMBOLISM OF THE NICHE, THE LAMP, THE GLASS, THE TREE, THE OIL, AND THE FIRE

The exposition of this symbolism involves, first of all, two cardinal considerations, which afford limitless scope for investigation, but to which I shall merely allude very briefly here.

First, the science and method of symbolism; the way in which the spirit of the ideal form^[1] is captured by the mould of the symbol; the mutual relationship of the two; the inner nature of this correspondence between the world of Sense (which supplies the clay of the moulds, the material of the symbolism) and the world of the Realm Supernal from which the Ideas descend.^[1]

[1. Or Idea = in practically the Platonic sense.]

{p. 122}

Second, the gradations of the several spirits of our mortal clay, and the degree [p. 28] of light possessed by each. For we treat of this latter symbolism in order to explain the former.

(i) THE OUTWARD AND THE INWARD IN SYMBOLISM: TYPE AND ANTITYPE

The world is Two Worlds, spiritual and material, or, if you will, a World Sensual and a World Intelligential; or again, if you will, a World Supernal and a World Inferior. All these expressions are near each other, and the difference between them is merely one of viewpoint. If you regard the two worlds in themselves, you use the first expression; if in respect of the organ which apprehends them, the second; if in respect of their mutual relationship, the third. You may, perhaps, also term

[1. (By Ghazzâlî.) In this Light-Verse, in Ibn Mas'ûd's reading, the words "in the heart of the believer, "follow the words "of His light". And Ubayy b. Ka`b's instead of "the similitude of His light", has "the similitude of the light of the heart of him who believes is like". etc.]

{p. 123}

them the World of Dominance and Sense-perception, and, the World of the Unseen and the Realm Supernal. It were no marvel if the students of the realities underlying the terminology were puzzled by the multiplicity of these terms, and imagined a corresponding multiplicity of ideas. But he to whom the realities beneath the terms are disclosed makes the ideas primary and the terms secondary: while inferior minds take the opposite course. To them the term is the source from which the reality proceeds. We have an allusion to these two types of mind in the Koran, "Whether is the more rightly guided, he who walks with his face bent down, or he who walks in a straight Way, erect?"[1]

1. The two Worlds: their types and antitypes

Such is the idea of the Two Worlds. And the next thing for you to know is, that the supernal world of "the Realm" is a world invisible to the majority of men; and the world of our senses is the world of perception, because it is perceived of all. This World Sensual is the point from which we ascend to [p. 29] the world Intelligential: and, but for this connexion between the two, and their reciprocal relationship, the way upward to the higher sphere would be barred. And were this upward was impossible, then would the Progress to the Presence Dominical and the near approach to Allah be impossible too. For no man shall approach near unto Allah, unless his foot stand at the very centre of the Fold of the Divine Holiness. Now by this World of the "Divine Holiness" we mean the world that transcends the apprehension of the senses and the imagination. And it is in respect of the law of that world--the law that the soul which is a stranger to it neither goeth out therefrom, nor entereth therein--that we call it the Fold of the Divine Holiness and Transcendence. And the human spirit, which is the channel of the manifestations of the Transcendence, may be perhaps called "the Holy Valley".[1]

Again, this Fold comprises lesser folds, some of which penetrate more deeply than others into the ideas of the Divine Holiness.

{p. 125}

But the term Fold embraces all the gradations of the lesser ones; for you must not suppose that these terms are enigmas, unintelligible to men of Insight. But I cannot pursue the subject further, for I see that my preoccupation with citing and explaining all this terminology is turning me from my theme. It is for you to apply yourself now to the study of the terms.

To return to the subject we were discussing: the visible world is, as we said, the point of departure up to the world of the Realm Supernal; and the "Pilgrim's Progress of the Straight Way"[1] is an expression for that upward course, which may also be expressed by "The Faith," "the Mansions of Right Guidance." Were there no relation between the two worlds, no inter-connexion at all, then all upward progress would be inconceivable from one to the other. Therefore, the divine mercy gave to the World Visible a correspondence with the World of the Realm Supernal, and for this reason there is not a single thing in this world of sense that is not a symbol of something in yonder one. It may well hap that some one thing in this world may symbolize several things in the World of the Realm Supernal, and equally well that some one thing in the latter may have several symbols [p. 30] in the World Visible. We call a thing typical or symbolic when it resembles and corresponds to its antitype under some aspect.

A complete enumeration of these symbols would involve our exhausting the whole of the existing things in both of the Two Worlds! Such a task our mortal powers can never fulfil; or human faculties have not sufficed to comprehend it in the past; and with our little lives we cannot expound it fully in the present. The utmost I can do is to explain to you a single example. The greater may then be inferred from the less; for the door of research into the mysteries of this knowledge will then lie open to you.

2. An Example of Symbolism, from the Story of Abraham in the Koran

Listen now. If the World of the Realm Supernal contains Light-substances, high and lofty, called "Angels", from which substances the various lights are effused upon the various

mortal spirits, and by reason of which these angels are called "lords," then is Allah "Lord of lords," and these lords will have differing, grades of luminousness. The symbols, then, of these in the visible world will be, preeminently, the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars.

And the Pilgrim of the Way rises first of all to a degree corresponding to that of a star. The effulgence of that star's light appears to him., It is disclosed to him that the entire world beneath adores its influence and the effulgence of its light. And so, because of the very beauty and superbness of the thing, he is made aware of something which cries aloud saying, "This is my Lord?"[1] He passes on; and as he be. comes conscious of the light-degree next above. it, namely, that symbolized by the moon, lo! in the aerial canopy he beholds that star set, to wit, in comparison with its superior; and he saith, "Nought that setteth do I adore!" And so he rises till he arrives at last at the degree symbolized by the sun. This, again, he sees is greater and higher than the former, but nevertheless admits of comparison therewith, in, virtue of a relationship between the two. [31] But to bear relationship to what is imperfect carries with it imperfection-the "setting" of our allegory. And by reason thereof he saith: "I have turned my face unto That Who made the heavens and the earth! I am a true believer, and, not of those who associate other gods with Allah!" Now what is meant to be conveyed by this "THAT WHO" is the vaguest kind of indication, destitute of all relation or comparison. For, were anyone to ask, "What is the symbol comparable with or corresponding to this That?' no answer to the question could be conceived. Now He Who transcends all relations is ALLAH, the ONE REALITY. Thus, when certain Arabs once asked the Apostle of God, "To what may we relate Allah?' this reply was revealed, "Say, He, Allah is one! His days are neither ended nor begun; neither is He a father nor a son; and none is like unto Him, no not one[1]; the meaning of which verse is simply that He transcends relation. Again, when Pharaoh said to Moses: "What, pray, is the Lord of the Universe?" as though demanding

[1. See for this whole passage S. 6, 75-8.]

{p. 128}

to know His essence, Moses, in his reply, merely indicated His works, because these were clearer to the mind of his interrogator; and answered, "The Lord of the heavens and the earth." [1] But Pharaoh said to his courtiers, "Ha! marked ye that!" as though objecting to Moses' evasion of his demand to be told Allah's essential nature. Then

Moses said, "Your Lord, and your first fathers' Lord." Pharaoh then set him down as insane. He had demanded an analogue, for the description of the divine Essence, and Moses replied to him from His works. And so Pharaoh said, "Your prophet who has been sent you is insane."

3. Fundamental Examples of Symbolism especially from the Story of Moses in the Koran

Let us now return to the pattern we selected for illustrating the symbolic method. The science of the Interpretation of Visions determines for us the value of each kind of symbol; for "Vision is a part of Prophecy." It is clear, is it not, that the sun, when seen in a vision, must be interpreted by a Sovereign Monarch, because of their mutual resemblance and their share in a common spiritual idea, to wit, sovereignty over all, and the emanation or effusion of influence and light on to all. The antitype of the moon will be that Sovereign's Minister; for it is through the moon that the sun sheds his light on the world in its own absence; and even so, it is through his own Minister that the Sovereign [p. 32] makes his influence felt by subjects who never beheld the royal person. Again, the dreamer who sees himself with a ring on his finger with which he seals the mouths of men and the secrets of women, is told that the sign means the early Call to Prayer in the month of Ramadan.[1] Again, for one who sees himself pouring olive oil into an olive-tree the interpretation is that the slave-girl he has wedded is his mother, unrecognized by him. But it is impossible to exhaust the different ways by which symbols of this description may be interpreted, and I cannot set myself the task of enumerating them. I can merely say that just as certain beings of the Spirit-World Supernal are symbolized by Sun, Moon and Stars, others may be typified by different symbols. when the Point of connexion is some characteristic other than light.

[1. For this passage see S. 26, 24-7, and for the whole thought--compare pp. [54, 55]. 9]

{p. 130}

[1. Because after the idhân, just before morning, food and sexual intercourse are fasted from till the next sunset.]

For example, if among those beings of that Spirit-World there be something that is fixed and unchangeable; great and never diminishing; from which the waters of knowledge, the excellencies of revelations, issue into the heart, even as waters well out into a valley; It would be symbolized by the Mountain.[1] Further, if the beings that are the recipients of those excellencies are of diverse grades, they would be symbolized by the Valley; and if those excellencies, on reaching the hearts of men, pass from heart to heart, these hearts are also symbolized by Valleys.[2] The head of the Valley will represent the hearts of Prophet, Saint, and Doctor, followed by those who come after them. So, then, if these valleys are lower than the first one, and are watered from it, then that first one will certainly be the "Right" Valley,[3] because

[1. S. 28, 29. 46.

2. S. 13, 18.

3. S. 28, 30. See S. 19, 53, and 10, 82.]

of its signal rightness[1] and superiority. And finally will come the lowest valley which receives its water from the last and lowest level of that "Right" Valley, and is accordingly watered from "the margin of the Right Valley",[2] not [p. 33] from its deepest part and centre.

But if the spirit of a prophet is typified by a lighted Lamp, lit by means of Inspiration ("We have inspired thee with [a] Spirit from Our power"),[3] then the symbol of the source of that kindling is Fire. If some of those who derive knowledge from the prophets live by a merely traditional acceptance of what they are told, and others by a gift of insight, then the symbol for the former, who investigate nothing, is a Fire-brand or a Torch or a Meteor; while the man of spiritual experience, who has therefore something in some sort common with the prophets, is accordingly symbolized by the Warming of Fire, for a man is not warmed by hearing about fire but by being close to it.

[1. Ghazzâlî here plays on the word ayman, the root of which means dexter or felix.

2. S. 28, 30.

3. S. 42, 52.]

{p. 133}

If the first stage of prophets is their translation into the World of Holy Transcendence away from the disturbances of senses and imagination, that stage is symbolized by "the Holy Valley".[1] And if the Holy Valley may not be trodden save after the doffing of the Two Worlds (that is, this world and the world beyond) and the soul's turning of her face towards the One Real (for this world and the world beyond are co-relatives and both are accidentia of the human light-substance, and can be doffed at one time and donned at another), then the symbol of the putting-off of these Two Worlds is the doffing of his two sandals by the pilgrim to Mekka,[2] what time he changes his worldly garments for the pilgrim's robe and faces towards the holy Kaaba.

Nay, but let us now translate ourselves to the Presence Dominical once more, and speak of its symbols. If that Presence hath something whereby the several divine sciences are engraven on the tablets of hearts susceptible to them, that something will be symbolized by the Pen.[3] That Within those hearts whereon those [1. S. 20, and 79, 16.

2. S. 20, 12.

3. S. 68.]

things are engraved will be typified by the Tablet,[1] Book,[2] and Scroll.[3] [p. 34] If there be, above the pen that writes, something which constrains it to service, its type will be the Hand.[4] If the Presence which embraces Hand and Tablet, Pen and Book, is constituted according to a definite order, It will be typified by the Form or Image.[5] And if the human form has its definite order, after that likeness, then is it created "in the Image, the Form, of the Merciful One". Now there is a difference between saying, "In the image of the Merciful One," and, "In the image of Allâh." For it was the Divine Mercy that caused the image of the Divine Presence to be in that "Image." And then Allâh, out of His grace and mercy, gave to Adam a summary "image" or "form," embracing every genus and species in the whole world, inasmuch that it was as if Adam were all that was in the world, or were the summarized copy of the world. And Adam's form--this summarized "image"--was inscribed in the handwriting of Allâh, so that Adam is the Divine handwriting, which is not the characters of letters (for His Handwriting transcends both characters and letters, even as His Word transcends sound and syllables, and His Pen transcends Reed and Steel, and His Hand transcends flesh and bone). Now, but for this mercy, every son of Adam would have been powerless to know his Sovereign-Lord; for "only he who knows himself knows his Lord." This, then, being an effect of the divine mercy, it was "in the image of the Merciful One," not "in the image of Allâh," that Adam was created. So, then, the Presence of the Godhead is not the same as the Presence of The Merciful One, nor as the Presence of The Kingship, nor as the Presence of the Sovereign-Lordship; for which reason He commanded us to invoke the protection of all these Presences severally. "Say, I invoke the protection of the Lord of mankind, the King of mankind, the Deity of mankind!"[1] If this idea did not underlie the expression [p. 35] "Allâh created man in the image of the Merciful," the words would be linguistically incorrect; they should then have run, "after His image." But the words, according to Bokhari, run, "After the image of the Merciful."

But as the distinction between the Presence of the Kingship and the Presence of the Lordship call for a long expression, we must pass on, and be content with the foregoing specimen of the symbolic method. For indeed it is a shoreless sea.

But if you are conscious of a certain repulsion from this symbolism, you may comfort yourself by the text, "He sent down from heaven rain, and it flowed in the valleys, according to their capacity;"[2] for the commentaries on this text tell us that the Water here is knowledge, and the Valleys are the hearts of men.

4. The Permanent Validity of the Outward and Visible Sign: an Example

Pray do not assume from this specimen of symbolism and its method that you have any

[1. And so they are quoted on p. [7].

2. S. 13, 19.]

licence from me to ignore the outward and, visible form, or to believe that it has been annulled; as though, for example, I had asserted that Moses had not really shoes on, did not, really hear himself addressed by the words, "Put thy shoes from off thy feet." [1] God forbid!--The annulment of the outward and visible sign is the tenet of the Spiritualists (Bâtiniyya), who, looked, utterly one-sidedly, at one world, the, Unseen, and were grossly ignorant of the balance that exists between it and the Seen. This aspect they wholly failed to understand. Similarly annulment of the inward and invisible meaning in the opinion of the Materialists. (Hashawiyya). In other words, whoever abstracts and isolates the outward from the whole is a Materialist, and whoever abstracts. the inward is a Spiritualist, while he who joins the two together is catholic, perfect. For this reason the Prophet said, "The Koran has an outward and an inward, an ending and a beginning" (a Tradition which is, however, possibly, traceable to 'Alî, as its pedigree stops short at his name). I assert, on the contrary, that

{p. 138}

'Moses understood from the command "Put off thy shoes" the Doffing of the Two Worlds, and obeyed the command literally by putting off his two sandals, and spiritually by putting off the Two Worlds. Here you just have this cross-relation between the two, [p. 36] the crossing over from one to the other, from outward word to inward idea. The difference between the true and false positions may be thus illustrated. One man hears the word of the Prophet, "The angels of Allâh enter not a house wherein is a dog or a picture," and yet keeps a dog in the house, because, he says, "The outward sense is not what was meant; but the Prophet only meant, 'Turn the dog of Wrath out of the house of the Heart, because Wrath hinders the knowledge which comes from the Lights Angelical; for anger is the demon of the heart.'" While the other first carries out the command literally; and then says, "Dog is not dog because of his visible form, but because of the inner idea of dog--ferocity, ravenousness. If my house, which is the abode of my person, of my body, must be kept clear of doggishness in concrete form, how much more must the house of my heart, which is the abode of man's true and proper essence, be kept clear of doggishness in spiritual idea!" The man, in fact, who combines the two things, he is the perfect man; which is what is meant when it is said, "The perfect man is the one who does not let the light of his knowledge quench the light of his reverence." In the same way he is never seen permitting himself to ignore one single ordinance of religion, for all the perfection of his spiritual Insight. Such a thing is grievous error; an example of which is the evil which befell some mystics, who called it lawful to put by literal prescriptions of the Shariat as you roll up and put-by a carpet; insomuch that one of them perhaps went so far as to give up the ordinance of prayer, saying, forsooth, that he was always at prayer in his heart! But this is different from the error of those fools of Antinomians (Ibâhiyya) who trifle with sophisms, like the saying of one, "Allah has no need of our works"; or of another, "The heart is full of vices from which it cannot possibly be cleansed," [p. 37] and did not even desire to eradicate anger and lust, because he believes he is

{p. 139}

{p. 140}

[not] (?) commanded to eradicate them. These last, verily, are the follies of fools; but, as for the first-named error, it reminds one of the stumble of a high-bred horse, the error of a mystic whom the devil has diverted from the way and "drawn him with delusion as with cords".[1]

To return to our discussion of "the Putting-off of the Shoes." The outward word wakens one to the inward signification, the Putting-off of the Two Worlds. The outward symbol is a real thing, and its application to the inward meaning is a real truth. Every real thing has its corresponding real truth. Those who have realized this are the souls who have attained the degree of the Transparent Glass (we shall see the meaning of this presently). For the Imagination, which supplies, so to speak, the clay from which the symbol is formed, is hard and gross; it conceals the secret meanings; it is interposed between you and the unseen lights. But once let it be clarified, and it becomes like transparent glass, and no longer keeps out the light, but on the contrary becomes a light-conductor. nay, that which keeps that light from being put out.

by gusts of wind. The story of the Transparent Glass, however, is coming; meanwhile, remember that the gross lower world of the imagination became to the Prophets of God like a transparent "glass" shade and "a niche for lights"; a strainer, filtering clear the divine secrets; a stepping-stone to the World Supernal. Whereby we may know that the visible symbol is real: and behind it lies a mystery. The same holds good with the symbols of "the Mountain," "the Fire," and the rest.

5. Another Example of this Two-sided and Equal Validity of Outward and Inward

When the Prophet said, "I saw Abdul-Rahmân enter Paradise crawling," you are not to suppose that he did not see him thus with his own eyes. No, awake he saw him, as a sleeper might see him in a dream, even though the person of Abdul-Rahmân b. `Awf was at the time asleep in his house. [p. 38] The only effect of sleep in this and similar visions is to suppress the authority of the senses over the soul, which is the inward light divine; for the senses preoccupy the soul, drag it back to the -Sense-world, and turn a man's face away from the world of the Invisible and of the Realm Supernal. But, with the suppression of sense, some of the lights prophetic may become clarified and prevail, inasmuch as the senses are no longer dragging the soul back to their own world, nor occupying their whole attention. And so it sees in waking what others see in sleep. But if it has attained absolute perfection, it is not limited to apprehending the visible form merely; it passes direct from that to the 'inner idea, and it is disclosed to such an one that faith is drawing the soul of an Abdul-Rahmân to the World Above (described by the word "Paradise"), while wealth and riches are drawing it down to this present life, the World Below. If the influences which draw it to the preoccupations of this world are more stubborn than those which draw it to the other world, the soul is wholly turned away from its journey to Paradise. But if the attraction of faith is stronger, the soul is merely occasioned difficulty, or retarded, in its course, and the symbol for this in the world of sense is a crawl. It is thus that mysteries are shown forth from behind the crystal transparencies of the imagination. Nor is this limited to the Prophet's judgment about Abdul Rahmân only, though it was only him he saw at that time. He passess judgment therein on; every man whose spiritual vision is strong, whose faith is firm, but whose wealth has so much multiplied that it threatens to crowd out his faith, only failing to do so because the power of that faith more than counterbalances it. This example illustrates to you the way in, which prophets used to see concrete objects, and have immediate vision of the spiritual, ideas behind them. Most frequently the idea, is presented to their direct inward vision first, and then looks down from thence on to [p. 39] the imaginative spirit and receives the imprint of some concrete object, analogous to the idea. What is conferred by inspiration in sleeping vision or dreams needs interpretation.[1]

(ii) THE PSYCHOLOGY OR THE HUMAN SOUL: ITS FIVE FACULTIES OR SPIRITS

The gradations of human Spirits Luminous;

[1. (Note by Ghazzâlî.) The proportion borne by dreams to the other characteristics of prophethood is as one to forty-six. That borne by waking vision has a greater ratio-as one to three, I believe, for it has been revealed to us that the prophetic characteristics fall definitely into three categories, and of these three one is waking vision.]

{p. 144}

in knowing which we may know the symbolism of the Light-Verse in Koran.

The first of these is the sensory spirit. This is the recipient of the information brought in by the senses; for it is the root and origin of 'the animal spirit, and constitutes the differentia, of the animal genus. It is sound in the infant at the breast.

The second is the imaginative spirit. This .is the recorder of the information conveyed by the senses. It keeps that information filed and ready to hand, so as to present it to the intelligential spirit above it, when the information is called for. It is not found in the infant at the beginning of its evolution. This is why an infant wants to get hold of a thing when he sees it, while he forgets about it when it is out of his sight. No conflict of desire arises in his soul for something out of sight until he gets a little older, when he begins to cry for it and asks to have it, because its image is still with him, preserved in his imagination, This faculty is possessed by some, but not all animals. It is not found, for example, in the moth which perishes in the flame. [p. 40] The moth makes for the flame, because of its desire for the sunlight, and, thinking that the flame is a window opening to the sunlight, it hurries on to the flame, and injures itself. Yet, if it flies on into the dark, back it comes again, time after time. Now had it the mnemonic spirit, which gives permanence to the sensation of pain that is conveyed by the tactile sense, it would not return to the flame after being hurt once by it. On the other hand, the dog that has received one whipping runs away whenever it sees the stick again.

Third, the intelligential spirit. This apprehends ideas beyond the spheres of sense and imagination. It is the specifically human faculty. It is not found in the lower animals, nor yet in children. The objects of its apprehension are axioms of necessary and universal application, as we mentioned in the section in which the light of intelligence was given precedence over that of the eye.

Fourth, the discursive spirit. This takes the data of pure reason and combines them, arranges them as premises, and deduces from them informing knowledge. Then it takes, for example, two conclusions thus learned, combines them again, and learns a fresh conclusion; and so goes on multiplying itself ad infinitum.

Fifth, the transcendental prophetic spirit. This is the property of prophets and some saints. By it the unseen tables and statutes of the Law are revealed from the other world, together with several of the sciences of the Realms Celestial and Terrestrial, and pre-eminently theology, the science of Deity, which the intelligential and discursive spirit cannot compass. It is this that is alluded to in the text, "Thus did We inspire thee with a spirit from Our power. Thou didst not know what is the Book, nor what is Faith, [p. 41] but we made that spirit a light wherewith we guide whom We will of our vassals. And thou, verily, dost guide into a straight way." [1] And here, a word to thee, thou recluse in thy rational world of the intelligence! Why should it be impossible that beyond reason there should be a further plane, on which appear things which do not appear on the plane of the intelligence, just as it is possible for the intelligence itself to be a plane above the discriminating faculty and the senses; and for relations of wonders and marvels to be made to it that were beyond the reach of the senses and the discriminative faculty? Beware of making the ultimate perfection stop at thyself! Consider the intuitive faculty of poetry, if thou wilt have an example of everyday experience, taken from those special gifts which particularize some men. Behold how this gift, which is a sort of perceptive faculty, is the exclusive possession of some; while it is so completely denied to others that they cannot even distinguish the scansion of a typical measure from that of its several variations. Mark how extraordinary is this intuitive faculty in some others, insomuch that they produce music and melodies, and all the various grief-, delight-, slumber-, weeping-, madness-, murder-, and swoon-producing modes! Now these effects only occur strongly in one who has this original, intuitive sense. A person destitute of it hears the sounds just as much as the other, but the emotional effects are by him only very faintly experienced, and he exhibits surprise at those whom they send into raptures or swoons. And even were all the professors of music in the world to call a conference with a view of making him understand the meaning of this musical sense, they would be quite powerless to do so. Here, then, is an example taken from the gross phenomena which are easiest for you to understand. Apply this now to this peculiar prophetic sense. And strive earnestly to become one of those who experience mystically something [p. 42] of the prophetic spirit; for saints have a specially large portion thereof. If thou canst not compass this, then try, by the discipline of the syllogisms and analogies set forth or alluded to in a previous page, to be one of those 'who have knowledge of it scientifically. But if this, too, is beyond thy powers, then the least thou canst do is to become one of those who simply have faith in it ("Allâh exalts those that have faith among you, and those who acquire knowledge in their several ranks").[1] Scientific knowledge is above faith, and mystic experience is above knowledge. The province of mystic experience is feeling; of knowledge, ratiocination, and of faith, bare acceptance of the creed of one's fathers, together with an unsuspecting attitude towards the two superior classes.

You now know the five human spirits. So we proceed: they are all of them Lights, for it is through their agency that every sort of existing thing is manifested, including objects of sense and imagination. For though it is true that the lower animals also perceive these said objects, mankind possesses a different, more refined, and higher species of those two faculties they having been created in man for a different, higher, and more noble end. In the lower animals they were only created as an instrument for acquiring food, and for subjecting them to mankind. But in mankind they were created to be a net to chase a noble quarry through all the present world; to wit, the first principles of the religious sciences. For example, a man may, in perceiving with his, visual sense a certain individual, apprehend, through his intelligence, a universal and absolute idea, as we saw in our example of Abdul Rahmân the son of `Awf.

PART III.--THE APPLICATION TO THE LIGHT-VERSE AND THE VEILS TRADITION

(i) THE EXPOSITION OF THE SYMBOLISM OF THE LIGHT-VERSE

We now come to what the symbolism of this Verse actually signifies. The full exposition of the parallelism between these five classes of Spirit, and the fivefold Niche; Glass, Lamp, Tree, and Oil, [p. 43] could be indefinitely prolonged. But we must be content with shortly indicating the method of the symbolism.

1. Consider the sensory spirit. Its lights, you observe, come through several apertures, the eyes, ears, nostrils, etc. Now the aptest symbol for this, in our world of experience, is the Niche for a lamp in a wall.

2. Take next the imaginative spirit. It has three peculiarities: first, that it is of the stuff that this gross lower world is made of, for its objects have definite and limited size, and shape, and dimension, and are definitely related to the subject in respect of distance. Further, one of the properties of a gross substance whereof corporal attributes are predicated is to be opaque to the light of pure intelligence, which transcends these categories of direction, quantity, and distance. But, secondly, if that substance is clarified, refined, disciplined, and controlled, it attains to a correspondence with and a similarity to the ideas of the intelligence, and becomes transparent to light from them. Thirdly, the imagination is at first very much needed, in order that intelligential knowledge may be controlled by it, so that that knowledge be not disturbed, unsettled, and dissipated, and so get out of hand. The images supplied by the imagination hold together the knowledge supplied by the intellect. Now, in the world of everyday experience the sole object in which you will find these three peculiarities, in relation to physical lights, is Glass. For glass also is originally an opaque substance, but is clarified and refined until it becomes transparent to the light of a lamp, which indeed it transmits unaltered. Again, glass keeps the lamp from being put out by a draught or violent jerking. [p. 44] By what, then, could possibly the imagination be more aptly symbolized?

{p. 151}

{p. 152}

3. The intelligential spirit, which gives cognizance of the divine ideas. The point of the symbolism must be obvious to you. You know it already from our preceding explanation of the doctrine that the prophets are a "Light-giving lamp."

4. The ratiocinative spirit. Its peculiarity is to begin from one proposition, then to branch out into two, which two become four and so on, until by this process of logical division they become very numerous. It leads, finally, to conclusions which in their turn become germs producing like conclusions, these latter being also susceptible of continuation, each with each. The symbol which our world yields for this is a Tree. And when further we consider that the fruit of the discursive reason is material for this multiplying, establishing, and fixing of all knowledge, it will naturally not be typified by trees like quince, apple, pomegranate, nor, in brief, by any other tree whatever, except the Olive. For the quintessence of the fruit of the olive is its oil, which is the material which feeds the lamps, and has this peculiarity, as against all other oils, that it increases radiance. Again, if people give the adjective "blessed" to specially fruitful trees, surely the tree the fruitfulness whereof is absolutely infinite should be named Blessed! Finally, if the ramifications of those pure, intellectual propositions do not admit of relation to direction and to distance, then may the antitypical tree will be said to be "Neither from the East nor from the West."

5. The transcendental prophetic spirit, which is possessed by saints as well as prophets if it is absolutely luminous and clear. For the thought-spirit is divided [p. 45] into that which needs be instructed, advised, and supplied from without, if the acquisition of knowledge is to be continuous; while a portion of it is absolutely, clear, as though it were self-luminous, and had. no external source of supply. Applying these, considerations, we see how justly this clear, strong natural faculty is described by the words, "Whose Oil were well-nigh luminant, though Fire touched it not;" for there be Saints whose light shines so bright that it is "well-nigh" independent of that which Prophets supply, while there be Prophets whose light is "well-nigh" independent of that which Angels 'supply. Such is the symbolism, and aptly does it typify this class.

And inasmuch as the lights of the human spirit are graded rank on rank, then that of Sense comes first, the foundation and preparation for the Imagination (for the latter can only be conceived as superimposed after Sense); those of the Intelligence and Discursive Reason come thereafter. All which explains why the Glass is, as it were, the place for the Lamp's immanence; and the Niche, for the Glass: that is to say, the Lamp is within the Glass, and the Glass within the Niche. Finally, the existence, as we have seen, of a graded succession of Lights explains the words of the text "Light upon Light."

Epilogue: the Darkness Verse

But this symbolism holds only for the 'hearts of true believers, or of prophets and saints, but not for the hearts of misbelievers; 'for the term "light" is expressive of right-guidance alone. But as for the man who is turned from the path of guidance, he is false, he is darkness; nay, he is darker than darkness. For darkness is natural; it leads one neither one way nor the other; but the minds of misbelievers, and the whole of their perceptions, are perverse, and support each other mutually in the actual deluding of their owners. They are like a man "in some fathomless sea, overwhelmed [p. 46] by billow topped by billow topped by cloud; darkness on darkness piled!"[1] Now that fathomless sea is the World, this world of mortal dangers, of evil chances, of blinding trouble. The first "billow" is the wave of lust, whereby souls acquire the bestial attributes, [2] and are occupied with sensual pleasures, and the satisfaction of worldly ambitions, so that "they eat and luxuriate like cattle. Hell shall be their place of entertainment!"[3] Well does this wave represent darkness, therefore; since love for the creature makes the soul both blind and deaf. The second "billow" is the wave of the ferocious attributes, which impel. the soul to wrath, enmity, hatred, prejudice,

[1. S. 24, 40.

2. The following tripartite division of the soul, with its analogues, is Platonic (see Republic, bk. iv).

3. S. 12, 47.]

{p. 156}

envy, boastfulness, ostentation, pride. Well is this, too, the symbol of darkness, for wrath is the demon of man's intelligence; and well also is it the uppermost billow, for anger is mostly stronger even than lust; swelling wrath diverts the soul from lust and makes it oblivious of enjoyment; lust cannot for a moment stand up against anger at its height, Finally, "the cloud" is rank beliefs, and lying heresies, and corrupt imaginings, which become so many veils veiling the misbeliever from the true faith, from knowledge of the Real, and from illumination by the sunlight of the Koran and human intelligence. For it is the property of a cloud to veil the shining of the sunlight. Now these things, being all of them darkness, are well called "darkness on darkness piled", shutting the soul out from the knowledge of things near, [p. 47] let alone things far away; veiling the misbeliever, therefore, from the apprehension of the miraculousness of the Prophet, though he is so near to grasp, so manifest upon the least reflection. Truly it might be said of such an, one that "when a man putteth forth his hand, he can well-nigh see it not." [1] Finally, if all these Lights have, as we, saw, their source and origin in the great Primary, the One Real, then every Confessor of the Unity may well believe that "the man for whom Allâh doth not cause light, no light at all hath he." [1]

And now you must be content with thus much of the mysteries of this Verse.

(ii) THE EXPOSITION OF THE SYMBOLISM OF THE SEVENTY THOUSAND VEILS

What is the signification of the tradition, "Allâh hath Seventy Thousand Veils of Light and Darkness: were He to withdraw their curtain, then would the splendours of His Aspect surely consume everyone who apprehended Him with his sight." (Some read "seven hundred veils;" others, "seventy thousand.")

I explain it thus. Allâh is in, by, and for himself glorious. A veil is necessarily related to those from whom the glorious object is veiled. Now these among men are of three kinds, according as their veils are pure darkness; mixed darkness and light; or pure light.

The subdivisions of these three are very numerous. That much only is certain. I could no doubt make some far-fetched enumeration of these subdivisions; but I have no confidence in the results of such defining and enumerating, for none knows whether they were really intended or not. As for the fixing of the number at seven hundred, or at seventy thousand, this is a matter that only the prophetic power can compass. My own clear impression, however, is that these numbers are not mentioned in the way of definite enumeration at all, for [p. 48] numbers are not infrequently mentioned without any intention of limitation, but rather to denote some indefinitely great quantity:--God knows best! That point, then, is beyond our competence, and all I can do now is to unfold to you these three main divisions and a few of the subdivisions.

{p. 158}

1. Those veiled by Pure Darkness

The first division consists of those who are veiled by pure darkness. These are the atheists "who believe not in Allâh, nor the Last Day." [1] These are they "who love this present life more than that which is to come," [2] for they do not believe in that which is to come at all. They fall into subdivisions.

[1. S. 4, 37.

First, there are those who desire to discover a cause to account for the world, and make Nature that cause. But nature is an, attribute which inheres in material substances, and is immanent in them, and is moreover a, dark one, for it has no knowledge, nor perception, nor self-consciousness, nor consciousness, nor light perceived through the medium of physical sight.

Secondly, there are those whose preoccupation is self, and who in no wise busy themselves. about the quest for causality. Rather, they live the life of the beasts of the field. This veil is, as it were, their self-centred ego, and, their lusts of darkness; for there is no darkness, so intense as slavery to self-impulse and self-love. "Hast thou seen," saith Allâh, "the man who makes self-impulse his god?"[1] and the Prophet, "Self-impulse is the hatefulest of the gods, worshipped instead of Allâh."

This last division may farther be subdivided. There is one class which has thought that this world's Chief End is the satisfaction, of one's wants, lusts, and animal pleasures, whether connected with sex, or food, or drink, or raiment. These, therefore, are the creatures of pleasure; pleasure is their god, the goal of their ambition, and in winning her they believe that they have won felicity. Deliberately and willingly do they place themselves at the level of the beasts of the field; nay, at a viler level than the beasts. Can darkness be conceived more intense than this? Such men are, indeed, veiled by darkness unadulterated. Another class has thought that man's Chief End is conquest and domination--the taking of prisoners, and captives, and life. [49] Such is the idea of the Arabs, certain of the Kurds, and withal very numerous fools. Their veil is the dark veil of the ferocious attributes, because these dominate them, so that they deem the running down of their quarry the height of bliss. These, then, are content to occupy the level of beasts of prey, nay, one more degraded still. A third class has supposed that the Chief End is riches and prosperity, because wealth is the instrument for the satisfaction of every lust. Their concern is therefore the heaping up and multiplication of riches--the multiplication of property, real estate, personal estate, thoroughbreds, flocks, herds, fields and the rest. Such men hoard their pelf underground--you may see them toiling their lives long, embarking on perils by land, perils by sea, up-date, down-lea, piling up wealth, and yet grudging it to themselves--and how much more others! These are they whom the Prophet had in view when he said, "Poor wretch, the slave of money! Poor wretch, the slave of gold!" And, indeed, what darkness is in tenser than that which blinds mankind to the fact that gold and silver are just two metals, unwanted for their own sakes, no better than gravel unless they are made a means to various ends, and spent upon things worth spending on? A fourth class had advanced a step higher than the total folly of these last, and has supposed that the supreme felicity is found in the extension of a man's personal reputation, the spread of his own renown, the increase of his own following and his influence over others. You may see these admiring themselves in their own looking-glasses! One of them, who may be suffering hunger and penury at home, will be spending his substance on clothes, and trying to look his smartest therein, [p. 50] just in order to avoid contemptuous glances when he walks abroad!

Innumerable are the varieties of this species, and one and all are veiled from Allâh by pure darkness, and they themselves are darkness. So there is no need to mention all the individual varieties, when once attention has been called to the species. One of these varieties which we should, however, mention is the sort that confesses with their tongues the Creed "There is no god but Allâh," but are probably urged thereto by fear alone, or the desire to beg from Mohammadans, or to curry favour with them, or to get financial assistance out of them, or by a merely fanatical zeal, to support the opinions of their fathers. For if the Creed fails to impel these to good works, by no means shall it secure their elevation from the dark sphere to light. Rather are their patron-saints devils, who lead them from the light into the darkness. But he whom the Creed so touches that his evil deeds displease him and his good deeds give him pleasure, has passed from pure darkness even though he be a great sinner still.

2. Those veiled by mixed Light and Darkness

The second division consists of those who are veiled by mixed light and darkness. It consists of three main kinds: first, those whose darkness has its origin in the Senses; secondly, in the Imagination; thirdly, in false syllogisms of the Intelligence.

First, then, those veiled by the darkness of the Senses. These are persons who one and all have got beyond that self-absorption which was the characteristic of all the first division, as they deify something outside the self, and have some yearning for the knowledge of the Deity. The first grade of these consists of the idol-worshippers, the last grade consists of the dualists; between which extremes come other grades.

The first, the idolaters, are aware, in general, that they have a deity whom they must prefer to their dark selves, and believe [p. 51] that their deity is mightier than everything else, and more to be prized than every prize.

{p. 164}

But the darkness of sense veils from them the knowledge that they must transcend the world of sense in this quest; so that they make for themselves from the more precious minerals, gold, silver, gems, etc., figures splendidly fashioned, and then take those images unto themselves as gods. Such men are veiled by the light of Majesty and Beauty from the attributes of Allah and his light: they have affixed these attributes to sense-perceived bodies; which sense has blocked out the light of Allah; for the senses are darkness in relation to the World Spiritual, as we have already shown.

The second class, composed of the remotest Turkish tribes, who have no organized religious community and no definite religious code, believe that they have a deity, and that that deity is some particularly beautiful object; so that when they see a human being of exceptional beauty, or similarly a tree, or a horse, etc., they worship it and call it their god. These are veiled by the light of Beauty mixed with the darkness of Sense. They have penetrated further than the idolaters into the Realm of Light in the discovery of Light, for they are worshippers of Beauty in the absolute, not in the individual; and they do not limit it specially to one individual to the exclusion of others; and then, again, the Beauty they worship is of Nature's hand, and not of their own.

The third class say, Our deity must be in His essence Light, glorious in His express image, majestic in Himself, terrible in His presence, intolerant of approach; and yet He must be likewise perceptible. For the imperceptible is meaningless in the opinion of these. Then because they find Fire thus characterized, they worship it and take it unto themselves as lord. Such are veiled by the light of Dominion and of Glory, [p. 52] which are, indeed, two of the Lights of Allah.

The fourth class think that, since we have control over fire, kindling or quenching it at will, it cannot serve as divinity. Only that which possessing the attribute of Dominion and Glory and has us under its absolute sway, and is withal very higher and lifted up-only this avails for divinity. Astrology is the science that is celebrated among this folk, the attribution to each star of its special influence: so that some worship Cynosura and others Jupiter, and others some other heavenly body, according to the many influences with which they believe the several stars are endued. These, then, are veiled by Light, the Light of the Sublime, the Luminous, the Potent; which are also three of the Lights of Allâh.

The fifth class support the fourth in their fundamental idea, but they say that it does not befit their Lord to be describable as small or great among light-giving substances, but He must be the greatest of them; and so they worship the Sun, which, they say, is the Greatest of All. Such are veiled by the Light of Greatness, in addition to the former lights; but are still blent with the darkness of the Senses.

The sixth class advance higher still and say, The sun has no monopoly of light; bodies other than the sun have each one its light. So, as the deity must have no partner in lightfulness, they worship Absolute Light, which embraces all lights, and think that It is the Lord of the Universe, and that all good things are attributable to it. Then, since they perceive the existence of evils in the world, and will by no means allow them to be attributed to their deity, He being wholly void of evil, they conceive of a struggle between Him and the Darkness, [53] and these two are called by them, as I suppose, Yazdân and Ahriman; which is the sect of the Dualists.

This must suffice for the exemplification of this division, the classes whereof are more numerous than those we have mentioned.

Second, those veiled by some light, mixed with the darkness of the Imagination. These have got beyond the senses, for they assert the existence of something behind the objects of sense, but are unable to get beyond the imagination, and so have worshipped a Being who actually sits on a throne. The meanest grade of these is called the Corporealists; then all the various Karrâmites, into whose writings and opinions we cannot go here, for to multiply words thereon were bootless. But the highest in degree are those who denied to Allah corporality and all its accidentia, except one--direction, and that direction upwards; for (say they) that which is not referable to any direction, and cannot be characterized as either within or without the world, does not exist at. all, since it cannot be imagined by the imagination.[1] They failed to perceive that the very first degree of the intelligibilia takes us clean beyond all reference whatsoever to direction and dimension.

Third, those who are veiled by Light divine, mixed with the darkness of false syllogisms of the Intelligence, and who worship a deity, that "Heareth, Seeth, and hath Knowledge, Power, Will, Life", and transcends all directions, including direction upwards; but whose conception of these attributes is relative to their own; so that some of them may even have declared outright that His "speech" is with sounds and letters like ours; while others advanced a step higher, it may be, and said, "Nay, but it is like our thought-speech, both soundless and letterless." Thus, when they were challenged to show that "hearing, sight, life", etc., are real in Allâh they fell back on what was essentially anthropomorphism, though they repudiated it[1] formally; for they utterly failed to apprehend what [p. 54] the attribution of[1] these ideas to Allah really signifies. Thus they, say, in regard to His will, that it is contingent, like ours; that it is a demanding and a purposing, like ours. All of which opinions are well-known, and we need not go into further details with regard to them: These, then, are veiled by several of the divine Lights, mixed with the darkness of false syllogisms of the intelligence., All such are various classes of the second division, which consists of those veiled by mixed. light and darkness.

{p. 169}

3. Those veiled by Pure Light

The third division are those veiled with, pure Light, and they also fall into several classes. I cannot enumerate all, but only refer to three.

The first of these have searched out and understood the true meaning of the divine attributes, and have grasped that when thee divine attributes are named Speech, Will

[1. It seems inevitable to read ###. The feminine Pronoun could only refer to ### which makes nonsense. To refer it to a supplied masdar does not seem to be in our author's manner.]

{p. 170}

Power, Knowledge, and the rest, it is not according to our human mode of nomenclature. And this has led them to avoid denoting Him, by these attributes altogether, and to denote Him simply by a reference to His creation, as 'Moses did in his answer to Pharaoh, when the latter asked, "And what, pray, is the Lord of .the Universe?" and he replied, "'The Lord, Whose Holiness transcends even the ideas of these attributes,' He, the Mover and Orderer of the Heavens."[1]

The second mount higher than these, inasmuch as they perceived that the Heavens are a plurality, and that the mover of every several Heaven is another being, called an Angel, and that these angels form a plurality, and that their relation to the other Lights Divine is as the relation of the stars to[2] all other visible lights.[3] Then they perceived that these Heavens are enveloped by another Sphere, by whose motion all the rest revolve once in twenty-four hours, and that finally The LORD is He Who communicates motion to this outermost Sphere,

[1. See S. 26, 23 ff..

2. Reading ### for ###.

3. Cf. S. 41, 11.]

which encloses all the rest, on the ground (say they) that plurality must be denied of Him.

The third mount higher than these also, [p. 55], and say that this direct communication of motion to the celestial bodies must be an act of service to the Lord of the Universe, an act of worship and obedience to His command, and rendered by one of His creatures, an Angel, who stands to the pure Light Divine in the relation of the Moon to the other visible lights; and they asserted that the LORD is the Obeyed-One of this Angelic Movent, and that the Almighty must be considered the universal Movent indirectly and by way of command only (amr),[1] but not directly by way of act. The explication of which "command" and what it really is contains much that is obscure, and too difficult for most minds, besides being beyond the scope of this book.

These, then, are grades all of which are veiled by Lights without admixture of Darkness.

4. The Goal Of the Quest

But those who ATTAIN make a fourth

[1. See S. 7, 53.]

grade, to Whom, in turn, it has been made clear that this Obeyed-One, if identified with, Allâh, would have been given attributes negative of His pure Unity and perfection, on account of a mystery which it is not in the scope of this book to reveal; and that the relation of this Obeyed-One to THE REAL EXISTENCE is as the relaxation of the Sun to Essential Light, or of the live coal to the Elemental Fire, and so "turned their faces"[1] from him who moves the heavens and him who issued the command (amara) for their moving, and Attained unto an Existent who transcends ALL that is comprehensible by human Sight or human Insight; for they found IT transcendent of and separate from every characterization that in the foregoing we have made.

And these last are also divided. For one class the whole content of the perceptible is.

consumed away--consumed, obliterated, and annihilated; yet the soul itself remains contemplating the absolute Beauty and Holiness and contemplating herself in her beauty, which is conferred on her by this Attainment unto the

[1. See M. pp. [30, 31].]

Presence Divine [p. 56] In them, then, the seen things, but not the seeing, soul, are obliterated.

And they are passed by others, among whom are the Few of the Few; whom "the splendours of the Countenance sublime consume", [1] and the majesty of the Divine Glory obliterate; so that they are themselves blotted out, annihilated. For self-contemplation there is no more found a place, because with the self they have no longer anything to do. Nothing remaineth any more save the One, the Real; and the import of His word, "All perisheth save His Countenance," [2] becomes the experience of the soul. To this we have made reference in the first chapter, where we set forth in what sense they named this state "Identity," and how they conceived the same.

Such is the ultimate degree of those who Attain. Some of these souls had not, in their upward Progress and Ascent, to climb step by step the stages we have described; neither did their ascension cost them any length of time; but with their first flight they attained to the knowledge of the Holiness and the confession that His sovereignty transcends everything that it must be confessed to transcend. They were overcome at the very first by the knowledge which overcame the rest at the very last. The onset of God's epiphany came upon them with one rush, so that all that is apprehensible by the sight of Sense or by the insight of Intelligence was by "the splendours of His Countenance utterly consumed". It may be that that first was the way of Abraham, the Friend of Allâh, while the latter was the way of Mohammed, the Beloved of Allâh. Allâh alone knoweth the mysteries of their Progress and of their Stations on the Way of Light.

[1. See the Tradition on p. [2].]

2. S. 28, 88.]

Such is our account of the classes of the veiled by the Veils; and it were not strange, if, after all these Stations were fully classified and the veils of the Pilgrims Mystical were fully studied, the number of classes were found to amount to Seventy Thousand. Yet, if you look carefully, you shall find that of them all not one falls outside the divisions which we have set forth. For, as we have shown, they must be veiled by their own human attributes

or by the senses, imagination, discursive intelligence; or by pure light.

This is what has occurred to me by way of answer [57] to your interrogations, though, these came to me at a time when my thought was divided, and my mind preoccupied, and my attention given to other matters than this. May not my suggestion be, then, that you ask forgiveness for me for anything wherein my pen. has erred, or my foot has slipped? For 'tis a, hazardous thing to plunge into the fathomless. sea of the divine mysteries; and hard, hard it is to essay the discovery of the Lights Supernal that are beyond the Veil.

Ibn al-ʿArabī's Fuṣūṣ al-Ḥikam

An Annotated Translation of "The Bezels

Ibn al-‘Arabī’s Fuṣūṣ al-Ḥikam

Ibn al-‘Arabī’s Fuṣūṣ al-Ḥikam is a translation of one of the most important works written on Islamic Mysticism.

Muhyī al-Dīn Ibn al-‘Arabī (1165–1240) is deemed the greatest mystic of Islam and his mystical philosophy has attracted the attention of both Muslims and non-Muslims from his time to the present day. Believing that the world is the self-manifestation of God, he claimed that all religions are equal and that the perfect human being is he who knows all the religious phenomena in the world. Fuṣūṣ al-Ḥikam examines the singular characteristics of twenty-seven prophets of Islam and constitutes the best summary of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s thought. The translation of these twenty-seven chapters is preceded by an introduction that explains the main ideas of Ibn al-‘Arabī and is accompanied by explanatory notes to the text.

Providing an easily accessible translation of one of the greatest mystics of Islam, Ibn al-‘Arabī’s Fuṣūṣ al-Ḥikam is essential reading for students, scholars and researchers of Islamic Philosophy, Mysticism and Islamic Mysticism in particular.

Binyamin Abrahamov is Emeritus Professor, Department of Arabic, at Bar Ilan University. He has published five books, including Divine Love in Islamic Mysticism (Routledge, 2003) and his research interests focus on Islamic Theology, Philosophy, Mysticism and Qur’anic exegesis.

Routledge Sufi Series

General Editor: Ian Richard Netton

Professor of Islamic Studies, University of Exeter

The Routledge Sufi Series provides short introductions to a variety of facets of the subject, which are accessible to both the general reader and the student and scholar in the field. Each book will be either a synthesis of existing knowledge or a distinct contribution to, and extension of, knowledge of the particular topic. The two major underlying principles of the Series are sound scholarship and readability.

I am grateful to three anonymous readers for their comments on my translation and notes. Thanks are also due to David Brauner, who became a student of Ibn al-‘Arabī, for correcting my English. My students in the course of Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam, at Bar Ilan University, deserve my gratitude for their insights of the Greatest Master.

Introduction

Our author, Muḥyī al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī ibn al-‘Arabī, was born in 560/1165 in Murcia in al-Andalus to a family of high social position. At the age of thirty-seven he left al-Andalus and travelled to the eastern lands of Islam, staying for various lengths of time in Mecca, Egypt, Syria and Rūm (Turkey). Finally he settled in Damascus (620/1223), where he died in 638/1240. During these years he wrote hundreds of works, met many Sufis, whom he mentioned by name, and taught his mystical and philosophical ideas. Claude Addas gathered and analyzed many details of his biography, available in his writings in a very informative book Quest for the Red Sulphur: The Life of Ibn ‘Arabī.¹

My interest in Ibn al-‘Arabī’s writings began several years ago after coming across Chittick’s book The Sufi Path of Knowledge.² As a student of Islam in general and Islamic theology and Qur’ānic exegesis in particular, Ibn al-‘Arabī’s ideas seemed to me extraordinary even in terms of extreme Sufism. From the first reading of his writings, he appeared to me as an original thinker³ whose daring concepts exceed the boundaries of Islam.⁴ Undoubtedly, his mixing of mysticism, theology, philosophy, hermetic sciences, and law⁵ in his voluminous⁶ writings is unprecedented. Furthermore, he used a complex style of writings, which contains symbols,⁷ allusions and rhetorical forms, with the presumption that he had an expert audience who could understand him.⁸ Add to these appealing factors his influence on later generations,⁹ even into the modern era,¹⁰ in the spheres of mysticism and philosophy, and you can understand why scholars and laypeople alike are eager to learn his thought.

The desire to know Ibn al-ʿArabī's thought involves overcoming several difficulties. First, the presentation of his ideas in many works forces the reader to examine thousands of pages. Second, as noted, the amalgamation of different spheres of Islamic culture compels the researcher to be an expert in these fields in order to detect influences and to assess the author's originality. Third, Ibn al-ʿArabī's style of writing is very complex and often terse and unclear. He also uses poetry as a means of conveying his thoughts.

To overcome the first obstacle, one can begin his study of Ibn al-ʿArabī by examining his Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam (The Bezels of Wisdom), because this treatise is relatively short (179 pages in Affifi's edition) and contains the basic principles of his thought. It is worth noting that the Muslims' reactions to Ibn al-ʿArabī's teachings were derived from reading this work, because it was so accessible.¹¹ The two other impediments can be confronted by using the commentaries written on this work¹² and the available translations.¹³ Naturally, the translator's knowledge of Islamic theology, philosophy, mysticism and the Qurʾān plays an important role in understanding the author's approaches.

After considering these problems and the ways to solve them, taking into consideration the development in the research on Ibn al-ʿArabī that has been carried out over the past thirty years, and examining the present translations, I reached the conclusion that a new translation of the Fuṣūṣ is required to enhance the study of the Greatest Master (al-shaykh al-akbar). It is not my intention to criticize my predecessors to justify my own initiative in translating the Fuṣūṣ. Indeed, I owe much of my understanding of Ibn al-ʿArabī's texts to previous translations. However, every translator finds his way to elucidating the text, to identifying its ideas and their sources, to recognizing Qurʾānic paraphrases, and to avoiding the errors of language which lead to incorrect translation. A literal translation of a sentence into English seems superfluous, if the reader is unable to follow the idea conveyed by the sentence in the light of its context. Hence, I tried to translate the text in a simple and lucid manner, so that the reader may understand the purport in its context. This translation is destined not only for those who do not know Arabic, but also for those proficient in Arabic who might be perplexed in trying to understand this complicated text, in which even the meaning of technical terms changes depending on the context. Hence, I added transcription of the Arabic terms and tried to explain these terms, for two reasons: Ibn al-ʿArabī was prudent in choosing his terms, and frequently no equivalent terms exist in English matching the Arabic terms.¹⁴

The Fuṣūṣ consists of twenty-seven chapters, each treating a different prophet and his distinctive essence.¹⁵ In the short introduction to the book, the author relates that he saw in a vision the Prophet giving him a book entitled Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam and commanding him to deliver it to the people. Elsewhere, Ibn al-ʿArabī testifies to the divine source of his writings.¹⁶ One might get the impression that our author tries to compare himself to Muḥammad, who received the whole Qurʾān from the angel Jibrīl.

The book is replete with repetitions of the author's ideas and terms. However, sometimes the same concept is discussed from different perspectives in such a way that minimizes the repetitiveness.¹⁷ Furthermore, as Austin observes, "The overall impression on the reader is lack of proper organization and continuity."¹⁸ Notwithstanding Ibn al-ʿArabī's statement of the book's source, it seems that its chapters consist of lectures delivered before an audience. The repetition of sentences and phrases, and mainly the reiteration of causal phrases, such as "because of" (li-anna), may support this supposition. Another possibility explaining the structure of the Fuṣūṣ is Chittick's characterization of Ibn al-ʿArabī's way of writing: "The writings of Ibn ʿArabī tend to be like sudden inspirations flowing from his pen with such force and velocity that they destroy horizontal and logical continuity. Qūnawī on the contrary is the model of logical consistency and point-by-point reasoning."¹⁹ However, this description of Ibn al-ʿArabī's style does not characterize all the passages in the Fuṣūṣ, for example the discussion of the universals in ch. 1.

The structure of the chapter headings²⁰ is one and the same. The first word faṣṣ (pl. fuṣūṣ) denotes the bezel or setting in which the gemstone is set.²¹ Thus, the title of the book, Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam, means the bezels of wisdom which exist in the essence (kalima)²² of each prophet. In his essence, each prophet has a predisposition (the bezel) which enables him to receive a specific wisdom. According to this interpretation, the bezel is the setting of the gemstone. However, at the beginning of chapter 1, the bezel is the gemstone itself and the setting is the universe. The perfect human being is placed in the universe to complete God's self-manifestation, because without him the mirror, that is, the cosmos, is not smooth and so things are not clearly seen in it.

Interpretations of Qur'ānic verses occupy a wide range of the work. In his interpretations, the author uses, apart from allusions and symbols, several other devices to support his ideas. He employs the plain meaning of the text,²³ points to the first meanings of words,²⁴ plays with the etymology of words,²⁵ changes words²⁶ and brings together verses from different sūras of the Qur'ān to complete his ideas.²⁷ No doubt, Ibn al-ʿArabī assumes that, although the sacred Text consists of separate sūras, the whole Qur'ān is one entity, each part supporting another. In this manner, the author can take a verse from one sūra and incorporate it in another to create one meaning.

Obviously, in his interpretations of the Qur'ān, Ibn al-ʿArabī implements the three principles of interpretation enjoined by the Sufis:

- 1 The Qur'ān contains many layers of meanings.²⁸
- 2 The human being is capable of discovering these layers.
- 3 The interpretation of the Qur'ān is an endless task.

Furthermore, the philosophic notion Ibn al-ʿArabī adopts that the Qur'ān was destined to the common people helps him articulate his complicated interpretation.²⁹

Consequently, Ibn al-ʿArabī's interpretations of the Qur'ānic text often deviate from the ordinary orthodox interpretations. One of the conspicuous examples is chapter 3 on Noah (Nūḥ). Also, the cases of Moses (Mūsā) and al-Khiḍr and that of Moses and Pharaoh (Fir'awn) (ch. 25) are interpreted in the light of Ibn al-ʿArabī's conceptions. Likewise, he freely interprets traditions and makes these fit his ideas.³⁰

The present work is an annotated translation of the Fuṣūṣ. I have tried to translate the text in the manner called in the field of Qur'ānic translations tarjamat al-ma'ānī or tarjama tafsīriyya, which can be rendered “translation of the meanings” and “interpretative translation,” respectively. This is not a literal translation, but rather a translation which conveys the meanings of the text.³¹ Hence, I have interlaced the text with sentences and phrases in round parentheses which fill missing parts in the original or explain opaque expressions. In so doing, I follow the method of Izutsu’s translation of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s texts.³² Furthermore, short footnotes with references to appropriate bibliographical entries, which are intended to widen the reader’s knowledge, explain ideas and terms appearing in the text.

In trying to understand obscure passages, I used mainly the commentaries of al-Kāshānī (d. 730/1330), al-Qayṣarī (751/1350), Muṣṭafā ibn Sulaymān Bālī Zādeh (d. 1069/1658) and Affifi, the editor of the text. Other translations were infrequently consulted when the translator was not confident in his understanding and wished to see other suggestions.³³ In treating long sentences, I tended to divide them into shorter ones in order to make the understanding easier.

Believing that the researcher’s role in the humanities is not only to present a text and to analyze its contents, but also to criticize the author whenever he contradicts himself or is unfaithful to his own convictions, I did not hesitate to comment on Ibn al-‘Arabī’s inconsistencies.

Some technical notes are needed. In round parentheses appear the following items: references to Qur’ānic verses, numbers of pages in Affifi’s edition of the text, necessary additions to the text, and words and terms in transcription. Intentionally, I did not use square brackets or other kinds of parentheses to make the reading easier, because the text suffers no lacuna. Also, all blessings for God and the prophets were omitted.³⁴

As a thinker who tried to explain existence by using previous as well as his own notions, Ibn al-‘Arabī can be regarded as a philosopher. However, employing

³² Sells, “Garden,” pp. 287f, n. 1. Sells represents an opposite view and tries to translate the text as is without interpolations. He states in an exaggerated manner, to my mind, the following: “No particular expression or manifestation of the central principles is self-sufficient or transparent. Each new passage reveals something and veils something. There is always an obscurity (the emphasis is mine), an undefined term, a new paradox.” He reaches the conclusion that “Finally, it is impossible to separate what is being said and how it is said and thus impossible to paraphrase faithfully the text...”

³⁴ The blessings for God, such as “may He be exalted,” are not, in Sells’s view, primarily expressions of piety, as usually understood, but rather “they evoke the entire apophatic dialectic, and might be translated as follows: ‘May he (or it) be praised through the attribute being attributed to him here, but also exalted beyond this attribute.’” “Polished Mirror,” p. 137. However, since the apophatic dialectic is often explicitly expressed by Ibn al-‘Arabī in the Fuṣūṣ, the rendering of these blessings seems to me superfluous.

the mystical ideas of his Sufi predecessors³⁵ and blending these with philosophical teachings turns his thought into mystical philosophy, as Affifi rightly states in his introduction to the edition of the Fuṣūṣ.³⁶ Naturally, I do not ignore the Sufi practice that Ibn al-‘Arabī extensively deals with in his writings.³⁷ However, when taking into consideration the ultimate goal of the Sufi, that is, coming close to God, one should note that Ibn al-‘Arabī’s Sufi practice is tightly connected to his mystical philosophy. Even in this volume in which Ibn al-‘Arabī mainly treats his mystical philosophy, some examples of mystical practice appear, such as the invocation to God at the end of chapter 15 (Jesus - ‘Īsā).

Two basic ideas lie at the core of our author’s thought. The first is the unity or oneness of existence or being (waḥdat al-wujūd), an idea that had not appeared in its complete form in Islam before,³⁸ and the second is the theory of aspects, which explains or makes the first idea conceivable.³⁹ The first term never appeared in his writings and was coined by his commentators, while the second idea constitutes a device I used to elucidate his notions. The author himself does not speak of such a theory, although he uses many times the formula “from this perspective.” This formula goes back to earlier Sufis.⁴⁰

In Ibn al-‘Arabī’s view, the true existence is one and it is God’s Existence. Thus, God’s Essence, attributes and names,⁴¹ and the cosmos including all its phenomena are one existence.⁴² However, the Greatest Master distinguishes between God’s Essence (dhāt)⁴³ which cannot be known and His names which can be known. In explaining the relationships between God as Essence and His names, Ibn al-‘Arabī mentions a Kalām formula according to which the names are neither Himself nor other than Himself.⁴⁴ However, he prefers the view of the Mutakallim Abū al-Hudhayl, who asserts that God knows by virtue of His attribute of knowledge which is identical to His Essence. Anyhow, Ibn al-‘Arabī considers the attributes to be relationships and attributions or states, and as such

³⁸ Affifi, I, p. 25.

³⁹ Izutsu (p. 152) writes that Ibn al-‘Arabī’s concept of God’s self-manifestation (tajallin) “is the very basis of his world view.” However, from a logical point of view, the oneness of existence is the foundation of his theory and God’s self-manifestation explains the relationships between God and the cosmos in a unified existence. The fact that our author dedicates much space to God’s self-manifestation and its ramifications does not cancel the place of the theory’s cornerstone.

⁴⁰ Ibn al-‘Arabī and the Sufis, pp. 172f.

⁴² Fuṣūṣ, ch. 23.

⁴³ Although Ibn al-‘Arabī states that God’s absolute existence cannot be known, he ascribes to this entity the power of existentiating everything. Also, the assertion that no multiplicity exists in it means that humans have some knowledge of the Essence.

⁴⁴ Fuṣūṣ, ch. 21.

they are not separate entities existing in God's Essence.⁴⁵ Thus, God's Unity is absolute from the standpoint of His Essence but many from the perspective of the cosmos.⁴⁶

God's names are different from each other and also arranged in hierarchical order; for example, knowledge is higher than will,⁴⁷ but regarding God's Essence they are equal to each other.⁴⁸ Mercy encompasses everything, and as such it brings all things into existence.⁴⁹ As noted, these names represent relationships between God and His self-manifestation.⁵⁰ The cosmos is under the control of God's names.⁵¹ From this perspective each name is called rabb (lord) and is responsible for certain acts and for specific people.⁵² Since the phenomena in the cosmos are infinite, God's names are infinite, but they can be reduced to some basic names.⁵³ For example, the name Merciful functions as the Creator.⁵⁴

A distinction exists between the term allāh (God) and the term rabb (lord). Whereas the Lord is the Real who is manifested in a particular name, which is dedicated to a specific person or an event, Allāh denotes all the names which always change.⁵⁵

The cosmos reflects God's names, or God's self-manifestation through His names. Not only does the cosmos as a whole express God's names, but also the perfect human being, Adam, or other extraordinary figures such as the Prophet and the saints. They contain in their essences all the ingredients of the cosmos; that is, God's names.⁵⁶ When Ibn al-ʿArabī speaks of Muḥammad, he does not mean the historical prophet, but the spirit of Muḥammad (al-ḥaqīqa al-muḥammadiyya), which preceded all existents. Hence, Muḥammadans, in Ibn al-ʿArabī's view, are not necessarily Muslims, but rather those who comprise in themselves all the elements of God's self-manifestation – those who know, for example, that all religions are expressions of His self-manifestation.⁵⁷

Sometimes, our author goes further when claiming that even every atom in the cosmos contains all the forms of the cosmos.⁵⁸ That is because God's self-manifestation is expressed not only through the external form of everything, but through the permeation of God's Essence, as exists in His names, into everything. Ibn al-ʿArabī uses examples taken from philosophy or nature to illustrate this phenomenon. Thus, just as Primordial Matter (hayūlā) permeates everything and constitutes the common denominator of everything, so does God's Essence.⁵⁹ Elsewhere, water appears as a symbol of God's Essence penetrating everything.⁶⁰ In like manner, color permeates the colored thing.⁶¹ Also the number one, which is a symbol of God, is found in all numbers, because each number is the sum of ones. Thus God in the cosmos is like the number one in each number. This phenomenon explains the idea that a thing may be one and many at the same time.⁶² Also the cosmos's phenomena are symbolized as shadows produced by the light God's names cast on the fixed entities.⁶³ By this metaphor, the author states that although the phenomena seem to be concrete, they depend for their existence on God's names, which means their existence is unreal.

One of the results of the notion of God's self-manifestation is the notion that the cause is also the effect. God's Essence is the cause of all phenomena, which is the effect. However, since all phenomena constitute God's self-manifestation of His Essence, His Essence is both cause and effect.⁶⁴

In order to describe the process of the cosmos's appearance or God's self-manifestation often associated with the word creation (khalq), though this is not the creation meant by Muslim theologians, Ibn al-ʿArabī uses mythic language. First, the motivation of God's self-manifestation is His names' desire to see themselves in another entity; that is, the cosmos. Or, in other words, God, the hidden treasure, desired to be known.⁶⁵ The names are also depicted as forces wishing to burst out of their being under the pressure of an inability to act.⁶⁶ Then God, as the Merciful,⁶⁷ breathed into His names, thus creating the fixed entities, and God's second breath caused these entities to become concrete things.⁶⁸ This process is occurring endlessly.⁶⁹

In Ibn al-ʿArabī's view, not only the cosmos as a whole serves as a mirror of Him, but also the Perfect Human Being, Adam, contains in himself all the forms of God's names. Accordingly, Ibn al-ʿArabī regards Adam as God's vicegerent.⁷⁰

⁵⁹ Ibid., ch. 12.

⁶⁰ Ibid., ch. 19.

⁶¹ Ibid., ch. 5. Ibn al-ʿArabī also uses God's name al-laṭīf (the Subtle) to signify that God permeates everything as an immaterial substance. Ibid., ch. 23; Izutsu, 141. In his Sharḥ asmāʾ allāh al-ḥusnā (p. 253), Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī points out that al-laṭīf means the imperceptible. Whereas al-laṭīf means God's permeation of everything in the material world, the name al-khabīr (the Knowing) means His pervading the consciousness of every human being. Actually, every human being reflects God, even in his outward form,⁷¹ hence to know oneself (or one's soul) means to know God.⁷² However, the most Perfect Human Being is Muḥammad, whose spirit preceded Adam's existence.⁷³ As noted, by Muḥammad, Ibn al-ʿArabī does not mean the historical Muḥammad, but rather the reality or the essence of the Prophet; that is, his spiritual entity which has been embodied in prophets and saints.⁷⁴ It is worth noting that just as the human being serves as God's mirror, so God is the human being's mirror through which he sees his own soul.⁷⁵ God is reflected in the cosmos, and the cosmos is reflected in God.⁷⁶ Likewise, our author says that God is known only through the human being, and the human being through God.⁷⁷ Ibn al-ʿArabī inevitably concludes that the human being grants existence to God.⁷⁸ The mutual relationship between God and man is also exemplified through the notion that just as God commands humans to act in specific ways, so the human being commands God to forgive him.⁷⁹

Furthermore, since the human being reflects God's names, and since God's names are arranged in a hierarchic manner, so that God as a knower is more general than God who wills, also the human being has different levels, at the highest of which stands the gnostic (ʿārif) and at the lowest the ignorant (jāhil).⁸⁰

The process of God's self-manifestation or creation is perpetual; God never stops destroying and creating the cosmos at the same time. Only the heart of the human being can perceive such endless changes, because, contrary to the intellect (ʿaql), which limits, the heart (qalb), as its name testifies, is able to perceive all changes in the cosmos.⁸¹

As he so often does, Ibn al-ʿArabī advances another explanation of the phenomenon of creation, this time from a theological perspective. Basing himself on Qurʾān 16:40, "When We will a thing (to be), We only say to it 'be' and it comes into being," he points out three divine elements: 1. God's Essence (the word "We") from the perspective of His self-manifestation; 2. God's will; and 3. God's command ("be"). Facing these three divine elements stand three parallel elements of the fixed entities. These are: 1. the thingness of the fixed entities; that is, their potential being as things; 2. their hearing; and 3. their obedience to God's command "be." In Ibn al-ʿArabī's view, the fixed entities produce themselves because they obey God's command. In other words, the potentiality of becoming existents is brought into actuality by the divine command.⁸²

The tripartite principle – here mentioned in the context of the coming into being of the fixed entities – governs Ibn al-ʿArabī's thought. Just as this principle shows us the process of creation, it produces true ideas through the practice of syllogism, also composed of three parts, two premises and a conclusion.⁸³ Moreover, chapter 27 about Muḥammad is built on the basis of a tradition which is composed of three parts.

The idea of the fixed entities (aʿyān thābita) plays an important role in Ibn al-ʿArabī's cosmogony. As noted, these entities, reminiscent of Plato's ideas, are the concrete things in their hidden forms before their appearance in the cosmos.⁸⁴ Furthermore, these also determine the structure of everything, its essence and its acts. Actually, all God's acts, including His turning to the human being, are determined by the human fixed entity. God's knowledge follows the content of the fixed entities, and His will follows this content, which was previously conceived by God. Consequently, all the human being's acts and the time of their occurrences are decreed in the fixed entities. Strangely enough, the human being's will, which appears in his fixed entities, establishes the form of God's self-manifestation to him.⁸⁵ Thus, God is compelled to act in keeping with His own thought expressed in the fixed entities.

This scheme of processes absolutely excludes the possibility of human free will, which, to our surprise, our author holds true. How can one explain free will in a world in which all the phenomena are preordained in the fixed entities and even God is coerced to act in accordance with what is set firmly in them? One can answer this question by pointing to the fact that from the human perspective free will exists; one feels that following one's will, one can freely act. However, from the cosmic standpoint, one is compelled to act as is decreed in one's fixed entity. In other words, in the terrestrial plan, every human being possesses free will, or at least feels he has free will, while in the divine domain all was already determined, including one's will. If all the phenomena, including free will, are the expression of God's self-manifestation, there is no meaning to the responsibility for one's acts.

Another result of the idea of the unity of existence, or the idea that God is the sole true existent, is the notion that what we call "the concrete cosmos" is nothing but imagination. Speaking of the world or dreaming it means imagination within imagination.⁸⁶ Imagination as a faculty of the soul is sometimes stronger than the intellect, even though each faculty produces different approaches regarding God.⁸⁷ Through the intellect one may reach the conclusion that God is transcendent, while through his imagination he is aware of God's immanence. Gaining the knowledge that God is both transcendent and immanent means attaining the truth.⁸⁸ This leads the human being to see the One in the Many and the Many in the One, or alternatively to see the Many as One and the One as Many. Thus, one is led to perplexity (ḥayra), because one does not know whether God is One or Many.⁸⁹ However, this state characterizes the earliest stage of spiritual development; the gnostic, the one who experiences God's self-manifestation, does not suffer perplexity.⁹⁰ Even the prophet Noah was mistaken when he spoke to his people of only God's transcendence.⁹¹

The human being's knowledge of God is divided by Ibn al-ʿArabī into two parts: a. one's knowledge of God from the perspective of one's essence; and b. one's knowledge of God from the perspective of God who is manifested in one's essence.⁹² In order to know the true state of the world and God's attitude toward it, one must relinquish his intellect and be like an animal.⁹³ Also, using rational arguments does not lead the human being to true knowledge.⁹⁴

Still another outcome of the perception of the oneness of existence is the notion, from the perspective of metaphysics, that all religions are equal, because they are God's self-manifestation. The common denominator of all religions is the worship of God. God is worshiped in every form. The Greatest Master speaks of the god of belief (ilāh fīl-i'tiqād) which is peculiar to each people or group, because of their predisposition and circumstances. However, the human being should know that beyond the god of his belief, there is God, who is the source of all religions. For example, in prayer the Muslim should turn his face toward Mecca; however, he should know that God is everywhere, which actually means the possibility of other ways of worship.⁹⁵

One of the most important themes in the Fuṣūṣ is God's gifts which He gives either from His essence or from His names. God's gift from His essence is His self-manifestation to the human being. God's gifts stemming from His names are all the other benefits humanity receives, such as sustenance. Ibn al-ʿArabī also discusses the states of the human beings who request divine gifts and those who do not and the question of which of the two groups is preferable.⁹⁶

In the context of revelation, Ibn al-ʿArabī treats prophethood, which derives from God's Mercy.⁹⁷ He distinguishes between general prophethood

(nubuwwa ʿamma) and legislative prophethood (nubuwwat tashrīʿ). The first kind of prophethood, also called walāya (sainthood, literally: proximity to God or friendship toward God), denotes the essential quality of one who is close to God and receives from Him revelations of any kind. Prophets, messengers and saints (walī, pl. awliyāʾ) share this quality. The second kind of prophethood is always connected with messengerhood and denotes the transmission of God's laws to peoples. Thus, every messenger is a prophet and hence has the quality of walāya, but not every saint is a messenger. Consequently, from the perspective of the walāya, no difference obtains between prophets, messengers and saints. However, whereas Muḥammad is considered the Seal of the Prophets (khātam al-anbiyāʾ) with respect to the legislative prophethood, he is not the seal of the saints, which means the one who brought the walāya to its highest level.⁹⁸ It is worth noting that Ibn al-ʿArabī regarded himself as the seal of the saints.⁹⁹ At the end of chapter 14 on ʿUzayr, walāya appears as a principle preferable to legislative prophecy, and the author points out that after Muḥammad legislation was given to scholars. This is seemingly an allusion that legislation has not ended. No doubt, Ibn al-ʿArabī adopted his theory of the walāya from al-Ḥakīm al-Tirmidhī's teachings.¹⁰⁰

In the context of Jesus' prophecy, Ibn al-ʿArabī deals with miracles. Among these are, for example, the appearance of the angel Jibrīl in the form of a human being, his speaking to Mary, Jesus' procreation, and his speaking in the cradle and revivification of the dead.¹⁰¹ In contradistinction to what he says elsewhere,¹⁰² here Ibn al-ʿArabī expresses no reservation regarding the performing of physical miracles, very probably because they are recorded in the Sacred Books. In addition, our author also speaks of the spiritual miracle by which dead soul, a symbol of ignorance, is restored by divine knowledge to life.¹⁰³

As noted, the theory of aspects is not a doctrine developed by Ibn al-ʿArabī, but deduced from his words. This theory explains away contradictions found in our author's thought. The notion that God is both transcendent and immanent seems at first sight contradictory, for if God is ontologically and epistemologically beyond our perception, how can He be within the cosmos? And if, on the other hand, He is immanent, how can He be beyond our perception? Ibn al-ʿArabī solves this problem by asserting that from the standpoint of the intellect, that is, logical perception, He is transcendent; however, from the standpoint of His self-manifestation, He is immanent. The truth comprises both aspects. In like manner, God is the First and the Last. He is the First, because everything derives from Him, and He is the Last, because everything returns to Him.¹⁰⁴

Also the nature of God is twofold. From the aspect of His Essence, He is One, but from the aspect of His self-manifestation He is Many.¹⁰⁵ In the moral sphere, things are not different. From the perspective of metaphysics, as expressions of God's self-manifestation, good and evil things are not different from each other. However, judged by humans, one who does evil deserves punishment, and one who does good deserves reward.¹⁰⁶ Likewise, all religions are equal from the cosmic perspective, because religion means worship, and each people worship a certain god. Here, Ibn al-ʿArabī recommends humans to consider the equality of religions and have the capacity to know their common source.¹⁰⁷

One of the most important hendiadys, also known from other trends of thought, is the manifest (ẓāhir) and the hidden (bāṭin). For example, from the manifest perspective, throwing Moses into the river means putting him to death, yet, from the hidden perspective, water symbolizes knowledge; thus, Moses was thrown into the river in order to attain knowledge. The Greatest Master explains all Moses' and al-Khiḍr's acts in keeping with these two aspects.¹⁰⁸

These two aspects express one entity, the cosmos; the Real is the inward aspect of the cosmos, while the human being expresses its outward aspect.¹⁰⁹ Similarly, the human being's essence can be analyzed from two perspectives, humanity and animality, each having a different function in the human being.¹¹⁰

The present survey of Ibn al-ʿArabī's teachings in the Fuṣūṣ is, of course, not exhaustive, but aims to give the reader the principles of his thought, so that he will be able to understand the text. To attain a wider knowledge of the Greatest Master's ideas and worldview, one should consult, apart from the explanations, the references given in the footnotes.

Preface

(47) In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful.

Praise be to God who has sent down from eternity (many) kinds of wisdom (ḥikma, pl. ḥikam)¹ upon the hearts² of the perfect humans (kalim)³ in a unique right way, even if the sects and religious communities vary because of the variety of nations. May God bless and protect him (Muḥammad) who bestows (on people) spiritual aspirations⁴ from the treasures of (His) generosity (khazā'in al-jūd)⁵ and kindness through the most valuable statements.

I saw God's Messenger in a vision (mubashshira)⁶ during the latter part of the month of Muḥarram in the year 627 (1229) in Damascus. Seizing in his hand a book, he said to me, "This is Kitāb fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam (the book of The Bezels of Wisdom); take it and bring it to people so that they might benefit from it." I said, "I hear and obey God, His Messenger and those in authority⁷ among us as we are commanded." Therefore, I implemented the Messenger's wish with sincere intention and pure aim and aspiration and made this book manifest as God's Messenger determined without increase or decrease. I asked God to include me, both in this (mission) and in all my states (aḥwālī), among His servants over whom the Devil has no authority.⁸ I also asked Him that in all that which my fingers may write, in all that which my tongue

5 Ibn al-'Arabī devotes a long chapter (369) in the Futūḥāt to the issue of the treasures of generosity, entitled "The knowledge of the waystation of the keys to the treasures of generosity." It is also possible to understand this word as internal knowledge bestowed by God, or as God's names. Affīfī, II, p. 5.

I hope that God (al-ḥaqq),¹⁴ having heard my prayer, will accede to my call, for I shall convey (literally: cast into – alqā)¹⁵ only that which He conveyed to me, and I shall not send down (unazzilu)¹⁶ in this book anything except that which God sent down to me. I am neither a prophet nor a messenger, but only an heir (of prophets and messengers)¹⁷ preparing for the world to come (li-ākhiratī ḥārith).¹⁸

¹⁷ Here he alludes to the famous tradition that “the scholars are the heirs of the prophets (al-ʿulamāʾ warathat al-anbiyāʾ).” Al-Ghazālī, Iḥyāʾ, Vol. IV, p. 98.

¹⁸ “Who so desires the tillage (ḥarṭh) of the world to come, We shall give him increase in his tillage . . .” (Qurʾān 42:20).

¹⁹ This word refers to “understanding” in the line above.

²⁰ This sentence is a clear echo of Qurʾān 7:156: “. . . My mercy embraces all things.” Trans. AH.

restriction and restrict (others). May God gather us in His group²³ as He made us part of His community. The first (chapter) which the Lord reveals to the servant is as follows:

The bezel²⁴ of the wisdom²⁵ of divinity exists in the essence²⁶ of Ādam²⁷

(48) The Real,²⁸ from the perspective of His Names,²⁹ wanted to see the essences of His uncountable Most Beautiful Names (asmāʾ ḥusnā),³⁰ as they really operate, or if you wish, say to see His Essence, in an all-inclusive being containing all of them and qualified by existence. Through this being, His mystery will be revealed to Him. That is, because one's self seeing is not like one's seeing oneself in another, which serves as a mirror for the seer. (The reason for this preference) is that the mirror reveals to the seer himself in a shape which is (49) given by the substrate (maḥall) which one observes. If such a substrate does not exist and does not appear to the seer, he cannot see himself.

²⁴ This word can also be translated as ring setting. Sometimes Ibn al-ʿArabī seems to refer to the stones rather than to the bezels. Sells, Mystical Languages, p. 248, n. 22.

²⁶ The word Kalima denotes ḥaqīqa (essence) of a prophet, which amounts to an attribute of God. Suʿād al-Ḥakīm, p. 976. Also it designates a prophet. Affifi, Mystical Philosophy, pp. 72f. If by kalima we mean logos, that is, special traits of the prophets (Chittick, "Ibn ʿArabī's Summary," p. 4), then it is equivalent to essence. It is worth noting that in philosophical contexts one of the meanings of logos is the internal nature of something. Walbridge, God and Logic, p. 19.

(Because of this idea),³¹ the Real brought the whole cosmos into existence (awjada),³² an existence of an indistinct shape without a spirit in it, and it was like an unpolished mirror. According to God's customary rule, He does not make a substrate unless it receives the divine spirit, which is expressed by "breathing into it."³³ This breathing means the coming to be of a predisposition (isti'dād) of this created form to receive the constant revealed overflow (fayḍ) which has not ceased and will never cease. There is only a receptacle (qābil), which derives from His holy overflow (fayḍ aqdas).³⁴ All existents³⁵ come from Him, their beginning and their end, and "all things are brought back to God,"³⁶ just as they begin from Him.

(The revelation of) all things required the disclosure (jalā')³⁷ of the mirror of the world. Ādam was equal to the clearness of this mirror³⁸ and the spirit of this form (that is, the mirror). The angels were among the faculties of this form, that is, the form of the world, which is expressed in popular terminology through "the Great Human Being." The angels relate to the world like the relationship between the spiritual and sensual faculties in the human structure (to the body). Each of these faculties is veiled through itself from seeing something better than its essence, for it claims that it (the human structure) has competence for every high position and exalted rank with God, because it has the divine all-comprehensiveness (al-jam'iyya al-ilāhiyya),³⁹ which goes back to the divine side (al-janāb al-ilāhī)⁴⁰ and to the side of the Reality of Realities (ḥaqīqat al-ḥaqā'iq), and with respect to the structure which possesses these qualities, (it goes back) to that which is required by the Universal Nature which comprises all the receptacles of the world, higher and lower.⁴¹

³² Although in our author's thought the creation of the world does not coincide with the usual orthodox approach of creation ex nihilo, he uses the terminology of this approach, such as awjada (he brought into existence), ḥadatha (it came into being), and khalāqa (he created).

³³ Qur'ān 11:123. Sells, Mystical Languages, p. 246, n. 11.

³⁶ Qur'ān 2:210.

³⁷ Jalā' may also mean the clearness of this mirror.

³⁸ That is, because in his essence he reflects all the ingredients of the world.

³⁹ SPK, p. 195.

⁴⁰ By "the divine side" Ibn al-'Arabī may mean God's names. Affifi, II, p. 10.

⁴¹ Humans reflect God's attributes, or the divine side (al-janāb al-ilāhī), the first intellect (ḥaqīqat al-ḥaqā'iq) and the Universal Nature (al-ṭabī'a al-kullīyya). Cf. Affifi, II, pp. 10f. Sells, "Garden," p. 312, n. 38.

This (idea)⁴² is not known by the intellect (‘aql) through rational observation (naẓar fikrī),⁴³ but rather this kind of perception originates only in divine unveiling (kashf ilāhī). Through this divine unveiling the foundation of the forms of the world which contain its spirits is known.

The (entity) mentioned above is called (50) a human being and the vicegerent (khalīfa)⁴⁴ (of God). As for his humanness, it derives from his comprehensive structure and his comprising of all the realities, (because) the human being (insān) relates to the Real (al-ḥaqq – God) as the pupil (insān al-‘ayn) relates to the eye, and through the pupil seeing (naẓar, baṣar) occurs. Hence, he is called insān (meaning human being and pupil), because through him the Real looks (naẓara) at His creation and has mercy (raḥima)⁴⁵ on them. This human being is both created in time and is eternal, coming into being and living forever.⁴⁶ He is both the separating and unifying principle (literally: word – kalima).⁴⁷ The world owes its existence to him. His relation to the world is like the relation of the bezel of the seal ring to the seal ring. The human being is the tool (literally: place or substrate) and the sign by which the King seals His treasure. Because of (this function) God calls him the vicegerent, for through him God preserves His creation, as the seal ring preserves the treasures. So long as the King’s seal is on the treasures, no one dares to open them, except with His permission. For this reason, God has appointed him as a vicegerent who preserves His possessions (mulk). So long as the Perfect Human Being remains, the world will not cease to exist.⁴⁸ Do you not see that when he disappears and the seal of the treasure of the world is broken, nothing of what the Real preserved in the treasure will remain, and all the parts which exist in it will go out being united with each other, and all of them will move to another world (al-Ākhira) and he (the Perfect Human Being) will be an everlasting seal on the treasure of another world.⁴⁹

⁴² This is the idea of a receptacle which contains all the forms of the cosmos.

⁴³ In theological and philosophical discussions, fikra in most cases designates syllogistic procedure. See, for example, the beginning of Kitāb al-fikr in the fourth volume of al-Ghazālī’s Iḥyā’.

⁴⁴ The notion that the human being is the vicegerent of God is attested in the Qur’ān (2:30).

⁴⁵ For the connection between naẓar and raḥma, see Qur’ān 3:77 and its commentary.

⁴⁷ Since the human being is the symbol of the cosmos, from one point of view he is divided into parts, while from another point of view he is one essence. See my article “Ibn al-‘Arabī’s Attitude toward al-Ghazālī,” in Avicenna and His Legacy, ed. Y. Tzvi Langermann, Turnhout, Belgium 2009, pp. 105–107.

⁴⁸ Chittick, “Ibn ‘Arabī’s Summary,” p. 8.

All that exists in the divine forms,⁵⁰ that is, (God's) names, appears in the human structure. Hence these forms attained the rank of being encompassed and included in the existence of the human structure. And through this existence God argues against the angels.⁵¹ So take care, because God teaches you a lesson through (telling you the story of) another, and think⁵² what is the reason for blaming someone. That is, the angels were neither aware of the structure of this vicegerent nor of the essential servitude (ibāda dhātīyya) required by the presence of the Real. For no one knows about the Real except that which is given to him by one's essence.⁵³ The angels neither had the comprehensive (nature) of Ādam nor perceived the divine names (51) which particularize his nature and through which God is glorified and sanctified. Moreover, the angels did not know that God has (other) names by which they can glorify and sanctify Him as Ādam did. This situation which we have mentioned overwhelmed them and caused them to say concerning the structure of the human being: "How can You put someone there who will cause damage and bloodshed?" (Qur'ān 2:30, trans. AH). These words express only quarreling and the essence of their behavior, that is, what they said regarding Ādam equals their attitude toward the Real. If their structure had not imposed on them such (an ignorance of God's names), having been unaware of this imposition (wa-hum lā yash'urūn),⁵⁴ they would not have said what they said concerning Ādam. If they had known their souls (or selves – nufūs), they would have known (their predisposition),⁵⁵ and if they had known, they would have been protected (ʿuṣimū) (from ascribing sins to the human being). Moreover, the angels did not cease disparaging Ādam, but added the claim that (contrary to Ādam) they glorify and sanctify God (Qur'ān 2:30). Ādam knew the divine Names which the angels did not know, hence they could neither glorify their Lord nor sanctify Him through these names as Ādam did.⁵⁶

The Real described to us what happened (between Him and the angels) so that we know it and behave toward Him accordingly. Consequently, we shall not claim what we have realized and encompassed by limited (knowledge). How can we make, without restrictions, comprehensive claims of what we have no experience a world, because any world is a manifestation of God. A world always exists with the Perfect Human Being as its seal. Cf. Chittick, Imaginal Worlds, p. 90.

⁵⁰ Takeshita (An Analysis, p. 251, n. 48), basing himself on al-Kāshānī's and al-

Nabulusi's commentaries, reads here ṣūra (image), and not ṣuwar as in Affīfī's text.

⁵¹ The angels opposed the existence of Ādam, because he would cause damage and bloodshed on earth. Consequently, God showed the superiority of Ādam to them, for He taught Ādam the names of all existents. Qur'ān 2:30–33. Cf. Sells, Mystical Languages, p. 67.

⁵² Read wa-nzur instead of sa-anzuru.

⁵³ Thus, through his own essence the human being learns about God.

⁵⁴ This phrase is taken from the Qur'ān (7:95 and others) and designates the state of unawareness or heedlessness.

⁵⁵ They would have known the limitations of their knowledge.

⁵⁶ According to Ibn al-'Arabī, everything behaves in keeping with its fix or immutable entity (ʿayn thābita), and the angels are no exception to this rule. Thus, the angels cannot be blamed for acting in accordance with their basic structure. Our author ignores this logical difficulty, which can be found in other parts of the Fuṣūṣ.

and knowledge, for we will only be disgraced? This is the divine lesson (ta'rīf – literally: information) through which the Real educates His servants, the well mannered, the faithful, the vicegerents.

Let us now return to the Wisdom mentioned above and say: Know that the universals (al-umūr al-kullīyya), even if they have no concrete existence in themselves, they are undoubtedly perceived and known by the mind (fī'l-dhihn).⁵⁷ (Although) they are always hidden (bāṭin)⁵⁸ from the concrete existence (wujūd 'aynī),⁵⁹ they determine and influence each concrete existent. Moreover, the concrete existents are related only to the universals, (by which) I mean the (fixed) entities of the concrete things. The universals are always intelligible in themselves. The universals are manifest⁶⁰ from the point of view of concrete existents and hidden from the point of view of their intelligibility. Every concrete existent is dependent on the universals, which cannot be disconnected from the intellect. The universals cannot exist in a concrete manner in such a way that (52) they cease to be intelligible. Whether the concrete existence is temporal or not, its relationship to the universal is one and the same. However, the universal serves as the source of the determining rule of the concrete existents according to the requirements of the latter's essences; (it is) like the relationship of knowledge to the knower and life to the living.⁶¹ That is because life and knowledge are intelligible realities which differ from each other. We also say concerning the Real that He has knowledge and life, and hence He is knowing and living. We say regarding the angel that he has knowledge and life, hence he is knowing and living, and the same applies to the human being. The reality of knowledge is one, as is the reality of life, and the relationship of each of them to the knower and living, respectively, is one.

Regarding the knowledge of the Real we say that it is eternal (qadīm), while the knowledge of the human being is brought into being (muḥdath). Consider the determining rule which the relationship (between the act and its agent)⁶² creates regarding the intelligible reality, and consider the connection between the intelligible and the concrete existents. Just as the knowledge determines that the entity in which it exists is called knower, so the knower (literally: the one who is described by knowledge – al-mawṣūf bihi) determines that the knowledge is brought into being regarding the knower who is brought into being, and that the ⁵⁹ Chittick understands this term as an entified existence, that is, existence which is not in the mind. SPK, p. 83.

⁶⁰ External.

knowledge is eternal regarding the eternal (entity). Each of the two (knowledge and knower) is both determining and determined.⁶³

It is known that even if the universals (al-umūr al-kulliyya) are intelligible, they have no concrete existence,⁶⁴ but only the (power) of determination, as they are determined by the relationship to the concrete existent.⁶⁵ The universals are determined by the concrete existents,⁶⁶ but it is inconceivable that they should admit particularization and division, for they exist in their essences in each entity they qualify, as humanity exists in each individual of this particular species, being neither particularized nor (53) divided by the multiplicity of the individuals. (Even though the universals are present in concrete existents), they (the universals) remain intelligible. If the connection between that which has concrete existence and that which lacks such existence is proved (thabata), therefore this would be a nonexistent relationship (wa-hiya nisba 'adamiyya),⁶⁷ then the connection between the concrete existents to each other is more easily perceived by the intellect, because the concrete existence unifies them, whereas in the former case (the connection between the concrete existents and the universals), there is no unifying element (jāmi'). Hence, there is a connection without a unifying element; however, a connection with a unifying element is stronger and more correct. There is no doubt that the bringing into being (iḥdāth) of that which is brought into being (muḥdath) and the need of the latter to a bringer into being (muḥdith) is proved, because the muḥdath is possible by virtue of itself.⁶⁸ Consequently, its existence derives from another, and it is connected to another with a connection of need (irtibā' iftiqār). The entity on which the muḥdath relies (for its existence) is undoubtedly a necessary existent by virtue of its essence (bi-dhātihī); for its existence, it does not need another entity. It is He (God) who bestows existence to this coming-into-being thing (ḥādith) by His essence and the ḥādith relies on Him (for its existence). Since God's Essence necessitates the existence of the muḥdath, the muḥdath is a necessary entity by virtue of God. Since the ḥādith relies on the entity from which it emerges, because of the

⁶⁴ For Ibn al-ʿArabī concrete existence does not mean existence in the mind, but only existence outside one's mind, in the external world. I have no evidence that he knew of the doctrine of Abū al-Barakāt al-Baghdādī (d. after 1164), who thought that existence in the mind is one of the forms of concrete existence (wujūd fī'l-a'yān). Al-Kitāb al-mu'tabar fī'l-ḥikma al-ilāhiyya, Haydarabad 1939, Vol. III, p. 19.

⁶⁵ The knowledge of concrete existents determines the form of their universals.

⁶⁶ As he said above, the concrete existent may characterize the state of the universal.

⁶⁷ The author seems to say that the relationship between the concrete things and the universals are not seen but perceived by the intellect.

essence of this entity, (this connection between the ḥādīth and its source) necessitates that the ḥādīth reflects the source's form. (This means) that each name and attribute of the source is ascribed to the ḥādīth except essential necessity (wujūb dhātī),⁶⁹ for the latter is inadmissible regarding the ḥādīth; although the ḥādīth is the necessary existent, it is necessitated by another, not by itself.

Moreover, you should know that since what we have said concerning the emergence of the human being in His form is right, God caused us to know Him through the observation of the ḥādīth and pointed out that He showed us His signs in the ḥādīth,⁷⁰ so we adduced evidence from ourselves about Him. The description through which we described Him was not but the description of ourselves, except for the unique essential necessity (which belongs to Him alone). Since we know Him through knowing ourselves and from ourselves, we ascribe to Him all that which we ascribe to ourselves. This (point is corroborated) by divine messages which come to us through the prophets (tarājīm).⁷¹ (In these messages) He described Himself for us through us. If we witness Him, we witness ourselves, and if He witnesses us, He witnesses Himself. We are doubtless many in terms of being (numerous) individuals and species. Even if one reality unites us, we definitely know that there is a difference through which individuals are distinguished from one another. If this (rule) did not exist, multiplicity would not subsist in one (entity). (54) Likewise, even if He describes us through what He describes Himself, that is, through all aspects, still there should be a difference, which is our need of Him for our existence and (the fact) that our existence depends on Him. This is because we are possible things, whereas He does not need that which we need. Consequently, it is right (to ascribe to) Him eternity and pre-existence, and to deny of Him antecedence, (which means) the beginning of existence from nonexistence. Although He is the First, antecedence is not ascribed to Him. For this reason, it is said of Him (He is) the Last.⁷² If His antecedence were antecedence in the sphere of limited existence, it would be impossible that He should be the Last existent, for there is no last possible thing, because the possible things (mumkināt) are infinite, hence there is no last possible thing.⁷³ He is the Last, only because everything goes back to Him, after it has been attributed to us. Hence, essentially He is both the Last and the First.⁷⁴

⁶⁹ This means being necessitated by virtue of its essence.

⁷¹ For this use see SPK, p. 330. On p. 47, the word mutarjīm (literally: translator) means transmitter.

⁷² Qur'ān 57:3: "He is the First and the Last, the Outward (ẓāhir) and the Inward (bāṭin)."

⁷⁴ Here Ibn al-ʿArabī expresses the notion of the twofold nature of God. Just as God is transcendent and immanent, depending on the aspect considered, in the same manner, He is the First and Last. He is the First, because all entities derive from Him, and He is the Last, because all entities return to Him.

You should know that God characterized Himself as the Outward and the Inward and brought the world into existence in two forms – invisible and visible – so that we might perceive the Inward through the invisible (things) in ourselves and the Outward through the visible things in ourselves.⁷⁵ And He described Himself through satisfaction (riḍā) and anger (ghaḍab), and brought the world into existence as containing fear (khawf) and hope (rajāʾ), so that (people) would fear His anger and hope for His satisfaction. And He depicts Himself as beautiful and possessing majesty, and hence brought us into existence with (the attributes) of reverence (hayba) and intimacy (uns).⁷⁶ In this manner (one should understand) all that is ascribed to God and all His names. He expressed (each) pair of attributes by His two hands,⁷⁷ which turn from Him toward the creation of the Perfect Human Being, because he combines the realities of the world and its individual things. That is, because the world is visible (literally: witness – shahāda) and the vicegerent is invisible,⁷⁸ therefore the Ruler (God) is veiled. The Real describes Himself as (concealed) through dark veils, which are the natural bodies, and through luminous veils, which are the subtle spirits.⁷⁹ The universe is either dense (kathīf) or subtle (laṭīf), and it veils itself, hence it cannot perceive the Real as it perceives itself. It does not (55) cease (to be covered) by a veil which is not removed, knowing (maʿa ilmihi) that because of its need for its creator, it is distinct from Him. Moreover,⁸⁰ it has no part in the essential necessity which characterizes the existence of the Real, hence it will never perceive Him. The Real will never be known by the universe, either by mystical experience (dhawq) or by physical witness (shuhūd), for the created in time has no part in (the knowledge of the eternal).

God combined in Ādam (the pair of contradictory traits) to honor him. For this reason He said to Iblīs: “What prevented you from prostrating to (the human being) that I created with my two hands?” (Qurʾān 38:75) (Iblīs did not prostrate himself), because Ādam combined in himself two forms: the form of the cosmos and the form ⁷⁵ Since the structure of the human being reflects the cosmos, his hidden parts correspond to the cosmos’s hidden parts and the same applies to his manifest parts. Al-tadbīrāt al-ilāhiyya fī iṣlāḥ al-mamlaka al-insāniyya, in Kleinere Schriften des Ibn al-ʿArabī, ed. H. S. Nyberg, p. 108; trans. T. S. al-Jerrahi al-Halveti, Divine Governance of the Human Kingdom, Louisville 1997, pp. 9–11.

⁷⁶ One reveres God because of His majesty and wishes to be an intimate friend of God because of His beauty. Ibn al-ʿArabī wrote an epistle entitled Kitāb al-jalāl waʾl-jamāl. Rasāʾil, I, no. 2.

⁷⁸ The explanation of the invisibility of the vicegerent appears immediately.

⁷⁹ The notion that God is veiled by seventy veils of light and darkness is based on a ḥadīth. Al-Ghazālī, Mishkāṭ al-anwār, The Niche of Lights: A Parallel English-Arabic text, translated, introduced, and annotated by David Buchman, Provo, Utah, 1998, p. 44.

⁸⁰ The text reads wa-lakinna (but, however), which does not make sense here.

of the Real; both are the two hands of the Real, while Iblīs is part of the cosmos which does not possess this combination. Therefore, Ādam was vicegerent, and if he were not manifest in the form of that which made him vicegerent for the purpose of his vicegerency, he would not be vicegerent. And if he did not combine in himself all that which the subjects, for whose sake he was made vicegerent, require from him, because they depend on him and hence he must implement what they need, he would not be their vicegerent. Consequently, vicegerency is valid only regarding the Perfect Human Being. Therefore, God created his manifest form from the realities of the cosmos and its forms, and his invisible form in the form of God. For this reason, God said of him: “I was his hearing and seeing,” and He did not say, “I was his eye and ear.”⁸¹ He made a distinction between the two forms. (Just as the Real is in the Perfect Human Being), He is in each existent of the cosmos in the (same) measure that the reality of each existent requires. However, no existent possesses the combination (of traits) possessed by the vicegerent. He gained (this status of vicegerency) only because of this combination.

If the Real did not pervade the existents through (His) form, the cosmos would not exist. Likewise, if the universal intelligible realities did not exist, the concrete existents would not be determined.⁸² Hence, from this truth (mentioned above) (we learn) the cosmos’s need of God for its existence.

(56) All things need (God) and cannot dispense with (Him)/this is the truth that we express plainly

If you mention He who does not need (anything)/you know whom we mean

Everything is connected to everything without/ being separated, (so) learn from me what I say.

Now you know the wisdom of the creation (nash’a) of Ādam, that is, his external form, and you know the creation of his spirit, that is, his internal form, and this is the truth regarding creation.⁸³ And you know the creation of his position which is the combination (of traits) that made him worthy of the vicegerency. Ādam is the single soul from which God created the human species. This (is attested) in God’s saying: “Mankind, fear (ittaqū)”⁸⁴ your Lord, who created you of a single soul, and from it created its mate, and from the pair of them scattered abroad many men and women . . . (Qur’ān 4:1, trans. Arberry). His saying “fear (or beware)

81 Eye and ear are external and hence perceptible, while hearing and seeing are internal and hence imperceptible. The author refers to the tradition of supererogatory acts (ḥadīth al-nawāfil), according to which God rewards the believer who performs such acts “by becoming the hearing with which he hears, the seeing with which he sees . . .” Bukhārī, Vol. LXXXI, no. 38 (6502). Sells, Mystical Languages, p. 69. Ibn al-‘Arabī, Divine Sayings, p. 70.

82 For its existence the cosmos first needs God’s spirit (form) and second universal realities (ideas or the fixed entities – a’yān thābita), which establish the forms of the existents.

83 Read: al-ḥaqq fī’l-khalq. Sharḥ, p. 38. Reading fa-huwa al-ḥaqq al-khalq (Affīfī’s edition) means “thus, he (Ādam) is both the Real and the creation,” which coincides with the present context.

84 Ittaqū may also mean “beware.”

your Lord” (means) make your external side a protection for your Lord⁸⁵ and your internal side, that is God, a protection for you.⁸⁶ That is because the attitude toward human behavior consists of blame and praise; you should protect Him from blame (do not blame Him) and protect yourselves from praise (do not ascribe to yourselves praise), (only) then will you be well mannered and knowers.

Then, God showed Ādam what he placed in him, and he made it abide in two aspects relating to Ādam: the first aspect is the world and the second is Ādam and his progeny,⁸⁷ explaining the grades (of his progeny).

(The author) said: Since God showed me in secret what he placed in this great progenitor, I have recorded in this book what he established for me, not all of what I have been taught, for this (all the knowledge I was given) cannot be included in a book or in the world existing now. The following is what I witnessed, that is, what God’s messenger deposited in this book as He established it for me:

1. The Wisdom of Divinity exists in the Essence of Ādam; This is the present chapter.
2. The Wisdom of Expiration exists in the Essence of Seth (Shīth);
3. The Wisdom of Transcendence exists in the Essence of Noah (Nūh);
4. The Wisdom of Holiness exists in the Essence of Enoch (Idrīs);
5. The Wisdom of Excessive Love exists in the Essence of Abraham (Ibrāhīm);
6. The Wisdom of Reality exists in the Essence of Isaac (Ishāq);
7. The Wisdom of Loftiness exists in the Essence of Ishmael (Ismā‘īl);
8. The Wisdom of Spirituality exists in the Essence of Jacob (Ya‘qūb);
9. The Wisdom of Light exists in the Essence of Joseph (Yūsuf);
10. The Wisdom of Unity exists in the Essence of Hūd;
11. The Wisdom of Opening exists in the Essence of Šālīḥ;
12. The Wisdom of the Heart exists in the Essence of Shu‘ayb;
13. The Wisdom of Spiritual Power exists in the Essence of Lot (Lūṭ);
14. The Wisdom of Predetermination exists in the Essence of Ezra ‘(Uzayr);
15. The Prophetic Wisdom exists in the Essence of Jesus (‘Īsā);
16. The Wisdom of Mercy exists in the Essence of Solomon (Sulaymān);
17. The Wisdom of Existence exists in the Essence of David (Dā‘ūd);
18. The Wisdom of Breath exists in the Essence of Jonah (Yūnus);
19. The Wisdom of the Unseen exists in the Essence Job (Ayūb);
20. (58) The Wisdom of Majesty exists in the Essence of John (Yaḥyā);
21. The Wisdom of the Dominion exists in the Essence of Zakariah (Zakariyya);
22. The Wisdom of Intimacy exists in the Essence of Elias (Ilyās);
23. The Wisdom of Virtue exists in the Essence of Luqmān;
24. The Wisdom of Leadership exists in the Essence of Aaron (Hārūn);
25. The Wisdom of Exaltation exists in the Essence of Moses (Mūsā);
26. The Wisdom of Recourse exists in the Essence of Khālīd;
27. The Wisdom of Uniqueness exists in the Essence of Muḥammad.

⁸⁶ You are not responsible for the good deeds which emanate from you. Do not ascribe them to yourselves, but to God.

⁸⁷ Ādam reflects in his essence the whole cosmos, and in addition he is the source of all generations to come.

The bezel of each kind of wisdom is the essence ascribed to it.⁸⁸ In the kinds of wisdom I mentioned in this book, I limited myself to what was established in the Source of the Book (umm al-Kitāb).⁸⁹ I copied what the Messenger dictated to me and did not go beyond what was established for me. Even if I wished to increase (the contents given to me) I would not be able to do so, for God's presence (ḥaḍra) prevents this action. It is God Who grants success, and there is no Lord except Him.

⁸⁹ Qurʾān 43:4, 13:39, trans. AH. The source of the book is equivalent to the Preserved Tablet, the heavenly scripture, from which the Qurʾān was taken. This is another allusion of Ibn al-ʿArabī to the divine character of the Fuṣūṣ and to his status as one who, like prophets, receives revelation from Heaven.

2 The bezel of the wisdom of expiration¹ exists in the essence of Seth

Know that the external gifts and grants in the world, which are (given) through people and not through them, are divided into two kinds: gifts deriving from the Essence (of God) and gifts deriving from His Names. The people of mystical experience (ahl al-adhwāq) distinguish between them. Also, the two kinds of gifts (are given) in answer to a specific or a nonspecific request. (Moreover), there are gifts, whether of the Essence or of the Names, which are (59) (given) without request. One who wants a specific gift will ask: “O my Lord, give me such a thing, and he will specify a certain thing, not another.” One who wants a nonspecific gift will say: “Give me what You know is in my (best) interest for any part of my being, whether subtle or dense,” without specifying a certain thing.

Those who ask are divided into two kinds: those who are motivated to ask because of natural (inclination) to hasten (matters) (istījāl tabīʿī), for the human being was created hasty (khuliqa ʿajūlan);² and those who are urged to request, for they know that there are things belonging to God that cannot be attained (except and) only after a request. And he (one of this group) says (to himself) perhaps what we ask God is of this kind. Hence, his request (expresses) a precautionary measure, because of the possibility that there are things which God can give (but) only on request. That is because he cannot know what God knows, nor can he know what his predisposition (istīdād) permits him to receive, because one of the obscure objects of knowledge (aghmaḍ al-maʿlūmāt) is (knowing) one’s predisposition in each instant at that moment. However, if the predisposition did not make him request (something), he would not request (it).

The best knowledge attained by the People of Presence (ahl al-ḥudūr) with God,³ who do not know (their predisposition), is the knowledge of (their gift) at the moment of its reception. Because they are present with God, they know what God grants them at this time and that they receive it through their predisposition.

1 After stating in the first chapter that Ādam’s role was to unify all the realities in himself, the second chapter ascribes to Seth God’s self-manifestation of His power of creation, which is exemplified in the act of expiration (naḥīth).

2 This sentence is a combination of two Qur’ānic verses: “. . . Man is ever hasty” (wakāna al-insān ʿajūlan – Qur’ān 11:17) and “Man was created hasty . . .” (khuliqa al-insān min ʿajal – Qur’ān 21:37).

3 SPK, p. 105.

They are divided into two kinds: those who know from what they have received (what) their predisposition is, and those who know from their predisposition what they may receive. The latter is more complete than the former. Among those who belong to the second kind are certain people who ask, neither because they want to hasten (the reception of the gift) nor because there are many possible things (to be given), but only to obey God's command in His saying: "If you call on Me, I will answer you" (Qur'ān 40:60). Whoever does so is a pure servant. That is because this requester (al-dā'i) has no aspiration (himma),⁴ whether specific or not, which is connected with what he requests, but he wishes to obey his Lord's command. If his state requires (making a) request, he will ask servanthood ('ubūdiyya), and if his state requires the entrusting (of his affairs to God) and silence, he will be silent. Job (Ayūb) and others were afflicted by suffering, and they did not ask God to remove their affliction. (60) Then, at another time, their state required them to request the removal of it, and God removed it from them.

Hastening or slowing down the answer (depends) on the predetermined answer appointed by God for those who ask. If the request fits the moment predetermined for its answer, God hastens to answer, and if the time (of request) is delayed, whether in this world or until the world to come, the answer is also delayed. (What is delayed is) the thing requested, not the answer, for God is at the human being's service, hence you should understand this.⁵

By the second kind of request, "There are (gifts) that are given without request," I mean an articulated request, for essentially there must be a request, whether through articulation, a spiritual state, or a predisposition. Likewise, undefined praising (ḥamd muṭlaq)⁶ is never valid unless it is articulated; however, a spiritual state necessarily restricts praising when it refers to a (specific) meaning. The (knowledge) which urges you to praise God is the (knowledge) which limits (your praise) through a name of action (ism fi'l) or of transcendence (ism tanzīh).⁷ One is not aware of one's predisposition, but of one's spiritual state, because one knows the motive which is the state, for predisposition is a more hidden (form of) request. Only the knowledge that God predetermined (their actions) prevents such people from requesting God. They prepare their substrate to receive whatsoever comes from God, their souls and their aims being concealed from them.⁸

⁴ See p. 14, n. 4.

⁵ If all things and events are predetermined by God, then the suitability of the request to the answer is also determined. Thus, there is no possibility of man's choosing his actions freely in this system. Even one's thoughts and evaluations regarding one's actions can be considered as decreed by God.

Dr. Avraham Elqayam suggests that the word ifham ("understand"!) signifies the end of an esoteric or profound discussion that one should deliberate on. See, for example, ch. 12, 14, 17.

⁶ By this phrase, Ibn al-'Arabī may be suggesting general praise, like "you are good," without particularizing a specific trait.

⁷ When one knows God's names and actions, one praises Him by using words that are connected with these names.

⁸ They are not aware of their feelings and objectives, for they are waiting only for God's gifts.

Among those persons there are those who know that God's knowledge of them in all their states equals the knowledge of their fixed entity before their existence. They know that the Real does not confer (on the concrete entities) but what the fixed entity⁹ confers and they know the source of God's knowledge of them.

Among the people of God (ahl allāh),¹⁰ this kind of people (who do not request) are higher and more receptive to revelation than others, because they perceive the mystery of God's predetermination (sirr al-qadar).¹¹ They are divided into two groups: those who know it (the mystery) in a general way (mujmalan), and those who know it in a detailed manner (mufaṣṣalan). One who knows it in a detailed way is higher and more complete than one who knows it in a general way, for the former knows that which God knows about him, whether through God's notification to him of the knowledge latent in his fixed entity or His revelation to him of his fixed entity whose states are endless and ever-changing. (61) Such a one is higher than the one who knows in a general way. That is because his knowledge of himself is like God's knowledge of him, for the source of knowledge is one.¹²

However, from the point of view of the servant, (his knowledge of himself) derives from God's previous providence, which consists of God's revelation to him of all the states of his entity.¹³ When God makes the created being know the fixed states of his entity, he knows them as (concrete) existents, and he cannot know them in the state of their absence (from concrete existence),¹⁴ for they are essential relationships¹⁵ (nisab) having no form. In this respect we say that the two kinds of knowledge (God's and the human being's) are equal and originate in God's previous providence. That is why God said: "(We will try you) until we know (which of you do his best)" (Qur'ān 47:31). The phrase "until we know" has a very clear meaning, not as the meaning imagined by those who have no mystical inclination (mashrab). The best the one who holds God's transcendence (can do) is to state that the cause of the created knowledge is its connection (to the created beings). In the gift issue, this would be the best way of the rationalist, if he did not affirm knowledge as something added to God's essence and ascribed the connection to the created beings and not to the Essence. Through this (direction), the

¹³ Our author testifies to his own experience of receiving God's revelation on his future states and acts. Hirtenstein, The Unlimited Mercifier, p. 127.

¹⁴ He knows them only as they appear in concrete forms and not as ideas in God.

rationalist is distinguished from the Verifier, the one, among the people of God, who receives revelation and has the capability of finding (wujūd) the truth.¹⁶

Let us now return to the (subject) of (divine) gifts, which we say derive either from God's Essence or Names. As for the gifts and donations which come from the Essence, they always originate in divine revelation. Revelation originating in the Essence is always only through the predisposition of the recipient of the revelation, not through any other way. Thus, the recipient of revelation sees only his own form in the mirror of the Real; he does not see the Real, and it is impossible to see the Real, although he knows that he sees his form only in the Real. This is comparable to a mirror in the concrete existence; if you see a form in it, you will not see the mirror itself, although you know that you see forms or your form only in it.¹⁷ God manifests this as a simile of the revelation of His essence (62), so that the recipient will know that he does not see God. There is no simile closer and more similar to vision and revelation than this. When you see a form in the mirror, try as you may to see the substance of the mirror, you can never see it. This is so true that some people, who perceived such a phenomenon concerning the forms seen in mirrors, thought that the form observed is placed between the beholder and the mirror. This is the best (theory) that can be known, though the matter is as we have said and thought. We have explained it in al-Futūḥāt al-makkiyya.¹⁸ If you have tasted this matter, you have tasted the utmost degree (of knowledge) beyond which no higher degree (can be reached by) the created being. Hence, do not strive and weary yourself (by trying) to ascend to a higher degree than this, for He is not there at all, and beyond this degree there is only pure non-existence (al-ʿadam al-mahd). God is your mirror, through which you see yourself, and you are His mirror through which He sees His names and the manifestation of their rules, and these names are nothing other than Himself.¹⁹

The matter became confused and obscure: Some of us are ignoramuses and say: "The inability to perceive is perception." Some others among us know, but say nothing at all, and this is the best reaction (literally: saying): knowledge causes them to be silent, not incapable. (One who is silent) is the best knower of God. This knowledge belongs only to the Seal of Messengers and the Seal of God's Friends (or Saints). None of the prophets and messengers can perceive (this knowledge), ¹⁶ The question is how to explain God's knowledge of the entities which are brought into being. In other words, how this knowledge is related to God without infringing on His eternity and unity. The verifier knows by revelation that God's eternity and unity are not impaired, while the rationalist knows the same idea by ascribing the change in knowledge not to God but to the created beings. God knows from eternity what will exist and act in the cosmos, and there is no change in his knowledge. Futūḥāt, ch. 411, Vol. 7, pp. 23f.

¹⁸ Futūḥāt, Vol. I, p. 249 (ch. 17).

except through the light-niche (mishkāṭ)²⁰ of the Seal of Messengers. (Likewise) none of God's Friends can perceive it, except through the light-niche of the Seal of God's Friends, so that the messengers do not perceive it – even when they perceive it – except through the light-niche of God's Friends. That is, because messengerhood and prophecy – I mean the prophecy of legislation and its messengerhood – come to an end, while sainthood (walāya) never ends.²¹ Because the messengers are God's Friends, they do not perceive that which we have mentioned, except through the light-niche of the Seal of God's Friends, the more so concerning those who are more inferior than God's Friends. Even if the Seal of God's Friends follows the Law promulgated by the Seal of Messengers, this does not infringe his (Muḥammad) status nor contradict that which we have said, for from one vantage point he is inferior as he is superior from another. Accounts that appear in our plain religious sources (ẓāhir shar'īnā) (63) as regards the superiority of 'Umar's judgment of Badr's prisoners²² and the pollination of palms²³ support our view.

The perfect one is not necessarily superior in every respect and rank. People consider superiority in terms of the degree one can know God and (strive) to achieve this end. They must not think about the contingent beings. Understand what we have said!

The Prophet likened prophethood to a complete brick wall, except for one brick, and he was the (missing) brick. Muḥammad saw only one missing brick, while the Seal of God's Friends (khātam al-awliyā'), who necessarily experienced this vision of the Prophet's likening, saw two missing bricks, one made of gold and the other of silver. He saw that when these two bricks are in place, the wall is complete, and when they are missing, the wall is incomplete. He necessarily regarded himself as the two missing bricks needed to complete the wall.

The reason that entails his seeing two bricks is his following outwardly the Law of the Seal of Messengers, and this is the place of the silver brick. It is the outward aspect, (meaning) the rules that he follows. In like manner he learns from God inwardly that which he follows outwardly, for he necessarily contemplates things as they really are.²⁴ Regarding the inward aspect, this is the place of the golden brick. He and the angel, who reveals (messages) to the Messenger, acquire their knowledge from the same source.

If you understand what I have pointed to, you will attain beneficial knowledge of everything. That is because every prophet from Ādam to the last prophet has acquired his knowledge from the Niche of the Seal of Prophets. Even if the corporeal existence of a prophet comes late, (64) his reality (ḥaqīqa) always exists, and ²⁰ Cf. Qur'ān 24:35. When a lamp is placed in a niche, the light becomes stronger.

²¹ Walāya (proximity to God, friendship, sainthood) is the basic trait of prophets and saints. As such, it never ends, because nearness to God never ends. Chodkiewicz, Seal of the Saints, ch. 3.

the (following) saying of the Prophet (corroborates this idea): “I was a prophet when Ādam was between the water and the clay.”²⁵ Others became prophets only when they were sent. Likewise, the Seal of God’s Friends became God’s Friend while Ādam was between water and clay, and others became God’s Friends only when they fulfilled the conditions of God’s Friendship (walāya); that is, the divine qualities they assumed, because God called Himself the Praised Friend (al-walī al-ḥamīd).²⁶

As regards his walāya, the Seal of Messengers relates to the Seal of God’s Friends as the prophets and messengers relate to the Seal of God’s Friends, for he (Muḥammad) is God’s friend, messenger and prophet.

As for the Seal of God’s Friends, he is the walī, the heir who learns from the (divine) source and witnesses (all) the ranks (of being or of God’s Friends). The walāya is one of the merits (ḥasana) of the Seal of Messengers, Muḥammad, the first in the community and the lord of Ādam’s offspring regarding the opening of the gate of intercession (shafā’a).²⁷ Only Muḥammad among the prophets was assigned to this state of intercession. In this unique state he precedes the Divine Names, for the Merciful (al-raḥmān) does not intercede with the Avenger of the people of trial (ahl al-balā’a)²⁸ until intercession is made with them. Muḥammad attained supremacy in this unique rank. He, who understands the spiritual degrees and stations,²⁹ will not find it difficult for him to accept this idea.

As for the gifts deriving from God’s names, know that God’s bestowal (of these gifts) on his creatures shows His mercy toward them; all these gifts derive from His names. (This mercy is divided into two kinds.) Either it is pure mercy such as good and pleasant sustenance in this world, which is (also) pure in the Resurrection.³⁰ The name the Merciful (al-raḥmān) gives this sustenance, and it is a merciful bestowal. Or it is a mixed³¹ mercy, such as drinking repugnant medicine which, however, relieves. This is a divine bestowal which cannot be made except through one of the guardians of the names. Sometimes God bestows on the servant (a gift) through (His name) the Merciful, and the gift is free of a mixture which does not fit the servant’s nature at a certain time, or does not cause the attainment of his aim, or something similar. Sometimes God bestows (65) (a gift) through ²⁵ I did not find this tradition in the canonical collections. For a similar tradition, see SPK, p. 239.

²⁶ Qur’ān 42:28.

²⁷ According to Muslim dogma, no Muslim who carried out a grave sin (kabīra) would stay forever in Hell, because the Prophet would plead for him. Al-Ājurri, Al-Sharḥa, ed. Muḥammad Ḥāmid al-Fiqī, Beirut 1983, pp. 331–359.

²⁸ I assume that by this phrase the author means “the people of Hell” with whom intercession is made.

²⁹ Ibn al-‘Arabī may allude to his view that an individual can excel another in one aspect and be inferior in another.

³¹ It is a mixture of pleasant and unpleasant things.

(His name) the All-Encompassing (al-wāsiʿ),³² so that (His bestowal) is general, or through (His name) the Wise (al-ḥakīm) to serve the best interests (al-aṣḥaḥ) (of the people) at a certain time. Or He may bestow through His name the Bestower (al-wahhāb) in such a way that the recipient is not obliged to respond either by (expressing) gratitude or carrying out an action. Or He may bestow through His name the Almighty (al-jabbār), as it relates to a certain place (mawṭin) and its requirements.³³ Or He may bestow through His name the Forgiver (al-ghaffār), observing the true state (of the sinner). If the sinner deserves punishment, He will forgive him, and if he does not deserve punishment, he will protect him from a sin. Hence he will be called “immune” (maʿṣūm), “protected from sins,” and other names of a similar kind.

The giver is God, because He is the guardian of His treasuries. He brings forth (gifts) only in a known measure (qadr maʿlūm) and only in a name unique to each gift. “He gives everything its (appropriate measure of) creation (khalqahu)”³⁴ (Qurʾān 20:50) according to the name Just (ʿadl) and other names like it.

God’s names are infinite, because they are known through the infinite things which derive from them, even if their sources are finite principles; that is, the foundations of the names (ummahāt al-asmāʾ) or the presences of the names (ḥaḍarāt al-asmāʾ).³⁵

Truly, there is only one Reality (ḥaqīqa) which receives all these relations and attributions which are called the Divine Names. The Reality grants to every name, which appears endlessly, an essence (ḥaqīqa)³⁶ by which a name is distinguished from (all) others. This peculiar essence constitutes the name itself, not (the characteristics) the name shares with others. Likewise, gifts differ from each other through their distinctive characteristics (shakhsiyya); even though they derive from the same source, it is known that each differs from (all) others. The reason for this is the distinction of the names, for a thing never repeats itself because of the expansion of the divine domain. This is the truth on which one relies (yuʿawwalu ʿalayhi).³⁷

This is the knowledge of Seth. Seth’s spirit supplies any spirit that talks (66) about this (idea) with this knowledge, except for the Seal’s spirit, because the Seal ³² For this name see, for example, Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī, Sharḥ asmāʾ allāh al-ḥusnā, ed. Taha ʿAbd al-Raʿuf Saʿd, Beirut 1990, pp. 282–284.

³³ By this the author may mean God’s control over every place on earth.

³⁴ SDG, pp. XXIVf.

³⁷ Cf. the title of one of Ibn al-ʿArabī’s books: The Book of Things One Must Not Rely On (lā yuʿawwalu ʿalayhi). Rasāʾil, I.

receives this knowledge (literally: the material – al-mādda) only from God, not from a spirit. Moreover, it is from the Seal's spirit that this knowledge (passes) to all the spirits. If the Seal does not comprehend this (procedure) through himself at the moment of the composition (tarkīb) of his material body, he knows all this, as it is, through his essence and rank. From the point of view of his material composition, he is ignorant. Thus, he is the knower and the ignorant (at the same time). He is described through contraries, just as the Source (God) is described as the Beautiful and the Majestic, the Manifest and the Hidden, the First and the Last. This (joining of contraries) signifies his essence, and not another (trait). He knows and does not know, he comprehends and does not comprehend, he witnesses and does not witness.

Because of this knowledge, Seth was named "God's gift," which is the meaning of Seth.³⁸ In his hand is the key to gifts of different kinds and attributions. First this key was given to Ādam, and that which Seth received is from Ādam, because the son is the secret of his father;³⁹ from the father he emerges and to him he returns. To him who has understanding from God, nothing is strange in this giving. Every gift in this world takes the same course of giving. Every gift derives from God and there is nothing which does not come from Him, even if the forms (of gifts) are various. Not all persons know this and that this is the truth; only a very few of the people of God (know this). If you see one who knows it, rely on him, for this one is the very purest individual of the choicest of the elite ('ayn ṣafā' khulāṣt khāṣat al-khāṣa) among the people of God. Every gnostic (literally: one who possesses unveiling – ṣāḥib kashf) who contemplates a form which gives him knowledge he did not possess before (must know) that this knowledge originates in himself, and in no other (entity). It is from the tree of his own self that he garners the fruit of his knowledge. It is like a manifest form which faces a polished surface (and is seen in it), not another (form is seen in it). However, the substrate or the plane (ḥaḍra) in which he sees his form may change owing to the shape of this plane; a big thing may appear as a little thing in a little mirror, and (a short thing may appear) as a long thing (in a long mirror), and (a resting thing) may appear as a moving thing (in a moving mirror). A unique plane may cause the reverse (67) form to be seen, or may reflect the exact thing which it faces, in such a way that the right side is seen as right from the point of view of the seer. However, in general, the right side appears in the mirror as the left side. But in exceptional cases, the right side appears as a right side. All this applies to the traits of the essence of the plane wherein (things) appear; this is the plane which we compare to a mirror. Whoever knows his predisposition, knows that which he receives. Not everyone who knows that which he receives knows his predisposition except after he receives, even though he knows this (his predisposition) in a general way.

³⁸ Seth does not appear in the Qur'ān. Cf. Huart and C.E. Bosworth, "Shīth," E I2. Very probably Ibn al-'Arabī knew the meaning of the name which is given in Genesis 4:25: "And Adam knew his wife again: and she bore a son, and called his name Seth; For God, said she, has given (shat) me another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew."

³⁹ The son is the hidden entity of the father.

However, some people of speculation (ahl al-naẓar) who are weak-minded hold that since it has been proved that God does what he wants, it is possible for Him to do things contrary to wisdom and to the real state of things. Consequently, some speculative thinkers come to deny possibility (or contingency – imkān) and to affirm the necessity through the Essence or through another (entity).⁴⁰ One who verifies (al-muḥaqqiq)⁴¹ affirms possibility and its attendance (ḥaḍra);⁴² he knows what the possible thing is, what turns it into a possible thing and that it is necessary by virtue of another. (He also knows) why it is legitimate to designate that which requires the necessity of another thing. Only those who know God are aware of the distinction between (these terms).

The last-born individual of the human species will follow the footsteps of Seth and bear Seth's mysteries. There will be no other offspring of this species and he will be its seal. His sister will be born with him, and he will emerge after her, his head lying at her feet. He will be born in China and speak Chinese. Infertility will spread among men and women, and there will be many marriages without procreation. He will call them to God, but they will not respond. When God will make him and the believers of his time die, those who remain will live like animals, not permitting the lawful and not prohibiting the unlawful. They will behave as dictated by nature and passion without any regard for intellect or religion. Because of them the Last Hour will take place.

⁴⁰ They deny the existence of possible things and the fact that things are necessary through other things and affirm that only God makes things necessary through His Essence. Cf. B. Abrahamov, "Al-Ghazālī's Theory of Causality," Studia Islamica 67 (1988), especially pp. 95f.

⁴¹ This is the one who knows the truth for certain. SPK, p. 389, n. 11.

⁴² Here the word ḥaḍra appears in a different meaning.

3 The bezel of the wisdom of transcendence¹ exists in the essence of Noah

Know, may God inspire you through His spirit, that according to the people of truth (ahl al-ḥaqāʾiq), transcendence (tanzīh) concerning the Divine amounts to limitation and restriction.² Whoever believes in God's transcendence (munazzih) is either foolish or ill mannered. If he, as a believer in religion, holds (this doctrine) unreservedly and believes in it and does not take into consideration something else, he misbehaves, denies the truth and the messengers, without being aware of this (consequence). He imagines that he is right, but he is wrong. He is like one who believes in parts (of religion) and disbelieves in others,³ especially if he knows that divine expressions in the Scriptures that speak of the Real convey easily understood meanings to the common people (ʿumūm), but to the elite (khuṣūṣ) (they convey) all meanings that are comprehensible according to the aspects of a certain phrase in the ordinary usage of a given language.

The Real is manifest in every created and comprehended (maṣhūm) thing, and He is hidden from all comprehension, except for the comprehension of the one who holds that the cosmos is His form and ipseity (huwiyya). The cosmos is His manifest name, just as He is in another sense the spirit of that which is manifest, and this spirit means His being hidden. The Real's relationship to the manifest forms of the cosmos is like the relationship of the spirit that governs a form. Concerning the definition of the human being and of any other being, we can speak of the manifest and the hidden aspects. The Real (in his manifest aspect) can be defined by every definition, for the forms of the cosmos are infinite and cannot be encompassed. The definitions of every form of the cosmos cannot be known but through the measure of the knowledge of the form of the cosmos that one possesses. Consequently, the definition of the Real is not known, for His definition cannot be attained except through the knowledge of every form, which is impossible. Therefore, the definition of the Real is inconceivable.

1 Subbūh is an attribute of God which denotes His transcendence of any trait relating to the cosmos. Chittick, "The Chapter Headings," p. 9. The Real in respect to His Essence has no connection to the cosmos; however, in respect to His names and attributes, He permeates the cosmos. According to our author, the truth lies in accepting both God's transcendence and immanence. Affifi, II, pp. 31–33. Ibn al-ʿArabī distinguishes between two kinds of transcendence. The first is ḥikma subūḥiyya, which denotes purifying God from partners and imperfections, while the second is ḥikma quḍsiyya (see the title of ch. 4), which signifies removing from God all traits of the possible things. Izutsu, pp. 51f.

2 When you can say nothing about God, because He is transcendent, you limit your knowledge of Him.

3 Qurʾān 4:150.

(69) Likewise, whoever holds the Real's immanence (shabbaha) and does not hold His transcendence (nazzaha) limits and restricts Him and does not know Him. Whoever combines in his knowledge transcendence and immanence in a general way, for it is inconceivable to know the cosmos in detail, because one cannot embrace all the forms of the cosmos, knows the cosmos in a general way but not in detail, just as he knows himself in general but not in detail. For this reason, the Prophet connected knowledge of the Real with knowledge of the self (or soul), saying: "Whoever knows himself (or his soul) knows his Lord" (man 'arafa nafsahu 'arafa rabbahu).⁴ And God said: "We shall show them Our signs on the horizons," meaning the outside world, "and in themselves (or in their souls)," meaning the inside world, "until it becomes evident to them," meaning to the observer, "that He is the Real" (Qur'ān 41:53), in that you are His form, and He is your spirit.⁵ You relate to Him, as your bodily form relates to you, and He relates to you as the spirit that governs the form of your body. Your definition includes both the external and the internal aspects, for if the spirit that governs the form of your body disappears, you are no longer called a human being; concerning this form, it is said that it has the form of a human being, which does not differ from a form of wood or of stone. The name "human being" applies to this form only figuratively, not in reality. However, the Real never disconnects Himself from the forms of the cosmos. Just as the human being when alive is defined by the spirit in reality and not in a figurative way, so the cosmos is defined by the Divinity.

Just as the external form of the human being praises with its unique language⁶ its spirit and soul which govern it, so God makes the forms of the cosmos praise Him. But we are not able to understand their praise, because we cannot encompass all the forms of the cosmos. All the praises come from the languages of the Real which express His praise. For this reason, God says: "Praise belongs to God, the Lord of (all) existents ('ālamīn),"⁷ meaning that He is the source of all praises, hence He is both the one who praises and the one praised.

(70) If you hold transcendence, you restrict Him/and if you hold immanence, you limit Him

If you hold the two doctrines, you are right/and you will be a leader and a master in knowledge

4 For this dictum, see A. Altmann, "The Delphic Maxim in Medieval Islam and Judaism," in Altmann, Studies in Religious Philosophy and Mysticism, New York 1969, pp. 1–40.

5 See p. 22, n. 7.

6 The body has a specific language through which it expresses its praises.

7 Qur'ān 1:1. Most of the commentators regard the word 'ālamīn (literally: worlds) as designating all existents, except for God. See, for example, Ibn Kathīr, Tafsīr al-Qur'ān al-aẓīm, Beirut 1970, Vol. I, p. 43.

Whoever holds His being as two things is a polytheist/and whoever holds that He is one unifies Him

Beware of likening Him if you hold duality/and of making Him transcendent if you unify Him

You are not He, but you are He and you see Him⁸/in the essences of things both boundless and restricted.⁹

God said: “There is nothing like Him” (Qur’ān 42:11), thus making Himself transcendent, and “He is the All-Hearing, the All-Seeing” (ibid.), thus likening Himself to creation. (However), when He says “there is nothing like His likeness (ka-mithlihi),” He likens Himself to creation¹⁰ and makes Himself two, and when He says “the All-Hearing the All-Seeing,” He makes Himself transcendent and united.¹¹

If Noah had combined the two calls¹² to his people, they would have answered him. (However), he first called them to the external (doctrine of transcendence) then to the internal (doctrine of immanence)¹³ and then said to them: “Ask forgiveness of your Lord, for He is always Forgiving” (Qur’ān 71:10). And he said: “. . . I have called my people night and day, but the more I call them, the further they run away” (Qur’ān 71:5, 6, trans. AH). He said that his people did not want to hear his call, for they knew that they should respond to it. Those who know God apprehend what Noah pointed out regarding his people; this was praise in the form of blame. They (those who know God) understand that the people did not respond to his call only because his call separated (furqān)¹⁴ (between the transcendent and the immanent aspects of the Reality), whereas one should combine the two aspects (qur’ān) and not separate (furqān) them. Whoever holds a combination (of the two aspects) does not pay attention to separation even if he is in a state of separation, because the combination includes the separation and not vice versa. For this reason, only Muḥammad and this community, which is the “best community singled out for people” (Qur’ān 3:110), were distinguished by the Qur’ān. (The verse) “There is nothing like Him” (Qur’ān 42:11) combines the two aspects in one place. If Noah had uttered this verse, they would have answered him, for the Qur’ān likens (God to creation) and does not liken (Him) in the same verse, moreover even in half a verse.

⁸ Ibn al-‘Arabī here refers to the question of the One and the Many. From one point of view the cosmos is identified with the Real, because it is His manifestation, but from another point of view it is different, because it is created. Affifi, Mystical Philosophy, p. 12. This doctrine will also be dealt with in ch. 4.

⁹ These stanzas were also translated by Affifi in his Mystical Philosophy, p. 21.

¹⁰ He likens Himself, because the Qur’ān says that God has a like.

¹¹ That is because only God has such absolute traits.

¹² That is, the call for a transcendent God and the call for an immanent God.

¹³ Cf. Qur’ān 71:8, 9.

Noah called his people at night (71), (which symbolizes) their intellect and spirituality, for they are hidden. Also he called them by day, (which symbolizes) their external forms and senses.¹⁵ However, he did not combine the external and the internal aspects as in “there is nothing like Him.” As a result, their innermost perception repelled (Noah’s call) because of this separation (between the two aspects), and his call increased their running away.¹⁶ Then he spoke about himself, (revealing) that he called them so that God would forgive (li-yaghfira lahum) them, not that He would reveal to them (the two aspects). They understood that which he (Noah) told them. For this reason, they “thrust their fingers into their ears and covered their heads with their garments” (Qur’ān 71:7, trans. AH). All this is the form of covering (satr)¹⁷ to which he called them, and they responded to his call in an active manner, not by yielding to God. In the verse “There is nothing like Him,” there is both affirmation and negation of likeness to God. Muḥammad spoke about this point of having been given (the knowledge) of the all-comprehensive words (jawāmi‘ al-kalim).¹⁸ Muḥammad did not call his people at night and by day (separately), but rather at night by day and by day at night.¹⁹

In his wisdom, Noah said to his people: “He will send down abundant rain from the sky for you” (Qur’ān 71:11, trans. AH); that is, (various kinds) of intellectual knowledge regarding the meanings (of things), and reflection, “and He will give you wealth (amwāl)” (ibid., 12, trans. AH), through which He will incline you toward Him (yamīlu bi-kum ilayhi).²⁰ When He inclines you toward Him, you will see your form in Him. However, he among you who imagines that he sees Him does not know, and he among you who knows that he sees himself is the knower. For this reason, people are divided into those who do not know and those who know. And “his offspring” (waladuhu, ibid., 21) is the fruit of their reflection. The knowledge of this issue²¹ is based on revelation (mushāhada) and is far removed from the fruits of reflection. (“Their wealth and children) will increase their ruin” (ibid.) and “their trade reaps no profit” (Qur’ān 2:16, trans. AH). What they grasp, that is, what they imagined was their property, has disappeared. Concerning the Muḥammadans,²² (it is said in ¹⁵ “My Lord, I have called my people night and day” (Qur’ān 71:5, trans. AH).

¹⁷ The verb satara is equivalent to the verb ghafara mentioned above; both designate covering.

¹⁸ This is a ḥadīth which appears in al-Bukhārī, Jihād 122 (7013): “I was sent with the all-comprehensive words.” Futūḥāt, Vol. III, p. 160. SPK, pp. 239, 306, 330, 396, n. 17. Here Ibn al-‘Arabī finds corroboration for his idea that in his personality Muḥammad joins the external and the internal aspects.

¹⁹ This means that the internal aspect (night) exists in the external aspect (day) and vice versa.

²⁰ Here Ibn al-‘Arabī plays with the stems m.w.l of amwāl and m.y.l of yamīlu, although the meanings of both words are different.

²¹ The author means the combination of the two aspects mentioned above.

the Qur'ān) "Give out of what He has made pass down to you" (Qur'ān 57:7, trans. AH) and concerning Noah (and his people) (the Qur'ān says): "Entrust yourselves to no one but Me" (Qur'ān 17:2, trans. AH). (The Qur'ān) affirms that the property is theirs and that God is their trustee. They are appointees of the property possessed by God, and God is their trustee. The property is in their grasp, but this is the property of appointment (mulk al-istikhlāf). Through this, the Real is the Owner of the Property (mālik al-mulk), as al-Tirmidhī said. "And they have deceived a mighty deception" (Qur'ān 71:22), because the call to God means a deception (of the people) to whom (this call) was directed, for God (72) has not been absent from the beginning, therefore He is always called to. "I call (the people) to God" (Qur'ān 12:108), and this is the essence of deception.²³ "(When I called them) it was out of clear awareness" (ibid.) He (Noah) turned their attention to (the idea) that the whole cosmos belongs to Him. They responded by deceiving him, just as he did.

The Muḥammadan knows that the call to God is not a call to His ipseity, but rather to His names. God said: "On the day that We shall gather the god-fearing to (ilā) the Merciful as a group" (Qur'ān 19:85). The Qur'ān uses the particle indicating direction (ilā) and connects it to God's name (the Merciful), hence it lets us know that the cosmos is under the providence of a divine name which obliges humans to be god-fearing. In their deceit they said: "Do not abandon your gods, do not abandon Wadd, Suwā', Yaghūth, Ya'ūq and Nasr" (Qur'ān 71:23). If they renounced their gods, they would not know the Real in the measure of their renouncement, for the Real is reflected in every worshiped god, whether one knows or does not know (this fact).

Concerning the Muḥammadans (Qur'ān 17:23 says): "God decreed (qadā) that you should worship none but Him," meaning He ordered (ḥakama).²⁴ The knower is aware of the object of worship and the form through which it was made manifest for the purpose of being worshiped. He also knows that separation and multiplicity (of the parts of this object) are like parts in the sensible form and like spiritual faculties in the spiritual form, hence in every object of worship it is God who is worshiped.²⁵ The inferior person is he who imagines (the existence of) divinity in these objects. If he had not imagined this, he would not have worshiped stone or other things. For this reason, God said (to Muḥammad): "Say (to the idolaters) 'name them' (the idols)" (Qur'ān 13:33). If they had named them, they would have named them stones, trees and stars. If they had been asked: "Whom did you worship?" They would have said: "A god." They would not have said God (allāh) or the god. The superior person does not imagine, but says that this is a divine manifestation which one needs to exalt, and he does not confine himself (to the worship of a specific object). The inferior person who uses his imagination says: "We only worship them because they bring us nearer to God” (Qur’ān 39:3, trans. AH). The superior person, the knower, says: “Your God is one, so submit yourselves only to Him” wherever He is manifest “and give good news to the humble” (al-mukhbbīn, literally: those who make themselves low. Qur’ān 22:34), whose fire of nature was extinguished and they say “a god” and not “a nature.”

²³ Noah's call was a deception, because he called them to believe in the transcendent God while omitting God's immanent aspect.

“They have led many astray” (Qur’ān 71:24, trans. AH), meaning they have confused them regarding the counting of the One through aspects and attributions. “Do not increase the going astray of those who do evil” (al-zālimīn)²⁶ (ibid.) (73) to their souls. “The elect” (Qur’ān 38:47) “who inherited the Scripture” (Qur’ān 42:14) are the first of the three (groups).²⁷ He gives this group precedence over the moderate and the foremost. (By those who go astray mentioned above) he means the perplexity of the Muḥammadan (who says:) Increase my perplexity regarding You!²⁸ “Whenever it (the lightning) flashes on them, they walk on, and when darkness falls around, them they stand still” (Qur’ān 2:20, trans. AH).

The perplexed person circles (the Pole) and his circular motion (continues) around the Pole without interruption,²⁹ while the individual who takes the long course inclines away from (the circle), distancing himself from the target, seeking only the state in which he exists and imagining his aim. (He imagines) the points of beginning and end of his way and that which is in between.³⁰ There is no beginning point for the human being who takes the circular course; he should not go out at a certain place nor direct himself to a final point. He possesses the complete existence and is given all the comprehensive words³¹ and wisdoms (ḥikam).

“Because of their steps of going beyond”³² (khaṭīrātihim, literally: their sins, Qur’ān 71:25), which caused them to go beyond, they were drowned in the seas

³¹ See note 18 above.

of the knowledge of God, which means perplexity. “And they were made to enter a Fire” (ibid.), meaning according to the Muḥammadans the same as drowning. “When the seas boil over” (sujjirat, Qur’ān 81:6). When you set an oven on fire (you say): “The oven was set on fire (sajjarat).”

“Except for God, they found none to help them” (Qur’ān 71:25), for God was their (only) source of help,³³ and they were annihilated in Him forever. If He had taken them (from the bottom of the sea of knowledge) to the shore of nature (the world of the phenomena), He would have brought them down from this lofty rank, even if the whole cosmos belongs to God (li-allāh), (exists) through God (bi-allāh), and moreover the whole is God (al-kull huwa allāh).³⁴

“(And) Noah said: ‘My Lord’” (rabbī – ibid., 26). He did not say “My God” (ilāhī), for Lord has (the attribute of) stability, while God has (the attribute of) many names, because “Every day He does something (different)” (Qur’ān 55:29). By Lord, Noah means the stability in variation (thubūt al-talwīn),³⁵ for the only real existence belongs to Him. (Noah said to God): “Do not leave one of the unbelievers on earth” (Qur’ān 71:26), meaning that he calls (on God) to make them dwell in its bottom.³⁶ The Muḥammadan says: “If you drop a rope, it will fall upon God”³⁷ (which means that) “Everything in the heavens and on earth belongs to Him” (Qur’ān 2:116, trans. AH). When you are buried in it, you are in it and it is your place (zarfuka). (“From the earth we created you), into it We shall return you, and from it We shall raise you a second time” (Qur’ān 20:55, trans. AH), because of the variety of aspects (involved in returning and raising). (“Do not leave) one of those who conceal³⁸ (kāfirīn) (on earth)” (Qur’ān 71:26) who “covered their heads with their garments and thrust their fingers into their ears”³⁹ in order to find cover, because he called (74) them to cover (ghafara) them, for covering (ghafir) means concealing (satr).

(He points out in this verse) “one” (Qur’ān 71:26) to indicate that just as the calling is general so is the benefit.

“If you leave them” (Qur’ān 71:27), meaning if you call them and leave them, “they will lead Your servants astray” (ibid.), meaning they will confound (yuhayyirūhum) them and make them go out from servanthood to the mysteries of Lordship existing in them. Consequently, they will regard themselves as lords after they regarded themselves as servants; hence, they are servants and lords (at the same time). “They will not beget” (ibid.), meaning they will not ³³ The text has “helpers” (aṣṣār).

³⁴ If the whole is God, there is no higher or lower place or idea.

³⁶ To be on earth means to consider only the external phenomena, while to be in the bottom of the earth means to see the inner aspects of existence.

³⁷ Tirmidhī, V:58 (3298).

³⁸ They are those who conceal the Real by worshipping idols.

³⁹ Our author changed the order of Qur’ān 71:7.

produce and manifest except “only one who breaks”⁴⁰ (ibid.), meaning one who manifests that which was concealed, (and only) “one who conceals,”⁴¹ meaning concealed that which was manifest after its being manifested. They will manifest what was concealed, then conceal what was manifested after its manifestation. As a result, the beholder will be bewildered and not know the aim of the one who manifests in his manifestation, or the aim of the one who conceals in his concealment, nor that person (carrying out the two actions), who is one and the same. “My Lord, (ighfir) me” (Qur’ān 71:28), meaning conceal me and do it for my sake, so that (one) will not know my (true) value (qadr) and station, just as one does not know Your value in Your Qur’anic statement “They did not assess God’s true value” (6:91). (And conceal) “My parents” (Qur’ān 71:28), (that is) the intellect and the nature who produced me, “and whoever enters my house” (ibid.), meaning my heart, “believing” (ibid.), (that is) saying that the divine messages in it are true and that they derive from themselves (souls). (And conceal) “the male believers” from the intellect “and the female believers” from the souls. “And do not increase those who are obscure (ẓālimīn)” (ibid.). (This meaning) derives from the word “darkness” (ẓulumāt). They are the people of the hidden world who are concealed behind dark veils.⁴² (Do not increase them) “But destruction (tabār),” (ibid.), meaning annihilation (in God) so that they will not be aware of their souls because they will see the face of the Real. (The following verse was directed) to the Muḥammadans: “Everything perishes except for His face” (Qur’ān 28:88). Tabār means annihilation. Whoever wishes to know the mysteries of Noah must ascend to the sphere of Noah (the sun). This issue is treated in my *al-tanazzulāt al-mawṣiliyya*⁴³ (The Mosul Revelations). God speaks the Truth.

⁴⁰ This is the first meaning of fajara, from which the active participle (fājir, wrong doer) derives.

⁴¹ Again, Ibn al-‘Arabī exploits the first meaning of kafara (he concealed), neglecting the usual meaning of kaffār (unbeliever).

4 The bezel of the wisdom of holiness¹ exists in the essence of Enoch²

(75) (The term) elevation (‘uluww) has two meanings: elevation with respect to physical place and elevation with respect to status. The elevation of place (is attested in Qur’ān 19:57), “We raised him to a high place.” The highest place is the place around which the Spheres revolve. This is the Sphere of the Sun, the place of the spirituality of Enoch. Seven Spheres are situated below the Sphere of Enoch and seven others above it, and his Sphere is the fifteenth. The Spheres above him are those of Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, the Mansions, the Constellations (al-aṭlas),³ the Footstool, and the Throne. The Spheres below him are those of Venus, Mercury, the Moon, Ether, Air, Water, Earth. Because (the Sphere of the Sun) is the pivot of (all) the Spheres, it is an elevated place.⁴

As for the elevated status, it belongs to us, the Muḥammadans. God said: “You are the elevated, and God is with you” (Qur’ān 47:35) in this elevation; He is far above physical place but not above status.⁵ When the souls of those of us who acted were afraid (of God’s proximity to the human being), He said (following “God is with you”): “God will not decrease the reward for your actions” (ibid.). That is because an action requires place, while knowledge requires status. Hence, God conjoins the two elevations, the elevation of place through action and of status through knowledge. Then, in order to place Himself far above the human being, He said: “Praise the name of your Lord, the Most High” (Qur’ān 87:1) to negate any idea of partnership.⁶

² For Idrīs, see Qur’ān 19:56–57, 21:85, 86. G. Vajda, “Idrīs,” E I2. As in other chapters, in this chapter Idrīs is not a historical person, but a spirit which resides in the sphere of the sun. Affifi, II, p. 45. See below, ch. 22.

³ The Sphere of burūj, which is placed after al-aṭlas, is identical to the Sphere of al-aṭlas and hence redundant.

⁴ As is well known, this is not the usual description of the Spheres by the philosophers or the astronomers, but a strange amalgamation of astronomical, philosophical and Qur’ānic elements. Affifi, II, 48.

⁵ Ibn al-‘Arabī seems to say that since the human being reflects God, he shares with Him the attribute of elevation.

⁶ In keeping with his doctrine of conjoining of contraries, our author says that God is both with the humans and is not with them, just as He is both the external and the internal, the first and the last, and so on.

Among the most wonderful things is that the human being, I mean the perfect human being, is the most elevated existent. Elevation is attached to him only through his relationship to a place, or to a grade, that is, status. His elevation does not derive from his essence (li-dhātihī). He is elevated because of the elevation of place and grade. Elevation derives from both (place and grade). For example, the elevation of place (76) (is attested in Qurʾān 20:5), “The Merciful sat Himself upon the Throne,” which is the highest place. (Concerning) the elevation of status (God said): “Everything perishes except for His face” (Qurʾān 28:88) and “All things return to Him” (Qurʾān 11:123) (and) “Is there a god with God?” (Qurʾān 27:60). When God said: “We raised him to an elevated (ʿaliyyan) place” (Qurʾān 19:57), He made ʿaliyyan an adjective of a place. (And when He said): “When your Lord said to the angels, ‘I am appointing a vicegerent on earth’” (Qurʾān 2:30), He meant the elevation of status. And He said regarding the angels: “Are you (the Devil) proud or are you among the elevated?” (Qurʾān 38:75), thus He ascribed elevation to the angels. If elevation were ascribed to them because of their being angels, then all angels would be elevated. Since God does not generalize, although all the angels share the definition of angels, we know that, according to God, this is an elevation of status. Likewise, if the elevation of the vicegerents (Caliphs) among people were an essential attribute, every human being would share this (attribute). However, since He does not generalize, we know that this elevation derives from status.

The Elevated (al-ʿaliyy) is one of His Most Beautiful Names. (However), elevated above whom, when only He exists? Thus, He is the Elevated by virtue of His Essence.⁷ From where did He take (this elevation),⁸ when only He exists? Thus, again, His elevation is by virtue of His Essence. With respect to existence, He is the Essence of the existents. What we call contingent beings (muḥdathāt)⁹ are elevated by virtue of themselves, because they are (actually) His (manifestation), for He is not elevated in a relative (but in an essential) way. That is because the fixed entities (al-aʿyān al-thābita), which never exist in a concrete form or (even) smell the odor of existence, remain in their state (of absence) despite the multiplicity of the existent forms.¹⁰ There exists One Essence from which all the concrete things can be gathered and which permeates them all. The existence of multiplicity (of things) derives from God’s names, which are solely nonexistent relationships (and not concrete entities).¹¹ There is only the ʿayn, which is the Essence (of God). He is the Elevated by virtue of His Essence (li-naḥsihi),¹² not by virtue of any relationship. From this 7 Unlike the human being, whose essence does not elevate him.

8 Sharḥ, p. 77.

9 These are things that are brought into being in time.

10 The fixed entities are manifestations of God, and the concrete existents are in turn manifestations of the fixed entities, hence the concrete existents are elevated by virtue of themselves.

11 Ibn al-ʿArabī accepts the Muʿtazilite doctrine that God’s attributes are not entities existing in God’s essence. M. Takeshita, “An Analysis of Ibn ʿArabī’s Inshāʾ al-Dawāʾir with Particular Reference to the Doctrine of the Third Entity,” Journal of Near Eastern Studies 41, 4 (1982), p. 249.

12 To express the notion of essence, Ibn al-ʿArabī uses the words ʿayn, dhāt and naḥs. One should emphasize that for our author the Essence is devoid of any characteristic and hence ineffable. However, he is not consistent in this assertion, for in Futūḥāt, Vol. VII, point of view, there is no relative elevation in this world; however, the aspects of existence have different grades. Relative elevation exists in the Unique Essence when it is considered (manifesting) many aspects. For this reason, we say regarding Him that He is not He and you are not you.¹³

Al-Kharrāz¹⁴ (77), who is one of the Real's aspects and one of His tongues, refers to God's Self saying that God can be known only through His combination of opposites which determine His (nature).¹⁵ "He is the First and the Last, the Manifest and the Hidden" (Qur'ān 57:3). He is the Essence (ʿayn) of the manifest things and the Essence of the hidden things when they are manifest.¹⁶ Only He sees Himself, and nothing is hidden from Him. He is both Manifest and Hidden by virtue of¹⁷ His Essence (li-naḥsihi). He, Abū Saʿīd al-Kharrāz, and other created beings are called in this manner (of combination of the manifest and the hidden).

The hidden says "no" when the manifest says "I am (the manifest)," and when the hidden says "I (am the hidden)," the manifest says "no." (This situation) refers to each opposite (which negates the other), while the speaker and the listener are one and the same. The Prophet says: "What they told themselves,"¹⁸ (meaning) they are the tellers, the listeners and those who know what was told. The essence is one, while the aspects are many. There is no way to escape this knowledge, for every person knows this of himself, and this is the form of the Real.¹⁹

(Without counting) things are not in order. (Hence) numbers appear through (adding) "one" (wāḥid) to each number in a known arrangement. The "one" brings the number into existence, and the "one" divides the number.²⁰ The number appears only through that which is countable (maʿdūd).²¹ The countable can be either absent or existent: a thing may be absent with respect to the senses, but existent with respect to the intellect. In sum, there must be a number and that which is countable, just as there must be "one" which creates the number and the number is increased by it. Each grade of number is a single reality, such as nine or ten, down

p. 13 (the beginning of ch. 406), he says that contrary to the attributes All-Mighty, the Creator, etc., the attributes of "being in no need and glory belongs to the Essence" (al-ghinā wa-l-ʿizza li-l-dhāt).

¹³ God as considered in terms of Essence is not God as considered in terms of attributes.

¹⁴ Died 899. On Al-Kharrāz as seen by Ibn al-ʿArabī, see my Ibn al-ʿArabī and the Sufis, pp. 63–67.

¹⁵ One may judge God's activity only through being aware of His being the conjoining of opposites. Cf. Ibn al-ʿArabī, Kitāb al-tajalliyāt, Rasāʾil, II, p. 40.

¹⁶ That is because God's existence pervades all existents, both the manifest and the hidden; in other words, there is no difference in His relationship to the existents.

¹⁷ Ibn al-ʿArabī here uses two particles li and ʿan to denote "by virtue of."

¹⁸ Or "what their souls told." Bukhārī, II:15.

¹⁹ Just as God is one entity, but has many attributes, so the human being shares this principle.

²⁰ Read wa-faṣṣala al-wāḥid al-ʿadad. He means to say that the number is the combination of many ones.

²¹ Read bi-l-maʿdūd, in keeping with Sharḥ, p. 80, meaning that not all things are countable.

to the lowest number and up to the highest infinitely. These numbers are not a sum (of particulars), but rather they are called a collection of ones (jam' al-āḥād).²²

(78) That is because the number two and the number three are unique realities, and so on, even if they (the numbers that follow) are combined from ones. However, the essences (of each number) differ from each other. The combination (of ones) characterizes all numbers; the combination speaks of them (ones) and through them determines²³ (their place). In this speech (of the combination) there are twenty grades²⁴ which are combined from ones. You can continue to affirm the reality of the number which you negate, because of its essence.²⁵

Whoever knows that which we have established regarding the numbers, namely, that their negation is their very affirmation, knows that the transcendent Real is the same as the immanent created thing, even though the created differs from the Creator. The statements that the Creator is like the created and the created is like the Creator refer to One Essence ('ayn wāḥida).²⁶ All this derives from One Essence. Furthermore, it is (simultaneously) One Essence and many essences. ("When the boy was old enough to work with his father, Ibrāhīm said: 'My son, I have seen myself sacrificing you in a dream.) What do you think?' He said: 'Father, do as you are commanded . . .'" (Qur'ān 37:102 trans. AH). And the son is identical to his father. Thus, he (Ibrāhīm) saw that he would sacrifice only himself. He ransomed him "with a mighty sacrifice" (ibid.: 107),²⁷ so that what had appeared in a human form appeared as a ram. (Furthermore), he who was the essence of a father appeared in the form of a boy, nay, as a real boy.²⁸

"He created from Ādam his mate" (Qur'ān 4:1), so (Ādam) married only himself. Hence, from Ādam (came forth) his mate and child, (however, although they are three) in number, they are one in essence.

What is nature and what emerges from it? We observe that nature does not diminish, because of that which comes forth from it, nor increase because of that which does not come forth. Nature is only that which appears from it, (however) nature does not constitute the essence of the manifest things, for many forms characterize it. (For example), there exists a thing which is cold and dry and another hot and dry. Their common denominator is dryness, but they are different regarding temperature. What joins them is nature, nay, it is the natural essence. Thus, the world of nature can be seen as many forms in one mirror, nay, a single form in many mirrors.²⁹

²² Here Ibn al-ʿArabī reiterates the notion that an entity is one from one point of view and many from another. Thus, opposites exist in one and the same entity.

²³ Read yaqūlu and yaḥkumu, respectively. Sharḥ, pp. 80f.

²⁴ They are: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 20, 30, 40, 50, 60, 70, 80, 90, 100, and 1000.

²⁵ The essence of a number is its being composed of ones.

²⁶ This phrase can also be rendered "One Entity." SDG, p. 72.

²⁷ The Qur'ān reads: "We ransomed him" (fadaynāhu).

²⁸ Ibn al-ʿArabī speaks of three forms of one entity.

²⁹ Again, all depends on the observer's point of view. From one point of view, nature serves as a mirror of all things, meaning that all things are reflected in nature, or nature embraces all things; but from another point of view, nature pervades all things, meaning it is an essential element of all things or it is reflected in everything.

(This can bring about) perplexity because of the differences in perspective. However, whoever knows what we have said does not become perplexed. If (79) his knowledge increases, it is only through the aspect of the substrate (ḥukm al-maḥall), because the substrate is the basis of the fixed entity.³⁰ In the substrates, God's manifestations and all their aspects are diversified, and the substrate can receive every aspect. One can judge God's manifestation only through the substrate in which He is manifested. And this is the only (explanation of the structure of the world).

The Real from one aspect is creation, so think about (it)/but from another aspect He is not, so take (it) into consideration;

Whoever knows what I have said, his insight will not leave (him)/and only whoever perceives knows this;

The essence, whether combination or separation is one/yet (either way) it is multiplicity, not remaining or leaving.

The Elevated by virtue of Himself is He who possesses perfection through which He encompasses all the existents and nonexistent relationships in such a way that no trait of them escapes Him, whether (these) traits are praiseworthy or blameworthy from the point of view of custom, intellect or religion. This applies only to the name God (Allāh). As for other names (of the Divine), they are either God's manifestations (majlan)³¹ or a form in a manifestation. If they are manifestations, there necessarily exists a priority among them,³² and if it is a form in a manifestation, then this form is the essential perfection, because it is the essence of what is manifest in a certain entity.³³ That which pertains to the name Allāh pertains to this form.³⁴ We do not say that the names are He, nor are they other than He.³⁵

In his book Khal' (al-na'layn), Abū al-Qāsim ibn Qasī³⁶ points to this (principle), saying that every divine name is designated by all the divine names and depicted by them. That is because every name indicates both the Essence and the unique aspect toward which it is directed, and this name seeks for this aspect.³⁷ From the point of view of its indication of the Essence, it possesses all the names, while from the point of view of its indication of its unique aspect,

³¹ For this word, see Su'ād al-Ḥakīm, p. 268.

³² For example, God's mercy overcomes His anger.

³³ Possibly by this form Ibn al-ʿArabī means the Perfect Human Being.

³⁴ All God's names are included in the name Allāh, so this form (the Perfect Human Being) contains all God's names.

³⁵ See ch. 2, n. 19.

it is distinguished from others, for example, the Lord, the Creator, the Former (muşawwir), and so on. Thus, from the perspective of the Essence, the name and the named are identical, (80) while from the perspective of the meaning to which the name is directed they are different.

If you understand that the Elevated is that which we have mentioned, you know that (His) elevation is neither of place nor of position. That is, because the elevation of position pertains only to leaders, such as sultans, governors, ministers, judges and every holder of office whether they are qualified for this office or not. Elevation by virtue of attributes is not like this, for the one who holds the office of a governor may have dominion over the most knowledgeable person, even if the former is the most ignorant person. The governor is elevated in position, because of his office, and not because of his own attributes. If the governor is dismissed from his office, his high standing will disappear, while the knowledgeable person does not lose his high standing.

5 The bezel of the wisdom of excessive love exists in the essence of Abraham

(80) Abraham is called *al-khalīl*¹ because he pervades and encompasses all the (attributes) through which the Divine Essence is described.² A poet said: “You (God) permeated (takhalalta) me just as the spirit permeated my body³/because of this permeation he (Abraham) was named al-khalīl.”

It is just as the color permeates the colored; in such a way the accident (‘araḍ) pervades the substrate. It is not the relationship between a place and that which is placed on it.⁴ Or Abraham was so called because the Real permeates his form. Every aspect (ḥukm) (of permeation) is valid, for every aspect has its place through which it is manifest and beyond which it is not manifest. Do you not understand that the Real is manifest through the attributes of the created things, (including) attributes of deficiency and blame, and He informs this about Himself? Do you not understand that the created being is manifest through the Real’s attributes from first to last, all of which are appropriate to it, just as the attributes of the created things (81) are appropriate to the Real? (The words) “Praise belongs to God” (Qur’ān 1:1) (mean) that the effects of praise, whether they relate to the praiser or the one praised, go back to God. “And all things return to Him” (Qur’ān 11:123) (means) that He embraces (in Himself) the blameworthy and the praiseworthy and that there is no (other) alternative – only the blamed and the praised.⁵

Know that a thing permeates another only when it is immersed in the latter (maḥmūl fīhi).⁶ That which permeates (another is called) the active participle (ism al-fā’il) and it is veiled by that which is permeated, the passive participle (ism

1 This word means “the friend of God”; however, Ibn al-‘Arabī understands this name in a different way.

2 From this point of view Abraham is also the Perfect Human Being, in that all the divine attributes exist in him. Affifi, II, p. 57.

3 Sharḥ, p. 85.

4 In the last possibility we are speaking about two separate entities, the place and the thing which is put on it, but, contrary to the sample of color, the thing placed does not become a part of the place.

5 According to the Qur’ān’s commentators, this verse conveys the idea that God knows all the human beings’ acts and He will reward them or punish them in the Hereafter for their deeds. See, for example, Ibn Kathīr, Tafsīr al-qur’ān al-aẓīm, Vol. III, p. 588.

6 In logic maḥmūl signifies the predicate. Ibn Sīnā, Al-Shifā’, index.

al-maʿfūl).⁷ The passive participle is manifest and the active participle is hidden and concealed. The latter is nourishment for the former, like water permeating a piece of wool and thus making it grow and expand. If the Real is the manifest, then the created (human being) is hidden in Him, and as a result the created (embraces) all the names of the Real, His hearing, seeing, all His relationships and perceptions. If the created is the manifest, the Real is concealed and hidden in him; the Real, then, is the hearing of the created, his seeing, hand, foot and all his faculties, as referred to in the correct tradition.⁸

Moreover, if these relationships were removed from the Essence, it would not be Divinity (ilāh).⁹ Our (fixed) entities (aʿyānunā) bring into being these relationships; because God exists in us (maʿlūhiyatunā),¹⁰ we make Him God. Consequently, He is not known till we know Him (as God). He (Muḥammad) said: “Whoever knows himself knows his Lord.”¹¹ And he (Muḥammad) best knows God. Some scholars, including Abū Ḥāmid (al-Ghazālī, d. 1111), claimed that God can be known without observing the cosmos, which is a fault.¹² Indeed, an eternal essence can be known; however, that this entity is god (ilāh)¹³ can be known only after gaining knowledge of the objects dependent on this entity (al-maʿlūh). These objects are the indication (dalīl) of this entity.

Then, after that, in a second state, revelation grants you (the knowledge) that the Real Himself is the very indication of Himself and His Divinity, that the cosmos is nothing but His self-disclosure in the forms of the fixed entities (aʿyān thābita) whose existence is impossible without Him, and that He is manifest through various forms according to the realities of these entities and their states. This (is known) after we know (82) that He is our god. Then comes the final revelation through which our forms are disclosed in Him; some of us are disclosed to each other in the Real, and some of us know each other and are different from each other. Some of us know that God knows us through us, and some others do not know that in this Presence (ḥaḍra – God) there is knowledge (produced) by us. “I seek refuge in God, lest I be one of the ignorant” (Qurʾān 2:67). Only through these two revelations¹⁴ does God determine (our states) through us, nay, rather we determine (our states) through us, yet in Him. For this reason God said: “God has the conclusive argument” (Qurʾān 6:149). (God means the conclusive argument) against the veiled, for they said to the Real: “Why have You done things to us which did not coincide with our aims?”¹⁵ He made their affair difficult for them.¹⁶ The gnostics disclosed this matter and knew that the Real has not done to them what they claimed He did, and that this grave thing derived from them, for He only taught them their own states, hence their argument was refuted and God’s conclusive argument remained (valid).

If you ask what can we learn from His saying: “If He had willed, He would have guided all of you” (ibid.), we shall say: “In the phrase ‘if He had willed’ the word ‘if’ indicates an impossibility because of another impossibility¹⁷ (imtinā’ li-imtinā’), for God only wills the thing as it really is.¹⁸ According to reason, the possible thing in definition can receive a trait or its opposite;¹⁹ however, what determines which trait of the two reasonable possible traits will exist depends on what was already established in the fixed entity. The meaning of “He would have guided you” is “He would have explained to you” (your hidden state). God does not open the insight of every possible individual to perceive things as they really are. Among people there are knowers and ignoramuses. God does not will and He will not will, hence He cannot guide them all. Likewise, (if we say) “if He wills,” (we can ask) does He will that which cannot be? His will has a single connection, which constitutes a relationship to knowledge which in turn is connected to a known object, and the known object (83) is you and your states. Knowledge has no effect on the object of knowledge, but rather the object of knowledge affects knowledge and gives to knowledge from itself its true state.

The Divine Address comes only in accordance with the agreement of those addressed and with what rational observation conveys. It does not come in accordance with unveiling. For this reason, believers are many, and gnostics, the people of unveiling, are few. “There are none of us, but have a known place” (Qur’ān 37:164), meaning through the personality you have in your fixed entity you will appear in (concrete existence), on condition that your existence will be affirmed. If it is affirmed that existence belongs to the Real, not to you, then you are undoubtedly determined in the existence of the Real. If it is affirmed that you are existent, then you are undoubtedly determined as a real existent. If the Real determines (your existence), He should only pour existence upon you, and as a result, you determine yourself.²⁰ Hence, you should praise or blame only yourself. What remains for the ¹⁵ The text has “their aims,” which does not fit the meaning of the sentence.

¹⁷ This is a hypothetical clause which indicates that there is no possibility of the existence of the conditioned instance.

¹⁹ A tree, for example, can be existent or nonexistent.

²⁰ The human personality and traits are determined by the fixed entities, the ideas which reside in God’s thought. When God bestows on these entities existence, they become

Real is only the praise of pouring forth existence, because this belongs to Him, not to you. You supply the Real (literally: feed Him) with determinations, while He supplies you with existence. What is allocated to Him is allocated to you. Thus, all things (literally: the affair, al-amr) derive from Him to you, and from you to Him. However, you are called obliged (mukallaf), and He obliges you only through your saying to Him “oblige me through your true state.” Hence He is not obliged.²¹

He praises me and I praise Him/He worships me and I worship Him

In (my) state (of existence) I affirm Him/but regarding the (fixed) entities I deny Him

For this reason, the Real created me/for I make Him know and thus bring Him into existence²³

A tradition²⁴ tells us this/and in me His aim is realized

(84) Since al-Khalīl attained this grade, because of which he was called al-Khalīl, he established hospitality as a rule, and Ibn Masarra²⁵ put him with Mikā’il (as sponsors) of the means of subsistence. By the means of subsistence people are fed. When the means of subsistence permeate the one who is fed in such a way that every part of the fed person is permeated, food spreads in all the parts of the fed person. (However, regarding God) there are no parts (in Him), hence He necessarily permeates all the Divine Stations which are called names, so that His Essence is manifest through them.

We belong to Him as signs in us/show this, but we (also) belong to ourselves

He has only my being (to manifest Himself)/for we belong to Him just as we belong to ourselves existents in the concrete world. Thus, in the phase of giving existence, the structure of the human being was already determined and cannot change. It is as if the human being determines his own structure, while actually God determines it in His thought.

²¹ The human being is obliged through the hidden principles imprinted in his fixed entity. Here arises a theological problem of God’s being obliged to act according to a previous plan. Although Ibn al-‘Arabī states that God is not obliged, He is obliged by His own determinations.

²² God sees His attributes only in creation, thus He is dependent on the cosmos.

²³ God receives knowledge from the human being who reflects His attributes, and so in this respect the human bestows existence on God.

²⁴ According to al-Kāshānī (p. 199), the tradition is: “They have represented me (as a figure standing) before their eyes” (qad maththalūni bayna a’yūnihim). Trans. by Affifi, Mystical Philosophy, p. 13, n. 1.

⁴ Ibn al-ʿArabī is going to explain the order of all things in nature.

⁶ Sahl al-Tustarī, died 896. Abrahamov, Ibn al-ʿArabī and the Sufis, pp. 53–62.

⁷ Very probably Ibn al-ʿArabī regards iḥsān as higher than īmān, according to Qur'ān 5:93. Al-Kāshānī, p. 208. Since the definition of iḥsān is "worship God as if you see Him" (Fuṣūṣ, p. 123; SPK, p. 401, n. 24), the commentators of the Fuṣūṣ extended this meaning to include witnessing. Al-Kāshānī, p. 208.

Do not pay attention to a view contrary to our view/or sow seeds in blind soil⁸

They are the deaf and the dumb⁹ whom/the infallible (Muḥammad) brought to our notice in the text of the Qurʾān Know, may God bestow on us and on you revelation, that Ibrāhīm al-Khalīl said to his son: “My son, I have seen myself sacrificing you in a dream” (Qurʾān 37:102). The dream is on the plane of imagination, and so he did not interpret the dream. A ram in the form of Abraham’s son appeared in the dream, and Abraham believed that what he saw in the dream was true. His Lord ransomed Abraham’s son from the false imagination of his father by the great sacrifice,¹⁰ which means the interpretation of his dream in the eyes of God, while he (Abraham) was unaware.

The disclosure of a form on the plane of imagination requires another science (ʿilm)¹¹ through which one can perceive what God means by this form. Do you not consider what God’s Messenger said to Abū Bakr on his interpretation of a dream: “You were right in part but also partly wrong”?¹² Abū Bakr asked Muḥammad to tell him where he was right and where he was wrong, but the Prophet did not answer. God said to Abraham when He called him: “O Abraham, you believed that the dream is true” (ibid. 105). He did not say to him you believed that he is your son in the dream, because Abraham did not interpret the dream, but accepted the manifest form of what he saw.¹³ However, dreams (86) require interpretation. For this reason, the King of Egypt (al-ʿazīz: literally: the Powerful) said (addressing his courtiers): “If you can interpret (taʿburūn) the dream” (Qurʾān 12:43). The meaning of interpretation (taʿbīr) is to pass from the form one sees to something else. The cows were (symbols) of years of barrenness and plenty.

If Abraham had been right in understanding his dream, he would have slaughtered his son. However, he truly saw his son (in the dream), whereas in God’s eyes it was the Great Sacrifice in the form of his son. God ransomed him because of Abraham’s thought; in God’s eyes it was not a real ransom (the ransom was the ram). His sense perception produced the sacrifice, while his imagination produced his son. If he had seen the ram in his imagination, he would have interpreted it as his son or something else. Then God said: “Indeed, this is a clear test” (Qurʾān 37:106), that is, a clear and manifest trial of knowledge: would he know what the interpretation of the dream required or not? He knew that imagination required interpretation. However, he did not take into consideration what this realm of dreams implied. For this reason, he regarded the dream as true, just as did Taqī ibn Mukhallad,¹⁴ the imam and the author of a Musnad. He heard in a tradition which he approved that the Prophet said:

⁸ Do not teach those who have not the disposition of learning. Kāshānī, p. 208.

⁹ Qurʾān 8:22–23.

¹⁰ Qurʾān 37:107.

¹¹ This is the science of interpretation of dreams (taʿbīr al-ruʾyā).

¹² For the dream, see Kāshānī, pp. 209f.

¹³ Abraham saw in the dream that he would sacrifice his son. However, he should have interpreted this vision to know the truth, but he did not do so. Therefore, he understood he had to sacrifice his son.

¹⁴ An Andalusian traditionist (d. 276/889).

“Whoever sees me in sleep has seen me in waking, for the Devil cannot assimilate my form.”¹⁵ In this dream Taqī ibn Mukhallad saw the Prophet, who gave him milk to drink. Taqī ibn Mukhallad regarded the dream as true; he drank and then vomited the milk. Had he interpreted the dream, this milk would have been knowledge. God deprived him much knowledge according to the measure of his drinking. Do you not see that (when) the Messenger of God was given a cup of milk in a dream he said: “I drank the milk until I was completely satiated (literally: until satiety came out of my fingernails), and then gave the remainder to ‘Umar”?’¹⁶ The Prophet was asked: “What is your interpretation, O God’s Messenger?” He said: “Knowledge.” He did not leave it as milk, (that is) in the (87) form of what he saw, because he knew it was a dream that required interpretation.

It is well known that the form of the Prophet, which was seen by the sense (of sight), is buried in al-Madīna, and that the form of his spirit and his rational soul (laṭīfā)¹⁷ has not been seen by anyone through (the form) of anyone else or through (the form) of oneself. Each spirit must be regarded as such. The spirit of the Prophet appears to one in a dream in the form of his body when he died, without the body being damaged at all. It is Muḥammad who is seen through his spirit in a bodily form which resembles his buried form. The Devil cannot assume the form of Muḥammad’s body, for God protects the one who sees him. For this reason, whoever sees Muḥammad in this form will learn from him all that he orders or prohibits, or tells him, just as he could learn from the Prophet in this world the laws in keeping with the sayings which point to these laws, namely, (laws written) in texts, through plain or general meanings or through whatever form. If he (the Prophet) gives him something, this thing may be interpreted. If, (however), knowledge through the senses equals knowledge through the imagination, this dream does not need interpretation.¹⁸ Through and on the basis of this criterion Abraham and Taqī ibn Mukhallad dealt with their dreams.

Since the dream has two aspects,¹⁹ and since God has taught us what He did regarding Abraham and what He said to him – because this is the manner befitting the grade of prophecy – we know (the following): In our vision of the Real in a form which the rational argument rejects, we should interpret this form in a way appropriate to religion, (that is), in terms of who the seer is, or the place where the Real was seen, or both. If rational argument does not reject (the form we saw), we shall leave this form as it was seen, in the same form as we shall see the Real in the world to come.²⁰

¹⁷ Al-Jurjānī, Kitāb al-ta’rīfāt, pp. 202, 289.

¹⁸ According to this criterion, Abraham’s conduct is right, because the form he saw in his dream, that is, in his imagination, was Isaac, and his perception of Isaac in his dream matches his perception of him through the sense of sight in the concrete existence, therefore he did not interpret his dream.

¹⁹ That is, the sensual and the imaginal perceptions.

²⁰ This system of interpreting Qur’ānic verses whose literal meaning cannot be accepted by reason is reminiscent of al-Ash‘arī’s way to deal with such verses. Al-Ash‘arī, Al-Idāra ‘an usūl al-diyāna, Dār al-Ṭibā‘a al-Muniriyya, Cairo n.d., p. 13 (the chapter on the seeing of God).

(88) The One, the Merciful, has in every domain²¹/hidden and manifest forms

Abū Yazīd said concerning this station: If the Throne and that which it contains – multiplied a hundred millions times – were (to dwell) in one of the corners of the gnostic's heart, he would not feel them.²² This is the ability of Abū Yazīd in the world of bodies. Moreover, I say that if the infinite existence was assessed as finite with the Essence which brought it into existence (and these found their abode) in one of the corners of the gnostic's heart, he would not perceive them in his knowledge. Hence, it is proved that the heart contains the Real, and notwithstanding, it is not shown as satiated. If it were filled, said Abū Yazīd, it would be satiated. We note this station, saying:

O He who creates things in Himself/You encompass what you create

You create the infinite being within You/even as You are the Limited and the Vast

If the creation of God were in my heart/its luminous dawn would not appear (there)

Whoever comprises the Real, cannot be confined/to (comprise) creation; What is your opinion O Listener

Through the power of fancy every human being creates in his faculty of imagination that which has existence only in this faculty.²³ This is the general matter. The gnostic creates through spiritual aspiration (himma)²⁴ that which has existence outside the substrate of his spiritual aspiration; however, this aspiration does not cease to preserve its object. Its preservation, that is, the preservation of that which it created, does not weary this faculty.²⁵ When the gnostic does not pay attention (89) to the preservation of this created entity, it disappears, unless the gnostic masters all his domains²⁶ (ḥaḍarāt) and does not become heedless at all, because he witnesses at least one domain. When the gnostic through his spiritual aspiration creates, possessing this mastership, that which he created, this creation ²¹ Ibn al-ʿArabī uses this word (mawṭin) to denote “domain.” Thus, there exists the domain of reason, the domain of imagination, the domain of this world, etc. I prefer to translate mawṭin as “domain” (in SDG, p. 46, it is homestead), because it has the double meaning of spiritual and physical spheres.

²² Abrahamov, Ibn al-ʿArabī and the Sufis, pp. 46f.

²³ This sentence is awkward in Arabic. Using two terms (wahm and khayāl), Ibn al-ʿArabī repeats the power of imagination twice without any need. He seems to say that the human being creates in his imagination, or using it, forms which are appropriate only to this faculty.

²⁴ See above, p. 14, n. 4.

appears in his form in every domain; the forms become preserved by each other. As a result, when the gnostic does not pay attention to a certain domain, or to some domains, while witnessing one of the domains and preserving in it the form of his creation, all the forms are preserved through his preservation of this single form in the domain which he heeds. That is because heedlessness is never absolute, neither regarding all the domains, nor regarding a single domain.

Here I have revealed a mystery which the people of God have always jealously concealed, because this mystery refutes their claim that they are the Real. However, the Real is always attentive, while the servant does not escape inattentiveness to something. From the point of view of preserving what he created, the gnostic may say: "I am the Real" (anā al-ḥaqq).²⁷ However, his preservation of his creation is not like God's, and we have already clarified the difference. The servant is different from the Real, given his heedlessness of a form and its domain. He must be distinct from the Real, notwithstanding his continuing preservation of all the forms through the preservation of one form in the domain to which he pays heed. This is preservation through a guaranty,²⁸ while God's preservation of what He created is not like this, for it is a preservation of each form specifically.

As I have been told, no one has written ever before on this question in a book, neither I nor others, except in this book, hence it (the question) is extraordinary and unique. Consequently, beware of being inattentive to this question, for the remaining domain, which still you dwell within, with the form, is like the Book in which God said: "We have left nothing out unwritten in the Book" (Qur'ān 6:38), for the Book comprises the past and future events. Only he who has the faculty of combination (qur'ān) (all the presences)²⁹ in his soul knows what we have said (90), for whoever fears God, "God will give him the faculty of separation" (furqān between the Real and the creation).³⁰ This is similar to what we have pointed out regarding this question of the device through which the servant is distinct from the Lord. This faculty of separation is the loftiest faculty of separation.

At one time the servant is a lord without a doubt/and at another he is really a servant without a lie

If he is a servant, he encompasses the Real/and if he is a lord, he is in a poor state

Through his being a servant, he beholds the essence of his self/and with no doubt hopes overflow from him

Through his being a lord, he beholds the whole of creation/making demands on him through the domain of Ownership and Kingdom

Because of his essence he cannot answer their demands/for this reason you see some gnostics weeping

So be a servant of a lord and not a lord of his servant lest you fall, melting in the Fire.

²⁷ This is the famous saying of al-Hallāj. Ibn al-ʿArabī remains faithful to his principle that the human being resembles God in certain aspects.

²⁸ That is, the preservation of one form in a single domain guarantees the preservation in all other domains.

²⁹ This is the perfect human being. Kāshānī, p. 218.

³⁰ Kāshānī, p. 218.

7 The bezel of the wisdom of loftiness¹ exists in the essence of Ishmael

Know that the (entity) called (musammā) God is one with respect to essence and all with respect to names. Each existent has from God only a single lord, and it is inconceivable for it to have all the lords.² As for God's Unity (aḥadiyya), no single entity enters it, for one cannot call part of it a thing and another a thing, for it does not admit division.³ However, His Unity is the totality of His attributes in potentiality.

The happy person is the one whose Lord is pleased with him,⁴ and there is none but that who is pleasing in the eyes of his Lord, because Lordship applies to everyone, hence the Lord finds everyone pleasing, and so everyone is happy.⁵ For this reason Sahl⁶ said: Lordship has a mystery – and it is you, ergo Sahl's saying refers to every entity – if it had disappeared, (91) the Lordship would also have been cancelled. The words “if it had disappeared” signify the impossibility of the impossibility (imtināʿ al-imtināʿ),⁷ for the condition will not appear and hence the Lordship will not be annulled, because an entity is existent only through its lord. Since an entity is always existent, its Lordship will never be cancelled.

Every pleasing thing is beloved, and all that the beloved person does is beloved. All is pleasing, for any entity does not act at all, but God alone acts in it. Any entity is safe from ascription of an act to it, hence it is pleased with that which appears in it and from it, that is, God's acts. These acts are pleasing, for every doer

² Since each existent is the embodiment of a fixed entity, which in turn is a form of a specific name, the existent is a servant of a specific name.

⁴ In these words Qurʾān 19:55 refers specifically to Ishmael.

⁵ Every individual is under the control of a divine name which serves as his lord. SPK, p. 55.

⁶ Ch. 6, n. 6, above.

or maker is pleased with his acts, and if He carries out his acts perfectly, it will be appropriate to say of Him: “He gave everything its (measure of) creation then guided (it)” (Qur’ān 20:50),⁸ meaning God clarified that He gave everything that which fits it without decrease or increase.⁹

Since Ishmael discovered what we have mentioned, he was pleasing to God.¹⁰ In like manner, every existent is pleasing to his lord. If every existent is pleasing to his lord, as we have explained, it is not necessary that it be pleasing to a lord of another servant, for he took the lordship only from one lord, not from many.¹¹ What was established for him from all the lords is only that which fits him, and this (what is suited to him) is his lord. No one takes from God (something) which relates to His Unity (aḥadiyya).¹² For this reason, the People of God were prevented from the manifestation of God’s Unity. That is because if you look at Him through Him, it is He who looks at Himself, and He always looks at Himself through Himself. And if you look at Him through yourself, His Unity disappears through yourself. (And), if you look at Him through Himself and through yourself, Unity also disappears. For the pronoun tā’ in naẓartahu (you look) is not the essence of that which you look at (‘ayn al-manẓūr), hence there is necessarily a relationship which requires two entities, the one who looks (nāẓir) and the one who is looked at (manẓūr). Consequently, Unity disappears, even if (God) sees Himself through Himself. It is well known that in this description He is both the observer and the observed.¹³

The pleasing person will be absolutely pleasing only when all things through which he is manifest originate (92) in the action of the one who is pleased with him. Ishmael excels others, for the Real qualified him as pleasing to Him. In like manner it is said to every tranquil soul, “Return to your Lord” (Qur’ān 89:28). God ordered the soul to return only to its Lord who called it and it knows Him from other lords as “pleased and pleasing” (ibid.). (And God said to the soul) “Enter among My servants” (ibid., 29), because they possess this station. Every servant among those mentioned here knows his lord, confining himself to this knowledge without looking at the lord of another, notwithstanding the Unity of the Essence. This is necessarily so. “And enter into My Garden” (jannatī)¹⁴ (ibid., 30) which is My place of concealment. My place of concealment is only You, and You

8 This verse is the basis of the theory taḥqīq, that is, one’s realization that every entity is formed and acts according to the appropriate manner which was decreed by God in its fixed entity (‘ayn thābita). SDG, p. 96.

9 One should note that according to Ibn al-‘Arabī also the feeling of being satisfied with God’s acts comes from God, otherwise Ibn al-‘Arabī would have stated that perceptions and feelings belong to the human being alone.

10 Qur’ān 19:55.

11 Read: mā akhadha al-rubūbiyya illā min wāḥid lā min kull.

12 For this term, see the title of ch. 10.

13 When we speak of God’s Unity, we cannot deal with it in terms of duality, even if this duality exists in God’s Essence. His Unity excludes any form of duality.

14 The verb janna means “he covered or concealed,” hence janna may be rendered cover, veil, or place of concealment.

conceal me through Your Essence. I am known only through You, just as You are not (manifest) only through me. Whoever knows You knows me, and I am not known through (another), (just as) You are not known through (another, but through me). When you enter into His place of concealment, you enter into yourself, then you know yourself with another knowledge which is different from the knowledge of yourself when you know your Lord through your knowledge of yourself. As a result, you possess two kinds of knowledge: knowledge of Him through yourself, and knowledge of Him through yourself, with respect to Him, not to you.¹⁵

You are the servant and you are the lord/of the one you are his servant

You are the lord and you are the servant/of the one who possesses your covenant in His address (to you)¹⁶

Every contract to which one is committed/can be dissolved by someone else¹⁷

God is pleased with his servants and they are pleasing. They are pleased with Him and He is pleasing. The two presences (servanthood and lordship) face each other like similar things, because there is no distinction between the two kinds. (However), similar things are opposites, for the two similar things do not join.¹⁸ There is only the one which is distinct and the one which is similar. (Actually), there is neither a similar thing in existence, nor an opposite thing, for existence is one reality (ḥaqīqa wāḥida), and a thing does not oppose itself.

Only the Real remains, no other being/there is no connected thing, and there is no separated thing¹⁹

The seeing of the eyes proves this and I do not see/when I see but His Essence “This is for one who fears his Lord” (Qur’ān 98:8), lest he will be Him, because he knows the distinction (between the servant and the lord). What proves this to us is the fact that (some people) are ignorant of things (a’yān) in existence which the knower shows them. There is a distinction between servants and there is a distinction between lords. If there had been no distinction, a certain divine name would have been interpreted according to all its aspects in the same manner as another name is interpreted. The name the Strengtheners (al-mu’izz) is not interpreted in the same manner as the Debaser (al-mudhill), and so on. However, from the point of view of the Unity they are the same. As you say, every name is

¹⁶ This is an allusion to Qur’ān 7:172, in which all the human generations affirmed God’s Lordship.

¹⁷ That is because each creed expresses one’s speculation and investigation, and it is not characterized by an absolute truth. Hence, it can be replaced by another creed.

¹⁸ Here I changed the order of the sentence to make it coherent. According to the Greatest Master, things are similar to each other from certain points of view and opposite to each other from other points of view. However, with respect to the absolute unity of existence, there is no difference between the things.

¹⁹ All is one unity.

a proof of the Essence and of its reality with respect to its ipseity, for the named (al-musammā) is one and the Strengtheners is the Debaser with respect to the named. However, the Strengtheners is not the Debaser with respect to their own entities and realities, for our understanding of each of them is different.

Do not contemplate (only) the Real/(so that) you divest Him of creation

Do not contemplate (only) creation/(so that) you clothe it (in all things) except the Real

Make Him incomparable and comparable/and place yourself in the domain of truth

If you will, be in a state of joining²⁰/or in a state of separation

Then, if all²¹ is revealed to you/you will gain the greatest success

You will not pass away (in creation) nor remain (in the Real)/and you will not make others either pass away or remain

Revelation is not bestowed on you/and you do not grant revelation to others²²

Praise (for the people is carried out by God) through faithfulness to the promise (ṣidq al-waʿd) and not through faithfulness to the threat. The Divine Presence requires commendable praise through God's Essence. The Essence is praised through faithfulness to the promise and not through faithfulness to the threat, moreover, through overlooking (one's sins).²³ "Do not think (94) that God will break His promise to His Messengers" (Qur'ān 14:47). He does not say "His threat," but rather "We shall overlook their sins" (Qur'ān 46:16), although He made a threat regarding sins. He praised Ishmael, because he was faithful to his promise (ṣādiq al-waʿd).²⁴ Regarding the Real (in his praising of Ishmael), possibility disappears, because possibility requires a preponderant (murajjih).²⁵

Only the one who is faithful to his promise remains/while the Real's threat has no established essence

Even if they enter the abode of suffering/they have delight therein (and) pure happiness

There is happiness in the eternal gardens, for the matter is one²⁶/(only) when God is revealed there is a difference

Suffering (ʿadhāb) is so called because of its sweetness (ʿudhūba)/this is like a shell, and the shell protects (what is inside).

²⁰ Joining of transcendence and immanence.

²¹ Both the transcendent and the immanent aspects.

²² If the existence is one, it follows that revelation exists within everyone. Hence, revelation is not bestowed on anyone, nor given to anyone. Bursevi, Vol. II, p. 581.

²³ Qur'ān 46:16.

²⁴ Qur'ān 19:54.

²⁵ To decide between possible alternatives, one needs a preponderant which overwhelms all other alternatives, leaving only one choice that seems the best. Consequently, when a person carries out his promise, God is obliged to praise him.

²⁶ By this he means that all the phenomena are one, hence there is no difference from this point of view between Paradise and Hell.

8 The bezel of the wisdom of spirituality¹ exists in the essence of Jacob

(94) Religion is divided into two kinds: a. Religion according to God and according to whom the Real taught and those who taught others what the Real taught them; and b. Religion according to the created beings, which God acknowledges. God's religion is the one which God chose and granted it the highest degree above the human religion. God said: "Abraham ordered his sons (to submit to God), and so did Jacob, saying: 'My sons, God has chosen for you the religion (al-dīn), so do not die except in a state of submission to God (muslimūn)'" (Qur'ān 2:132), meaning obeying Him. (The word) al-dīn is marked with the definite particle (alif and lām) to designate a specific religion, hence this is a known religion (which is shown) in God's saying: "The religion according to God is Islam" (Qur'ān 3:19), meaning submission. Religion expresses your submission. That which comes from God is the Law to which you submit. Religion means submission and the rule (al-nāmūs) is the Law (al-shar') which God promulgated. Whoever is qualified as yielding to God's laws is the one who carries out the orders of the religion and maintains them, as one who performs the prayer.

The servant is one who maintains religion and the Real promulgates the laws. Hence, submission is the essence of your act, and religion (95) comes out of your act. You will not be happy except by way of that which comes from yourself. Just as your acts affirm (athbata) your happiness, so His acts, which are you and the created beings, affirm the Divine Names. Because of His effects (in the cosmos), He is called God (ilāh), and because of your effects (in yourself), you are called happy. When you observe (the commandments of) religion and obey His laws, He makes you equal to His rank. If God wills, I shall expound further on this issue in a beneficial way after explaining religion in the eyes of the created beings which God acknowledges.

Religion as a whole belongs to God and comes (with respect to implementation) from you, not from Him, except with respect to its origin.² God said: "They invented monasticism" (Qur'ān 57:27). (Their invention) refers to the wise laws;

¹ In keeping with al-Qūnawī's and Kāshānī's commentaries, I prefer ḥikma rūḥiyya to ḥikma rawḥiyya (wisdom of ease), although the latter possibility has a basis in Qur'ān 12:87. Chittick, "Chapter Headings," pp. 17f.

² That is because God is the origin of all things.

however, these were not brought to the people by the known Messenger through God in the customary way (that is, through prophecy). But as wisdom and plain interest in (these laws) coincide with Divine Judgment regarding the aim of Divine Law, God approved of (these human laws) just as He did of His Laws, (although) “We (God) did not prescribe (these laws) for them” (Qur’ān 57:27).³

Since⁴ God opened the door of His Providence and Mercy between Him and their hearts of which they were unaware, He established in their hearts the exaltation of the laws they had promulgated – through which they sought God’s satisfaction. They did so not in the usual and known prophetic way of divine teaching. Hence God said: “They did not keep their laws” (Qur’ān, ibid.), meaning those who established the laws which I (God) affirmed, “in a proper way, only to seek God’s satisfaction” (Qur’ān, ibid.). So they thought. “We gave those who believed,” in these laws, “among them their reward, (however) many of them” (Qur’ān, ibid.), meaning of those for whom this worship was established, “are sinners” (Qur’ān, ibid.), meaning they did not submit to these laws and did not keep them.

Whoever does not obey these laws, his legislator will not comply with what pleases him. However, the matter necessitates obedience, meaning the one under obligation (mukallaf) is either obedient through acceptance of the laws, or a transgressor. There is no need to talk about the one who obeys and accepts the laws, because this is obvious. As for the transgressor, his transgression which was determined for him by God requests either one of two things: disregard and forgiveness or rebuke (96) for what he did. One of these options should apply, because essentially the matter requires one of the two. Anyhow, it is correct (to say that) the Real submits to the servant’s acts and state. It is the state which affects (God’s reaction). From this (it is evident) that religion means requital (jazā’), meaning compensation for that which makes one happy or unhappy. As for that which makes one happy, God said: “God is pleased with them, and they with Him” (Qur’ān 5:119, trans. AH). This is a compensation that makes one happy. As for that which makes one unhappy, God said: “Whoever among you who does wrong, we shall make him taste a severe punishment” (Qur’ān 25:19). This is a compensation that does not make one happy. “We shall disregard their evil deeds” (Qur’ān 46:16) is (also) redress. Hence, it is correct (to say) that religion is compensation. That is because religion is islām and islām is essentially submission; God submits to what makes one happy or unhappy, which means compensation. This is the external aspect in this issue.

As for its mystery and internal aspect, it manifests itself in the mirror of the Real’s existence; the possible things receive from the Real only that which their essences give them in each state. For each state has a form. Their forms differ according to the differences in their states. Hence, the manifestation differs because of the difference in the state, and the effect on the servant occurs in accordance with what characterizes him. No one bestows on him good or evil except himself; only he bestows on his essence favors and sufferings. He should chastise and praise only himself. “To God belongs the conclusive argument” (Qur’ān 6:149) in his knowledge of them, for knowledge follows the object of knowledge.⁵ In an issue like this, the mystery that lies behind it is (the notion) that the possible things in principle are nonexistent. There is no existence but the existence of the Real (which is disclosed) through the forms of the states in which the possible things appear in themselves and in their (fixed) essences. Consequently, you know whoever experiences pleasure and whoever experiences pain and what follows (ya‘qubu) each state, because of which it is called following (‘uqūba) and consequence (‘iqāb).⁶ (This idea of following) is allowable in relation to both good and evil; however, convention calls the good – reward, and the evil – punishment. Because of this procedure religion may be called or explained as what returns (‘āda, usually: custom), for that which his state requires and seeks returns to him (‘āda ‘alayhi). Hence, religion is that which returns.⁷ The poet said: “As your religion with Umm al-Ḥuwayrith before” (97), meaning your custom.

The rational meaning of ‘āda is the return of the thing itself to its (previous) state. However, this is not the case here, for ‘āda means repetition. But ‘āda is an intelligible reality, and resemblance in forms exists. That is, because we know that Zayd is the same as ‘Amr with respect to humanity (insāniyya), but humanity does not repeat itself, for if it does, it will be multiplied; however, humanity is one reality that does not repeat itself. (Also) we know that Zayd is not the same as ‘Amr in terms of individual identity (shakhsiyya), for Zayd as an individual is not the same as ‘Amr, though we certainly know that the existence of individuality is shared by both. Through sense perception resemblance repeats itself; however, through true judgment resemblance does not repeat itself. From one point of view there is a repetition and from another there is not. In like manner, in one respect there is a reward, and in another there is not; that is because reward is a possible state. The scholars probing this issue did not pay attention to it; that is, they paid no attention to its explanation, not that they did not know it, because it belongs to the mystery of predetermination which governs the created beings.

Know that just as it is said of a physician that he is the servant of nature, so the Messengers and the Heirs are the servants of the Divine Command in general, and actually they are the servants of the states of the possible things.⁸ Their service is part of their states which have been established by their fixed entities. Consider what a marvelous thing this is! However, the servant, of whom we are

⁷ One’s states cause the human being to perform acts repeatedly, and this characterizes religion.

⁸ For the term amr (command), its role in the cosmological and terrestrial domains and its Ismā‘īlī origin, see Ebstein, “The Word of God,” pp. 44–50.

talking here, is restricted regarding saying and state by his lord's rules. It is correct to say that the physician is a servant of nature, only if he helps nature. That is because nature put in the body of the ill person a unique temperament (mizāj) because of which he is called an ill person. If the physician were to help nature through his service, he would also increase the measure of illness (98). He prevents nature (from worsening the illness) only in order to seek health – and health also belongs to nature – through introducing another temperament that opposes the present temperament. Hence, the physician is not a servant of nature (regarding all aspects); he only serves it through curing the ill person and changing his temperament by using nature itself. Regarding nature, he exerts efforts by using a particular, not a general aspect, because generality is not correct in such an issue. Hence, the physician is servant/not servant of nature, just as messengers and heirs are regarding the servitude of the Real.

In determining the states of those who are under obligation (mukallaḥ), the Real acts through two aspects: The servant acts in accordance with the requirements of the Real's will, and His will in turn is connected to what the Real's knowledge requires, and the Real's knowledge is connected to what the object of knowledge bestows on Him, that is, its essence, which appears only in its form.⁹

The Messenger and the Heir are servants of the divine command by way of the will (irāda);¹⁰ however, they are not servants of the will. He (the Messenger) refutes the divine command by way of the divine command seeking for the happiness of the person under obligation. If he were the servant of the divine will, he would not advise (people), or would advise (people) only through the divine will. The Messenger, the Heir, is the physician of the souls for the world to come. He obeys God's command when He commands him. He may observe His command and will and sees that God's command opposes His will, (knowing) that all things occur according to His will, and for this reason the command stands. If He wills the fulfillment of the command, it will be fulfilled, and if He does not will the fulfillment of what He commands, the person under obligation will not carry out the command, and this is called transgression and sin.

The messenger is a transmitter (of God's commands and sayings). For this reason he (Muḥammad) said: "Hūd and its sisters made me anxious" (literally: made my hair white),¹¹ because they (these sūras) contain God's saying: "So keep to the right course, as you have been commanded” (Qur’ān 11:112, trans. AH). (99) The words “as you have been commanded” made him anxious, because he did not know whether the command fitted His will and hence would be implemented, or opposed His Will, and hence would not be implemented. No one knows the way of the will (ḥukm al-irāda), until the object of the will occurs, except one to whom God has revealed his insight, and as a result he perceives the possible things as they really are in their states as fixed entities and thereupon he judges according to his insight. This may happen to a very few individuals in times of seclusion. (Consequently), the Prophet said: “I do not know what will be done with me or you” (Qur’ān 46:9, trans. AH). He (the Prophet) explicitly said of the veil (existing between God and the humans). The aim (of this verse) is to inform that the Prophet had knowledge only of some things, not all things.

⁹ God's knowledge is determined by the essence of the thing which is its fixed entity (ʿayn thābita). Thus, God is compelled to act in keeping with His knowledge, and has no free choice. SDG, pp. 186f. This is the logical conclusion of Ibn al-ʿArabī's ideas, although he says that free choice and compulsion do not apply to God. Our author seems to be inconsistent in his thought, because one cannot describe a series of cause-effect, that is, will, knowledge, the fixed entity, and then deny the consequence of one's thought, claiming that this procedure is irrelevant. Moreover, he asserts that God's choice is expressed in bestowing existence on the fixed entities. Thus, God has some kind of free choice. As in other issues in Ibn al-ʿArabī's teachings, God has and does not have free choice. Ibid. Another point worth noting is the absence of discussion in Ibn al-ʿArabī's doctrine on when and how God produces the fixed entities.

¹⁰ Irāda is God's power to bring into existence potential existents. Affifi, Mystical Philosophy, p. 160.

9 The bezel of the wisdom of light¹ exists in the essence of Joseph

(99) The light of this bright wisdom spreads over the presence of Imagination, which is the first principle of Divine Revelation among the people under God's Providence (fī ahl al-ʿināya).² ʿĀ'isha said: "The first revelation to the Messenger of God, may God bless him and give him peace, was a true dream. Each of his dreams was clear like the breaking dawn, no obscurity therein."³ Her knowledge stops here. The period (of these revelations) continued six months, then the angel came to him. She did not know that the Messenger of God said: "People are asleep, and when they die, they awake up."⁴ Everything one sees while awake⁵ is like this, even if the states (of sleep and wakefulness) are different. She spoke of six months; however, his whole life in this world should be gauged in this manner, that is, as a dream within a dream (manām fī manām).⁶ All things of this kind belong to the world of imagination (ʿālam al-khayāl), and for this reason they are interpreted, meaning a thing that is essentially in a certain form appears in another form. (100) Hence, the interpreter (ʿābir),⁷ if he is correct, passes from the form seen by the sleeper to the true (meaningful) form it is. This is like the appearance of knowledge in the form of milk.⁸ In his interpretation, the Prophet passed from the

1 This chapter is so called because Joseph was connected with dreams and their interpretations, and the world of dreams, the world of imagination, is part of the spiritual side of the cosmos. Spirits have the power of unveiling and hence are characterized by light, whereas the concrete world, by darkness. Chittick, "Chapter Headings," pp. 18–20; Idem, "Ibn ʿArabī's Summary," pp. 20f.

2 In simple words, Ibn al-ʿArabī wants to say that revelation, which is symbolized by light, reaches humans through the imagination, that is, in their dreams.

3 Bukhārī 1:3 (3).

4 This tradition does not appear in the great collections of traditions, but it is frequently cited by Sufi authors. Dagli, p. 95, n. 4; SPK, p. 396.

5 I used Kāshānī's reading (p. 246), which seems appropriate to the context, because what we call the concrete world is also unreal. Our text has fī ḥāl al-nawm (while asleep). Cf. Sharḥ, p. 122.

6 That is because life is unreal, it is imagination, and when one dreams, his dream is within a dream.

7 Here Ibn al-ʿArabī uses the active participle of the first form (ʿabara) to denote "interpreter." Generally one uses the word muʿabbir, the active participle of the second form, which has the same meaning.

8 For the interpretation of milk, see ch. 6, p. 56.

form of milk to the form of knowledge, explaining that the form of milk is attributed to the form of knowledge.

When the Prophet received revelation, he was detached from ordinary sensory perception and was covered by a dress, being unaware of his company. After he was freed from (the state of inspiration), he was restored (to his previous state). His perception occurs only in the presence of imagination; however, he was not said to be asleep. In like manner, the angel (Jibrīl) appeared to him in the form of a man, and this (appearance) derived from the presence of imagination, for he was not a man but an angel, who assumed the form of a human. The observer, the gnostic, interpreted this appearance until he reached the real form, saying: "This is Jibrīl, who came to you to teach you your religion."⁹ Then he (the gnostic) said: "Bring this man back to me." He called him a man, due to the form in which he appeared to them. Then he said: "This is Jibrīl," realizing the origin of this imagined man. He was right in both statements: the first based on his sense of sight and the second on (the real knowledge) that he was Jibrīl without doubt.¹⁰

Joseph said: "I saw (in my dream) eleven stars and the sun and the moon, I saw them prostrating before me" (Qur'ān 12:4). He saw his brothers in the form of stars and his father and stepmother in the form of the sun and the moon. This (seeing) was from Joseph's viewpoint. However, if it (the scene) were seen from the viewpoint of those in it, then the appearance of his brothers in the form of stars and the appearance of his father and stepmother in the form of the sun and the moon would be very pleasing to them. Since (his brothers) did not know what Joseph had seen, the latter's perception was preserved in his imagination. When Joseph told him his dream, Jacob was aware (of the danger) and said: "Do not tell your dream to your brothers, lest they plot against you" (ibid., 5). Then he pardoned (101) his sons of this plot and ascribed it to the Devil, who is the essence of plotting, and said: "The Devil is a clear enemy of the humans" (ibid.); that is, (his) enmity is manifest. After that Joseph finally said: "This is the interpretation of my earlier dream. God made it true" (ibid., 100), meaning that God made it manifest to the senses, after it had been in imaginative form. The Prophet Muḥammad said: "People are asleep," and Joseph's saying "God made it true" is like (the state) of one who sees in his sleep that he wakes up from a dream and then interprets it. He does not know that he is still asleep, but when he wakes up, he says: "I saw this, and I saw myself apparently waking up and I interpreted the dream." This is Joseph's experience. Think about the difference between Muḥammad's perception and Joseph's when the latter said at last: "This is the interpretation of my earlier dream. God made it true." This is sensory perception which could not be otherwise. That is because imagination conveys only the objects of senses, and no other objects. Consider how exalted the knowledge of Muḥammad's heirs is. I shall expand my sayings concerning this matter using Joseph's words (uttered in the spirit of) Muḥammad, so that you may know, if God wills.

⁹ Muslim, 1:1 (5).

¹⁰ Ibn al-'Arabī discusses the beginning of revelation in al-Tirmidhī's question number 25 (Futūḥāt, Vol. III, pp. 88f, ch. 73) and in ch. 188 (Futūḥāt, Vol. IV, pp. 7f).

Know that which is said about “other than the Real” or that which is called the cosmos relates to the Real as the shadow relates to a person. The cosmos is God’s shadow. This relationship is the same as the Existence is to the cosmos, for the shadow undoubtedly exists in the senses. However, there must be a substrate in which the shadow appears. Even if you assumed the absence of such a substrate, the shadow would still be intelligible but not existent in the senses, and the shadow would be potentially in the essence of the thing which casts the shadow. The substrate of the appearance of this divine shadow, called the cosmos, is the (fixed) entities of (102) the possible things (a’yān al-mumkināt) over which the shadow spreads out. Thus, from the extension of this shadow, one can perceive the measure of the existence of this Essence. It is by virtue of His name Light perception occurs, and this shadow spreads out over the fixed entities of the possible things in the form of unknown mystery.¹¹

Do you not see that shadows incline to the black color, thus pointing to their hiddenness because of the remoteness between them and the things that cast them? Even if an object is white, its shadow will be black. Do you not see the mountains that are distant from the observer appear to be black, but actually they might be of another color? Is there a cause of this but distance? The same is true as regards the blueness of the sky. This is what the effect of distance produces in the sense (of sight) with regard to non-luminous bodies. In like manner, the fixed entities of the possible things (a’yān al-mumkināt) are non-luminous, because they are non-existent, even if they are described as fixed. However, they are not described as existent, for existence is light. Furthermore, distance causes the luminous bodies to appear small, thus this is another effect of distance. The sense (of sight) perceives them as small, but they are actually bigger than what is seen. As we know by proof, the sun is one hundred sixty times the size of the earth; however, by the sense of sight it appears no larger than a shield. This is also the effect of distance. One knows of the cosmos (only) by the measure of what one knows of shadows.

Similarly, the Real is not known just as the object which causes the appearance of the shadow is not known. He is known from the point of view of His shadow but not from the point of view of the essence of the producer of the shadow. For this reason, we say that the Real is known from one aspect and not known from another. “Do you not see how your Lord lengthens the shadow; if He had willed, He would have made it rest” (Qur’ān 25:45), meaning the shadow exists in Him potentially. We say¹² that the Real cannot reveal Himself (mā kāna al-ḥaqq li-yatajallā) to the possible things until (103) He makes the shadow appear, and the shadow (before its appearance) is like the possible things that do not have yet concrete existence. Then “We made the sun a sign for Him”¹³ (Qur’ān, ibid.), (this sign) is the name of the Real, that is, the Light mentioned above, and the sense (of sight) witnesses it, for shadows exist in concrete form only when light exists. "Thereafter We seize it to Ourselves, drawing it gently" (Qur'an 25:46, trans. Arberry). He seizes it (the shadow) to Himself only because it is His shadow, from Him it appears and to Him all things return,¹⁴ for the shadow is He, and no other. All we perceive is the existence of the Real in the concrete possible things. Regarding the ipseity (huwiyya)¹⁵ of the Real, (we can only speak of) His existence, (whereas) regarding the variety of forms in Him, He is the concrete possible things. Just as the name shadow does not disappear from Him because of the variety of forms, so the name the cosmos does not disappear because of the variety of forms or any other name except for the Real. With respect to His Unity (aḥadiyya) as a shadow, He is the Real, because He is the Unique, the One, and with respect to the multiplicity of forms, He is the cosmos. Hence (you should) understand and ascertain what I have elucidated for you.

11 Ibn al-‘Arabī seems to say that God’s Light illuminates the fixed entities, and as a result of this illumination shadows appear. As our author said before, these shadows are the possible things in the concrete world.

12 The text has “He says” (yaqūlu), which does not seem logical, albeit Kāshānī (p. 254) ascribes the verb to God.

13 According to the usual commentaries, the sun is the sign for the shadow. However, in Ibn al-‘Arabī it serves as a sign for God, who is light.

If the matter is as I have pointed out to you, then the cosmos is an illusion, having no real existence. This is the meaning of imagination. You imagine that the cosmos is something separate, existing by virtue of itself (qā'im bi-nafsihi) and unconnected to the Real, but actually this is not so.

Do you not see it (the shadow) by your sense of sight as connected to the object from which it extends? It is inconceivable that the shadow should be separated from this connection, because it is inconceivable that a thing should be separated from its essence. As a result, you should know your essence, who you are, what your ipseity is, and what your relationship to the Real is. (Also you should know) through which thing you are real and through which thing you are the cosmos, the other, and the unlike, and words like these. In this matter scholars excel one another, and therefore try to better each other in knowledge (fa-ʿālim wa-aʿlam)¹⁶ and to know (more)!

The Real in relation to a specific shadow (may it be) small or big, pure or purest, is like a light in relation to a glass that comes between the light and the beholder; the light takes the color of the glass, while at the same time it has no color. In this manner you are made to see the Real through giving (you) similes (104) of your reality (which proceeds) from your Lord. If you say the light is green because of the greenness of the glass, you are right, as your sense (of sight) bears witness. And if you say the light is not green and has no color, because you use a logical proof, you are right, as your witness is based on sound, rational speculation (al-nazar al-ʿaqlī al-ṣaḥīḥ). This is a light which extends from a shadow, which is a concrete glass, and this is a luminous shadow because of its purity.¹⁷

¹⁴ Qur'an 11:123.

¹⁵ Huwiyya can also be rendered as He-ness or Essence. It signifies that which is unknown regarding God. SPK, p. 394, n. 15.

¹⁶ Lane, An Arabic English Lexicon, s.v.

¹⁷ Here also the light is God's Essence and the glass represents the world. The different colors seen are produced by the light which passes through the glass. Affifi, II, pp. 111 f. Just as in the previous simile, the shadows, which are produced by the light that is cast on the world, are the possible things in the world, so are the different colors.

Likewise, (regarding) whoever among us who assumes his reality (mutaḥaqqiq) through the Real, the form of the Real appears in him more intensively than it appears in others. The Real becomes the hearing, the sight, and all the faculties and organs of some among us through signs which religion conveys about the Real. Despite this,¹⁸ the essence of the shadow exists, for the pronoun “his” (in his hearing – sam’uhu) refers back to the Real as a shadow, and other servants (of God) do not gain such a position.¹⁹ The relationship of such a servant to the existence of the Real is closer than the relationship of other servants to this (existence).

If the matter is as we have established, know that you are imagination and all that you perceive; that is, for example, your statement about imagination that “I am not” (imagination) is imagination. All existence is imagination within imagination. The only true existence is God, especially as regards His Essence and Reality, and not as regards His names, because His names have two meanings, the first is His Essence, the Essence of the named (God), and the second is that which the name indicates, that is, what distinguishes a name from another. There is a great difference between the Forgiving on the one hand and the Manifest and the Hidden on the other, the same with regard to the First and the Last. This becomes clear to you through (the notion that) each name is identical to another in essence and through (the notion that) each name differs from another. With respect to the Essence, each name is the Real, and with respect to the otherness, it is the imagined Real (al-ḥaqq al-mutakhayyal) which concerns us.

Glory be to Him who has no sign pointing to Him but Himself and whose being is proved only through His Essence. Only that to which God’s Unity points exists in the cosmos, and only multiplicity points to that which exists in the imagination. Whoever adheres to multiplicity stays with the cosmos, the divine names, and the names of the cosmos. And whoever adheres to God’s Unity stays with the Real with respect to His Essence, which dispenses with all things (‘ālamīn). If God’s Essence dispenses with all things, this is (105) the Essence’s dispensing with the names connected to it, because just as the names point to the Essence, so they point to other named entities which are ascertained by their effects. “Say, this is God (allāh), He is one” (Qur’ān 112:1) with respect to His Essence, “God who is sought by all” (al-ṣamad, ibid., 2) with respect to our reliance on Him, “He did not beget” (ibid., 3) with respect to His Ipseity and to us, “and He was not begotten” (ibid.) “and has no equal” (ibid., 4), also with respect to His Ipseity and to us. This is His qualification, and He singled out His Essence saying, “God is one,” and the multiplicity appeared through His qualities which are known to us. We beget and are begotten and rely on Him, and we are equal one to another. This Unique Entity is free of these qualities and dispenses with them just as He dispenses with us. The Real has no lineage except (that which is said) in this sūra, the sūra of purification from multiplicity (ikhlāṣ); for this purpose it was revealed.²⁰ God's Unity with respect to the divine names which require us (our existence) is the Unity of many (aḥadiyyat al-kathra), and God's unity with respect to His dispensing with us and with the names is the Unity of the Essence (aḥadiyyat al-ʿayn). The name One applies to both kinds of unity. Know this!

¹⁸ Despite the fact that the tradition (See p. 24 above) speaks of God, it refers to the shadow.

The Real brought the shadows into existence and made them prostrate and cast themselves to the right and to the left, only to (serve) as signs for you, indicating your existence and His.²¹ That way you can know yourself and your relationship to Him and His relationship to you. Also (God brought the shadows into existence) to let you know from where or from what divine reality all that is other than the Real is described through absolute need for God and through relative need for each other, and to let you know from where or from what reality the Real is described as one who dispenses with people and with all things, whereas the (things in the) cosmos sometimes need others with respect to their essence and sometimes not. (All things in) the cosmos essentially need causes. The greatest cause for them is the Real, whose causality is embodied in the divine names which all things need. The divine names mean each name which the things are in need of (106), that is, things of the cosmos or the Essence of the Real, which is God, no other. For this reason God said: "People, you are needful of God, and God does not need you, He is the Praised" (Qurʾān 35:15). It is well known that we need each other. Hence, our names are His, for without doubt we need Him. Actually, our essences are His shadow, and nothing else. He is at the same time our ipseity and not our ipseity. We have paved the way for you, so contemplate!

²⁰ This chapter of the Qurʾān denies of God any connection to the cosmos.

²¹ This is a paraphrase of Qurʾān 16:48.

10 The bezel of the wisdom of unity¹ exists in the essence of Hūd

(106) The Straight Path² belongs to God/It is universally manifest not hidden
His Essence exists in young and old people/in the ignorant and in the knower
For this reason, His Mercy encompasses/everything³ be it despicable or exalted “There is no creature (dabba) which He does not seize its forelock.⁴ Verily, my Lord acts according to a straight path” (Qur’ān 11:56). Every moving creature walks according to God’s Straight Path. Those (who walk according to the Straight Path) are not the object of God’s anger in this respect, nor do they go astray.⁵ Just as going astray is accidental, so is the divine wrath, and (all things) go back to God’s Mercy which encompasses everything and precedes (His Wrath).⁶ All things other than God are creatures, because they possess a spirit.⁷ There is nothing that moves by virtue of itself, but everything moves by virtue of another. Each thing moves according to God’s Straight Path, which serves as a path only by walking according to it (literally: on it).

If creation submits to you/the Real submits to you
And if the Real submits to you/creation may not follow (Him in submission)
Hence, ascertain what we say concerning Him/for all my saying is true
(107) There is no existent that you see in the cosmos/which does not speak
Nor is there a creation seen by the eyes/but its essence is the Real
The Real is deposited in creation/for this reason, the forms of creation are His.

1 Unity (aḥadiyya) denotes God as an entity which cannot accept manyness. It is the pure one, the ineffable Essence. Yahya, “Theophanies and Lights,” pp. 35f. However, Ibn al-‘Arabi, as we have seen partly, distinguishes between God’s Unity, which designates His transcendence and God with respect to His attributes and names. In this chapter he discusses the third kind of God’s Unity, that is, the divine acts, which are the outcome of the second kind of unity.

2 Al-Sīrāt al-mustaḡīm appears for the first time in Qur’ān 1:6.

3 A paraphrase of Qur’ān 7:156.

4 By this phrase the author means that God directs every creature.

5 A paraphrase of Qur’ān 1:7.

6 A paraphrase of Bukhārī 7553 which reads “My Mercy precedes My Wrath” (sabaqat raḥmatī ghadabī).

7 According to Ibn al-‘Arabi, everything in the cosmos has a spirit, including inanimate things, because they are manifestations of God’s names and as such partake in God’s life. SDG, pp. 81–86. SPK, p. 302.

Know that the divine experiential sciences (al-ʿulūm al-ilāhiyya al-dhawqiyya) which the People of God experience are different by virtue of the difference of the faculties from which these experiences derive, although they go back to one Essence.⁸ That is because God says: “I have been his hearing by which he hears, his seeing by which he sees, his hand by which he seizes, and his foot by which he walks.”⁹ God points out that His Essence (huwiyya) is the essence of the human being’s organs, which is the essence of the servant. However, the essence is one, while the organs are many. Each organ possesses an experiential science peculiar to that organ. Each science originates in one essence, but differs in accordance with a specific organ. This is like water, which possesses one essence, but differs in taste according to its place. Some water is sweet and fresh and some is salty and bitter;¹⁰ however, it is water in all its states and its essence does not change, even if its tastes vary.

This wisdom pertains to the science of “feet,” for as God says concerning the nourishment of those who uphold His scriptures: “And from below” (literally: from beneath their feet – Qur’ān 5:66).¹¹ For the way, which is the (Straight) Path, means something to be traveled along and walked on, and walking is done only on foot. This witnessing (shuhūd) concerning the seizing of the forelocks by the one who is on the Straight Path (God) produces only this particular kind of experiential sciences. “And We¹² shall drive the sinners” (Qur’ān 19:86), those who deserve the station to which He will drive them by the wind, which pushes them from behind. He will destroy them by this wind, because of (the sins) of their souls. He will seize their forelocks, while the wind is driving them – what drives them is their desires to which they cling – to the Hell, which is the distance (between them and God) imagined by them.

(108) Since He drives them to this place, they attain the essence of nearness to Him, for the distance disappears, and the term Hell no longer applies to them. They attain the grace of nearness, because being sinners they deserve it.¹³ He does not give them this pleasurable experiential station as a gift. They take it, only because they deserve it owing to their acts. In carrying out their acts they are on the Lord’s Straight Path, for their forelocks are at the hands of the one who has this attribute (of seizing forelocks). They do not walk by themselves but under compulsion until they reach the essence of nearness to Him. “We are nearer to him (to a dying person) than you, but you (his relatives) do not know” (literally: do

⁸ God has all kinds of experiences which He bestows on people, each in keeping with the predisposition of the individual.

¹⁰ Cf. Qur’ān 35:12.

¹² The text in Affifi’s edition reads: wa-yasūqu (he drives), which seems to be an error. In Kāshānī’s and Sharḥ’s text, the word nasūqū appears as in the Qur’ān.

¹³ The paradox here is that even the evildoers, who suffer in Hell, come near to God. Sharḥ, pp. 138f.

not see; Qurʾān 56:85). Only the dying person knows, for the veil is removed, and “his knowledge (literally: his sight) is sharp” (Qurʾān 50:22).¹⁴ The Qurʾān does not single out one dying person from another; that is, it does not single out a happy (saʿīd) from an unhappy (shaqī) person with respect to nearness (to God). “We are nearer to him than his jugular vein” (Qurʾān 50:16). The Qurʾān does not single out one person from another. The divine nearness to the human being is not hidden in the divine message. Nothing is closer to the human being than his organs and faculties, and the human being constitutes only his organs and faculties, for he is an attested reality (ḥaqq mashhūd) in an imagined creation. The believers and people of unveiling and finding (ahl al-kashf waʾl-wujūd) hold that creation is intelligible and the Real is sensible and perceivable; (however), others except these two groups hold that the Real is intelligible and creation is perceivable. The latter are like salty and bitter water, while the former are like sweet and pleasant water, tasty to drink.

People are divided into two groups: a. those who walk on a way they know and whose aim they cognize, and this way is with respect to them a straight path; and b. those who walk on a way they do not know and whose aim is not cognized by them. This way is the same as that known to the first group. The knower calls God out of knowledge (ʿalā baṣīra),¹⁵ while the one who does not know calls God out of uncritical belief (taqlīd) (109) and ignorance. This is a specific knowledge which comes from the lowest of the low (asfal sāfilīn),¹⁶ for the feet are the lowest parts of the human being, and lower still is the way beneath the feet. Whoever knows that the Real is the essence of the way, truly knows reality, for in Him you walk and travel, because there is no known object but He. He is both the essence of existence and the walker and the traveler. There is no knower but He, and who are you? Know your reality and your way, for reality became clear to you through the tongue of the Transmitter (turjumān),¹⁷ if you understand. He is the true (ḥaqq) tongue, and only the one whose understanding is true understands Him, for the Real (al-ḥaqq) has many relations and various aspects.

Do you not think of ʿĀd, the people of Hūd, and how “they said: ‘This cloud will give us rain’” (Qurʾān 46:24. trans. AH)? They think well of the Lord, Who appears as the human being thinks of Him. The Real made them turn away from this saying and informed them of something more complete and exalted concerning nearness (to Him). For, when He gave them rain, which is the share of the earth, and watered the seed, they attained the fruit of this rain only after a long time. Therefore He said to them: “No indeed! It is what you wanted to hasten: a (hurricane) wind bearing a painful punishment” (ibid., trans. AH). He made the wind (rīḥ) an allusion of the comfort (rāḥa) which is therein, for through this wind ¹⁴ The whole verse reads: “You paid no attention to this (Day); but today we have removed your veil and your sight is sharp.” By Day the Qurʾān means the Resurrection.

¹⁵ For this phrase, see Qurʾān 12:108.

¹⁶ This idiom appears in Qurʾān 95:5.

¹⁷ The Transmitter is Muḥammad. See pp. 15, 22, 66.

He released them (arāḥahum)¹⁸ from the darkness of their bodies (literally: temples hayākil), from the rough roads and from the deep darkness. In this wind there is ʿadhāb, that is, something they find sweet when they taste it, although it causes them pain, because they are unaccustomed to it. The punishment touched them and was nearer to them than anything they had imagined. By God's command the wind destroyed everything and "in the morning there was nothing to see except their (ruined) dwellings" (ibid., 25., trans. AH), which are their dead bodies in which their essential spirits lived. The firm and special relationship (between the spirits and their bodies) disappeared and the life characteristic of the bodies (without spirits) remained in their bodies, that is, the Real made the skin, hands, feet, tips of the lashes, and the thighs to express (themselves).¹⁹ The divine text attests to all this.²⁰

However, God describes Himself as Other (or Jealous),²¹ and because of His otherness (jealousy) He "forbade (110) disgraceful deeds (or excesses fawāḥish)" (Qurʾān 7:33). Faḥsh is only what is manifest. As for the faḥsh of the unmanifest, it is possessed by the one for whom it is manifest.²² Hence, God forbade excesses, that is, prevented people from knowing the reality which we mentioned, meaning that He is the Essence of things. He concealed the reality through His otherness (ghayra), which stems from (the word) other (ghayr). Actually, He is identical to you (wa-huwa anta). The other says that hearing belongs only to Zayd, whereas the gnostic says that hearing is the Essence of the Real and so are other faculties and organs.²³ Not everyone knows the Real; people surpass each other, and their ranks are different, so it becomes clear who is most excellent (fāḍil) and who is excellent (maḥḍūl).²⁴

Know that when the Real made me see and witness his human messengers and prophets themselves, from Adam to Muḥammad, in a location of witnessing (mashhad) where I was placed in Cordova in the year 586 (AH), no one in this group spoke to me except Hūd. He informed me of the reason for their assembly. I saw him as a big man in relation to other men, handsome, who conversed in a subtle way, one who knows and reveals things. My proof of his (faculty) of revealing is his saying: "There is no creature (dabba) which He does not seize its forelock. Verily, my Lord acts according to a straight path" (Qurʾān 11:56).

¹⁹ Even the inanimate body has a certain kind of life.

²⁰ See Qurʾān 41:20, 21.

²¹ He is jealous of His existence, claiming that only He really exists.

²² The notion that excesses whether manifest or unmanifest refer to the same object is based on the verse noted above.

²³ The other, who regards himself as different from God, ascribes Zayd's hearing to Zayd himself, ignoring the truth, known by the gnostic, that Zayd's hearing is identical to God's Essence. Here the author alludes to the tradition of the supererogatory works. See above p. 24.

²⁴ Maḥḍūl is exactly one-who-is-known-to-be-excelled by others. These two terms are usually employed in discussions on the Imamate. B. Abrahamov, "Al-Ḳāsim ibn Ibrāhīm's Theory of the Imamate," Arabica 34 (1987), p. 89.

What good news for people is better than this? God bestowed on us His favor when he brought Hūd's statement in the Qur'ān. Muḥammad, who embraced everything, completed Hūd's saying by telling us about the Real who is the essence of (our) hearing and seeing, and of (our) hands, feet, and tongue, meaning He is the essence of our senses. The spiritual faculties are nearer (to the human being) than the senses, therefore God contented Himself with the more distant faculties that can be defined, rather than the nearer faculties that cannot be defined. The Real transmitted (tarjama)²⁵ Hūd's statement as good tidings to us, and God's messenger transmitted from God Hūd's statement also as good tidings. Thus, knowledge became perfect in the hearts of those who received it. "Only the unbelievers (or those who conceal – al-kāfirūn)²⁶ deny Our signs" (Qur'ān 29:47). That is because they concealed the signs, even if they knew them, out of envy, rivalry,²⁷ and injustice (ẓulm). We consider what comes to us from God concerning God in a Qur'ānic verse or in another kind of transmission which He delivered for us only in terms of limitation, whether limited by transcendence (tanzīh) or any other kind of characterization.

(111) The first limitation is the Cloud ('amā) which has no air above or beneath it.²⁸ The Real came to be in it before He created the creation. Then He said that He "Sat Himself upon the Throne" (Qur'ān 7:54, trans. Arberry), which is also a limitation. He then said that He descends to the lower heaven, which is yet another limitation.²⁹ He also said that He is in the heaven and on the earth,³⁰ and that He is with us wherever we are,³¹ until He informed us that He is our essence.³² We are limited; therefore, He can describe Himself only in terms of limitation. And His saying "There is nothing like Him (ka-mithlihi)" (Qur'ān 42:11) is also a limitation, if we regard the kāf as redundant and not descriptive. That which is distinguished from the limited thing is itself limited, because of its being distinct from the limited thing. Being free of limitation is limitation, and one who understands (knows that) the free (the unlimited) thing is limited by its freedom. If we regard kāf as a particle for description, we limit Him.³³ If we understand by "There is nothing like Him" the denial of comparison (of God to others), we verify the true sense and the correct information that He is the essence of things, and the things

²⁵ For this verb as designating transmission, see above, pp. 15, 22, 66, 76.

²⁶ For kafara in the meaning of "he concealed," see above, p. 42f.

²⁷ Read munāfasa instead of nafāsa.

²⁸ This sentence is based on a ḥadīth (Tirmidhī, 3109) translated in SPK (p. 125) as follows: The Prophet was asked: "Where (ayn) did your Lord come to be (kān) before He created the creatures (al-khalq)?" He replied: "He came to be in a cloud, neither above which nor below which was any air (hawā)."²⁹ For more references to this tradition, see SPK, p. 397, n. 1.

³⁰ Cf. Qur'ān 43:84.

³¹ Cf. Qur'ān 57:4.

are limited, even if their limitations are different. He is limited by the limitation of every limited thing. A thing is limited only by the limitation of the Real. He permeates that which is called the created and the produced things, and were it not the case, existence would not come to be. He is the Essence of existence and He is “the preserver of everything” (Qur’ān 11:57, 34:21) by His Essence; the preservation of everything “does not weary Him” (Qur’ān 2:255). His preservation of all things means His preservation of His form lest the thing assume a different form, which is inconceivable. He is both witness and witnessed. The cosmos is His form, and He is the spirit of the cosmos and directs it, and He is the Great Man (Macrocosm).

He is all being/and the one by whose

Being I came to be/therefore I say He feeds

My existence is His nourishment/and we assume His form

In Him and from Him, if you observe from a certain aspect/we seek refuge.³⁴

(112) Because of this anxiety (karb), He sighed, and His breath was attributed to the Merciful, for He had mercy on that which the divine relations require, that is, bringing the forms of the cosmos into existence. These forms are both the manifest and the unmanifest aspects of the Real, because He is both the Manifest and the Unmanifest (the Hidden). He is the First, because He existed without the forms, and He is the Last, because He was the Essence of things when they came to be. The Last is the essence of the Manifest, and the Unmanifest is the essence of the First.³⁵ And “He knows all things absolutely” (Qur’ān 57:3), for He knows Himself. Since He brought the forms into existence in the Breath and the rule of the relations (between the Real and the cosmos), that is, the Names, was manifest, the divine relationship to the cosmos was established, and all things were attributed to Him. He (Muḥammad) said: “This day I lowered your pedigree and raised my pedigree”;³⁶ that is, I took from you your attribution to yourselves and turned your attribution to Me.

Where are the God-fearing (muttaqūn), that is, those who took their God as protection (wiqāya)?³⁷ God was their manifest aspect, that is, the Essence of their manifest forms. The God-fearing person is the greatest, the most deserving (of this name), and the strongest in the eyes of all people. The God-fearing is the one who makes himself a protection for God through his form, because the Essence of the Real is the faculties of the servant. He made the one called the servant as a protection for the one called the Real on the basis of witness, so that the knower is distinguished from the ignorant. “Say, are those who know equal to those who do not know? Only the intelligent remember” (Qur’ān 39:9). The intelligent are those who contemplate the core of the thing, which is what is sought (in order to know the thing). The negligent cannot overcome the diligent; likewise, the hireling cannot be compared with the servant. If the Real is a protection for the servant³⁸ from one aspect, and vice versa from another, then say of Being what you will: if you want, say it is the creation, and if you want, say it is the Real, and if you want, say it is the Real and the creation, and if you want, say there is neither real nor creation from every aspect, and if you want, you will hold perplexity in this matter. By establishing levels (of being), that which you seek becomes clear. If (the messengers) had not defined existence, they would not have conveyed the transformation of the Real into forms, nor would they have described Him as removing the forms from Himself.

³⁴ Existence is compared here to nourishment which comes from God. With respect to the notion that God is the Essence of all things, when one asks for refuge in God, one is actually asking for refuge from Him.

³⁵ In view of the cosmos He is the Manifest; however, without the cosmos, He is the Unmanifest.

(113) The eye looks only at Him/and one judges only Him

We (belong) to Him, (live) by Him and under His rule/and in every state we are in His presence

As a consequence, He is unknown and known, indescribable and describable. Whoever sees the Real from His standpoint (minhu), in Him (fīhi) and through Him (bi-ʿaynihi), is a knower (ʿārif). Whoever sees the Real from His standpoint, in Him, but through his own eyes, does not know.³⁹ And whoever does not see the Real from His standpoint, nor in Him, expecting to see Him through his own eyes, is ignorant. To sum up, each individual must have a belief (iʿtiqād) regarding his Lord through which he turns to Him and seeks Him. If the Real reveals Himself to him within this belief, he acknowledges Him. But if He reveals Himself in another belief, then he is denying Him, seeking refuge against Him, and behaving badly toward Him, while simultaneously thinking that he is behaving properly. Such a believer only believes in a god which he created in himself, for a god of beliefs is created (in thought). Such believers see only themselves and what they create in themselves.

Observe! The levels of people regarding the knowledge of God are the same levels concerning the seeing of God in the Resurrection. I have informed you of the reason which entails this. Beware of limiting yourself by a specific belief (ʿaqd)⁴⁰ and disbelieving in everything else lest you miss much good; moreover, you will miss knowing of things as they really are.⁴¹ Be in yourself primal matter, receptive to all forms of belief, for God is too vast and great to be confined by one belief rather than another.⁴² For this reason, He said: “Wherever you turn there is the face of God” (Qurʾān 2:115); He did not mention one place rather than another. He mentioned that there is the face of God, and the face of a thing is its essence (ḥaqīqa, or reality). By this He turned the attention of the gnostics’ hearts lest events of this world should distract them from applying their minds to (God’s omnipresence), for the servant does not know in which breath he will be taken (die); he may be taken at a time of inattentiveness, and thus will be unequal to the one taken at a time of attentiveness.

Also, the perfect servant (114), notwithstanding his knowledge (of God's omnipresence), must, from the standpoint of the external form and the limited state, turn his face in prayer toward the Holy Mosque and believe that God is there at prayer time. This is one of the levels (of the presence) of the Real's face, which derives from "Wherever you turn there is the face of God" (ibid.). The direction toward the Holy Mosque is part of (this verse), and in this direction God's face exists. However, do not say that He is only here, but adhere to the two notions you perceived, these being, embrace the rule of directing your face toward the Holy Mosque and abide by the rule of not limiting God's presence to specific buildings, which are only some of the many directions to which one can turn.

Through God it became clear to you that He is in every direction wherever one's belief is. Hence everyone is right (in his belief), and whoever is right is rewarded, and whoever receives reward is happy, and God is pleased with the happy individual, even if he is unhappy for some time in the world to come. For even the people of Providence⁴³ are sick and suffer pain in this world, although we know that they are the happy persons among the people of the Real. Among God's servants are those who will suffer pain in the next world in an abode called Hell (jahannam).⁴⁴ Despite this, none of the people of knowledge, those who were made to reveal things as they really are, will say with certainty that the happy persons will not enjoy a specific delight in this abode, either by freeing them from pains, and thus their delight will be relief from pain, or they will enjoy a separate⁴⁵ and additional delight as the delight of the people of Paradise in Paradise. And God knows best.

⁴³ That is, those whom God takes care of.

⁴⁴ I cannot be sure of what or who Ibn al-ʿArabī is hinting at by telling us that some of God's servants will suffer in the world to come. Is he saying pain will follow them for their sins?

⁴⁵ This is a delight which is not connected to the relief of pain.

11 The bezel of the wisdom of opening¹ exists in the essence of Ṣāliḥ

(115) Among His signs are the (riders) on mounts/because of the variety of paths
Some adhere to the true course/and others travel (as in) the desert without aim
The former are eyewitnesses/while the latter go astray
Both receive from God/revelations of mysteries from every side²

Know, may God grant you success, that in their essences all things are built on unevenness, which begins with number three and beyond that.³ The first uneven number is three. From the divine presence the cosmos came into existence. Therefore, God said: “When We will a thing (to be), We only say to it ‘be’ and it comes into being” (Qur’ān 16:40). This is an essence, which possesses will and speech. If this essence and its will, which constitutes a specific turning toward a thing aiming at making it exist, and the saying “be” in this process did not exist, the thing would not exist. Also the tripartite unevenness appears in this thing. With respect to the thing itself, its existence and description as an existent are valid because of three (elements): its quality of being a thing (shay’iyya), its (quality of) hearing (samā), and its (quality of) obedience to the originator’s command. Compare the first three with the last three: The fixed entity of the thing in its state of absence corresponds to the Essence of its bringer into existence; the hearing of this entity, to the will of its originator; and, its obedience to the command of its originator, to the latter’s saying “be,” and so brings it into existence. Bringing into being is ascribed to the thing, for if it had no power of bringing into being, when hearing this saying, it would not come into being. On hearing the command, only the essence of the thing brings it into existence, after its non-existence. Thus, the Real affirms that (116) bringing into being pertains to the thing itself and not to the Real, while the Real in this (process) only commands.⁴ He so informs about 1 Opening is equivalent to unveiling or to all kinds of God’s self-manifestation. Chittick, “Chapter Headings,” pp. 21f; SPK, pp. 222–224.

2 The riders here are individuals who travel in the ways of life. Some of them know their way and others go astray. Both groups receive signs from God, which can teach them about Him and the cosmos.

3 “One” is not considered a number; hence, the first uneven number is three.

4 According to Ibn al-‘Arabī, the thing exists in the state of a fixed entity, which can be embodied and becomes a concrete object at God’s command. In fact, Ibn al-‘Arabī interprets this verse in a plain manner, because the Qur’ān speaks of a thing’s existence Himself in his saying: “When We will a thing (to be), We only say to it ‘be’ and it comes into being” (ibid.). He (the Real) attributes the bringing into being to the thing itself as a result of God’s command, and He speaks the truth. In principle, it is reasonable, just as the one feared and obeyed orders his servant to stand, and he stands in submission to his master’s command. The master only orders the servant to stand; however, standing is the outcome of the servant’s activity, and not the master’s.⁵ Thus, bringing into being rests on the tripartite principle – three elements from both sides, from the Real and from creation.

Also, the tripartite principle permeates the origination of notions by way of logical proofs. A proof should be composed of three (parts) in accordance with a specific order and condition(s). Only in this way is a result reached. The contemplator (nāẓir) composes his proof of two premises, each containing two parts,⁶ so that there are four parts. One of these four parts is repeated in the two premises so as to link the first premise to the second, like in a marriage;⁷ hence, there are three (different) parts, because of the repetition of one part.

When this procedure takes place in accordance with the specific aspect, that is, the connection of the first premise with the second through the repetition of one part, thus validating the tripartite structure, one arrives at the conclusion (literally: what one seeks, al-maṭlūb). (As a) specific condition, the predicate of the first premise must be more general than its subject or equal to it.⁸ In this case the conclusion will be valid, otherwise it is invalid. Such faulty procedure can be found in the world. For example, the ascription of one’s acts to oneself without connecting them to God, or attributing the bringing into being, of which we speak, to God alone, while the Real attributes it only to the thing to which God says “be.”

For example, if we wish to prove that the existence of the world is caused, we shall say everything that comes into being (ḥādith) has a cause (sabab), thus we have the thing that comes into being and the cause.⁹ Then we say (117) in the second premise: the world comes into being, so “comes into being” is repeated in both premises. The conclusion is that the world has a cause. The cause, which before its concrete existence; the command is turned to a thing, which means that it has some kind of existence. This plain meaning supports Ibn al-‘Arabī’s theory of the fixed entities.

5 This is not a very accurate example, because the servant exists concretely, while things only exist in the Real’s thought as fixed entities. However, it does bear witness to the aspect of the obedience to the command which inheres in the servant.

6 For example, the two parts are the subject and predicate.

7 Probably in this context he means the connection between male and female, who have something in common.

8 I follow here the examples given in Affifi’s commentary (p. 136): 1. Every animal is a body; 2. The human being is an animal; 3. Therefore, the human being is a body. In this example the predicate (body) is more general than its subject (every animal), because a body may also refer to inanimate things. In the second example the predicate is equal to the subject: 1. Every animal is sensitive; 2. The human being is an animal; 3. Therefore, the human being is sensitive.

9 This is the first premise in which “everything that comes into being” is the subject and “cause” is the predicate.

appears in the first premise, is reiterated in the conclusion. The specific aspect is the repetition of “comes into being,” while the specific condition is the generality of the predicate, for it makes that which comes into being exist.¹⁰ Regarding the coming of the world into being from God, the predicate is general. We affirm that everything that comes into being (subject) has a cause (predicate), whether this cause is equal to or more general than its subject. In both cases the conclusion is valid. Thus, also in the origination of ideas through proofs the tripartite principle is manifest.

Hence, the foundation of Being is tripartite in principle. For this reason, God manifested the wisdom of Ṣāliḥ in postponing the punishment of his people for three days as a true threat,¹¹ which finally became real, and this is the cry by which God destroyed them, “so that they fell down in their homes” (Qur’ān 7:78, 11:67). On the first of the three days their faces became yellow, on the second red, and on the third black.¹² When the third day passed, their predisposition was appropriate, and then decay appeared in them, and this appearance was called destruction. The yellowing of the faces of the miserable parallels the shining of the faces of the happy, as in his saying “On that Day some faces will be shining (musfira)” (Qur’ān 80:38). (The word musfira) originates in sufūr, meaning manifestation (zuhūr). (This sign) corresponds to the yellowing of the faces of the people of Ṣāliḥ on the first day in which the sign of their misery appeared. Likewise, in parallel to the redness that appeared in their faces, God said of the happy “laughing” (ibid., 39), for laughter causes redness of the face, and for the happy it is the redness of the cheeks. And finally, as a counterpart to the transformation of the skins of the miserable to black, God said “rejoicing” (ibid., mustabshira), meaning the impact (118) of joyfulness on their skins as blackness had impact on the skins of the miserable. For this reason, He applied the word “tidings” (bushrā) to both parties; that is, what He said to them affected their skin (bashara),¹³ and His words caused their skin to color in a way which described their faces differently than before. Regarding the happy, He said: “Their Lord gives them glad tidings of His mercy and pleasure” (Qur’ān 9:21), while regarding the miserable, He said: “Give them tidings of a painful punishment” (Qur’ān 3:21). The two kinds of announcements influenced the souls of both groups and in turn the color of their skins.

That which was manifest in their outward appearance derived from the notion already established in their souls. Nothing affected them but themselves, just as their origination derived from themselves. “God possesses the conclusive argument” (Qur’ān 6:149).

Whoever understands this wisdom, establishing it in his soul as witness, releases himself from dependence on others and knows that the good and evil that befall him come only from himself.¹⁴ By good I mean what fits his aims and tallies with his nature and temperament, and by evil I mean the opposite. Whoever witnesses this (wisdom) ascribes all excuses to the existents themselves, even if they make no excuse, knowing that all that befalls one derives from oneself, for as we have mentioned before, knowledge follows the known object. Thus, he says to himself when something that does not fit his aim befalls him: “Your hands did it and your mouth breathed.” And God speaks the truth and guides (people) to the (right) way (Qur’ān 33:4).

¹⁴ Ibn al-‘Arabī ignores the self-contradiction in his thought, because in the last analysis God alone establishes the fixed entities that determine the physical and the spiritual constitution of the human being. Thus, actually the human being is not responsible for what suits his constitution, because the latter was already established by God.

12 The bezel of the wisdom of the heart¹ exists in the essence of Shu‘ayb

(119) Know that the heart – I mean the heart of the knower of God (the gnostic – ‘ārīf) – derives from God’s Mercy, but is more encompassing (awsa’) than Mercy, because the heart encompasses the Real, while His Mercy does not.² Most scholars³ hold this notion, pointing out that the Real has mercy on (people), but is not the object of mercy.

As for the elite, they point out that God describes Himself as breath (nafas), a word derived from exhalation (tanfis). (Also they state) that the divine names are identical to the entity named, that is, God. These names require the realities they bestow, and the realities which they require are none but the cosmos. Divinity (ulūhiyya) requires worshipers, while Lordship (rubūbiyya) requires servanthood, because the essence of both Divinity and Lordship depends on worshipers and servanthood for its concrete and assumed existence. However, the Real with respect to His Essence (dhāt) needs nothing, (whereas in contrast) to Lordship this notion (the Essence) does not apply. Thus, the matter remains (as something) between what Lordship requires and what the Essence deserves, that is, its dispensing with the cosmos.

Truly, Lordship is identical with the Essence. However, because things contradict each other by virtue of their relationships, the Real describes Himself in a tradition as the one who has mercy on His servants. The first breath which came forth from Lordship is related to (the name) the Merciful (al-raḥmān), which brought the cosmos into existence, the cosmos that Lordship in its reality and all the divine names require. Regarding this aspect, it is proved that His Mercy encompasses

1 Shu‘ayb means “branching out,” and this meaning is connected to the human heart. First, the human heart’s many functions affect every part of the body, and second, the heart is capable of changing and adopting various ideas. Chittick, “Chapter Headings,” p. 23. Idem, “Ibn ‘Arabī’s Summary,” p. 25f. By the human heart, Ibn al-‘Arabī does not mean a bodily organ, but rather a spiritual organ possessing mystical awareness. Izutsu, Creation, p. 161.

2 The Real (al-ḥaqq) denotes God in respect to His names and attributes, therefore His Mercy pertains to the Real. From the standpoint of the Essence, His Mercy does not encompass the Real. See below, n. 4.

3 See Kāshānī, p. 300.

everything, including the Real,⁴ and His Mercy is broader than the heart or similar to it in broadness. (Here) the discussion of mercy and the heart finishes.

Also, you should know, as (120) stated in the Ṣaḥīḥ,⁵ the Real changes His forms when He reveals Himself. Also, when the heart encompasses Him, it does not encompass anything else with Him, and it is as if the Real filled the heart. This means that when the heart looks at the Real when the latter reveals Himself to it, it cannot look at other things. The gnostic's heart is related to broadness, as Abū Yazīd al-Bisṭāmī said: "Were the Throne and that which it contains multiplied one hundred million times and placed in the corner of the gnostic's heart, he would not feel it."⁶ Likewise al-Junayd said: "When the coming into being is linked to the eternal, no sign of it will remain."⁷ How can a heart which contains the Eternal feel the existence of the coming into being?⁸ If the forms of the Real's self-manifestation are diversified, the heart necessarily becomes wide or narrow in keeping with the form of the divine self-manifestation, for the heart can contain only the form in which the self-manifestation takes place. That is because the heart relates to the gnostic or the perfect human being as the bezel of the ring relates to the seal (the stone); the seal does not exceed the bezel, but it fits its measure and form, be it circular, square, hexagonal, octagonal, or any other form. This runs contrary to what the Sufis (al-tā'ifa) said, viz., that the Real manifests Himself according to the measure of the servant's predisposition. This is not true, for the servant manifests himself to the Real in accordance with the form the Real manifests Himself to the servant. To explain this issue, God has two ways of self-manifestation: concealed (ghayb) and unconcealed (shahāda). The concealed self-manifestation bestows the heart with predisposition. This is the essential self-manifestation whose essence is concealed; it is the ipseity which the Real deserves saying of Himself, "He" (huwa). The term "He" belongs to Him always and forever.

When the heart possesses this predisposition, the unconcealed self-manifestation appears (121) in the sensible world and the heart sees the Real in the form mentioned above. The Real bestows on the heart its predisposition, as said: "(Our Lord) bestowed on everything (the form of) its creation" (Qur'ān 20:50). Then He removed the veil between Him and His servant, and he saw Him in the form of his belief, which is the essence of his belief. Both the heart and the eye always witness only the form of belief vis-à-vis the Real. Thus, the heart contains the Real of the belief, and the Real manifests Himself to the heart and hence the heart knows Him. The eye sees only the Real of the belief. Quite evidently there are various beliefs that whosoever restricts Him to his belief denies Him in other beliefs, affirming His self-manifestation in the belief to which he restricts Him.⁹ Whoever considers the Real without restriction does not deny Him, affirming Him in every form He manifests Himself and devoting himself to the endless forms in which He is manifest, for the forms of His self-manifestation have no end.

The same applies to the knowledge of God; no limit stops the knower at a certain point (in this knowledge), but (on the contrary), he is always a knower seeking to increase the knowledge of Him. "O my Lord, increase my knowledge" (Qur'an 20:114); the matter has no end, from both sides.¹⁰

This is so when you say the Real and creation. However, if you consider His saying "I am his foot with which he walks, his hand with which he seizes and his tongue with which he speaks," and other faculties and substrates, that is, the organs, in which they are located, you will not separate (the Real from creation) and you will say all things are the Real or creation. But, this is creation from one standpoint and the Real from another, yet the Essence is one. The form of self-manifestation is identical to the form of the one who receives this self-manifestation; hence, one is at the same time that which is manifested and that for which manifestation is performed. Look how wonderful is God regarding His ipseity and His relationship with the cosmos within the realities of His most beautiful names.

(122) Who is there and what is there/the "who" and the "what" are the same

Whoever generalizes Him, particularizes Him/and whoever particularizes Him, generalizes Him

There is no essence but His/the light of His Essence is darkness

Only a servant who is anxious/knows what we said

"Surely in that there is a reminder for whoever has a heart (qalb)" (Qur'an 50:37), because he changes (taqallubih)¹¹ himself by way of various forms and attributes. God did not say "for whoever has an intellect," because the intellect (ʿaql) means a limit and it restricts the matter to a single trait, and the reality denies restriction in the cosmos. It is not a reminder to those who possess intellect, that is, the people of beliefs (aṣḥāb al-ʿitqādāt) who accuse each other of unbelief and curse each other and "no one helps them" (Qur'an 3:22, 91). That is because the god of one believer has no authority over the god of another believer. One who adheres to a belief defends his belief, that is, what he believes regarding his god, and another believer will not help him, and for this reason he has no impact on his rival. Likewise, the rival receives no help from the god of his belief (because)

⁹ Takeshita, p. 117.

¹¹ The noun qalb and the verb taqallaba derive from the root q.l.b, which connotes change and transformation. SPK, p. 106. Izutsu, Creation, pp. 163f.

“no one helps them” (ibid.). The Real denies the gods of beliefs the ability to help each believer separately; those who are helped are all the people, who are also the helpers.

In the eyes of the knower (or gnostic – ‘ārīf), the Real is the known (al-ma‘rūf) which is never denied. The people of the known (ahl al-ma‘rūf)¹² in this world are the people of the known in the next world. For this reason, God says “for whoever has a heart” (Qur’ān 50:37), because he knows the change of the Real in forms by his own change in shapes.¹³ Through his self, he knows God’s self, and his self is not different from the Real’s ipseity. No thing of the Being, at present or in the future, is other than the Real’s ipseity, but it is the essence of His ipseity. (One who knows the Real through his self) is the knower (123), who cognizes and affirms this form; however, this one is neither the knower nor the one who cognizes; he is denied in this different form.¹⁴ This is the portion of whoever knows the Real through His self-manifestation and in witnessing the very combination (of all things), and (this is proved) through His words “for whoever has a heart” (Qur’ān, ibid.) (meaning that the Real has) different forms when He changes (things).

As for the people of belief, they are those who blindly followed (qalladū) the reports of the prophets and the messengers regarding the Real. They are not those who blindly follow the people of contemplation (aṣḥāb al-aḥkār) who interpret the reports (using rational) proofs. By those who blindly follow the messengers, God means (those who) “listen attentively” (Qur’ān, ibid.), because the divine reports were given by the prophets. “Whoever listens attentively” means a witness who calls attention to the presence of imagination and its use. Concerning good deeds (iḥsān), the Prophet said: “You should worship God as if you see Him,”¹⁵ and God is present in the direction of the one who prays, therefore the latter is a witness. One who blindly follows a man of contemplation and is limited by him is not the same as one who listens attentively, for the latter should be a witness of what we have mentioned. When he is not a witness of what we have mentioned, he is not the one meant in this verse. Those are the people about whom God said: “When those who have been followed disown their followers” (Qur’ān 2:166, trans. AH). However, the messengers did not disown their followers. Hence, O my friend (yā waliyya),¹⁶ verify what I have introduced to you in this wisdom of the heart.

As for the ascription of this wisdom to Shu‘ayb, it is because this name contains the (notion) of branching off (tasha‘ub), meaning that its (wisdom’s) branches are not limited, for each belief is a branch of wisdom, and wisdom is the totality of ¹² It seems that this term is equivalent to ahl allāh, the people of God, who are the best mystics.

¹³ Izutsu, Creation, p. 165.

¹⁵ Bukhārī, II: 37 (50).

¹⁶ According to one of the manuscripts (Affīfī, p. 123, n. 6), the letters y.a.w.l.y can be corrected to create the word ta‘wīl.

all its branches, that is, the beliefs. When the veil is disclosed,¹⁷ (this wisdom) will be manifested to everyone according to his belief. It might be manifested contrary to one's belief regarding God's judgment. (This is proved by the following) verse: "(On the Day of Resurrection) God will show them what they did not take into consideration" (Qur'ān 39:47). Most cases (of not taking into consideration) pertain to God's judgment. For example, the Mu'tazilite holds that God will implement His threat on the transgressor (al-ʿāṣī) if he dies without repentance.¹⁸ When he dies (124) and God has mercy on him, (it becomes evident) that God's providence has already established that the sinner will not be punished. (Thus), the Mu'tazilite found God to be Forgiving and Merciful, and so God showed him that which he did not take into consideration.

As for God's ipseity, some people are absolutely certain that God is such and such; however, when the veil is disclosed, they see that the form of their belief is true and they believe in it. (In such a case) the knot (uqda of belief) is untied, and beliefs disappear and turn into knowledge which derives from revelation (mushāhada).¹⁹ After one's sight is sharpened, its weakness does not recur. As a result, God appears in the sight of some servants in various forms of self-manifestation contrary to their beliefs, because His self-manifestations do not repeat themselves. They regard the appearance of His ipseity as true, (because) "God will show them what they did not take into consideration" (Qur'ān, ibid.) before the removal of the veil.

We have mentioned the form of ascension after death (in the gradations) of the divine knowledge in our Book of Revelations (Kitāb al-tajalliyāt),²⁰ wherein we noted the Sufis we met in visions and the things they did not know of which we informed them regarding this issue.²¹ One of the marvelous things concerning the ascension is that the Sufi is always ascending without being aware of his ascension, because of the subtlety and thinness of the veil and the likeness of the forms, as God said: "They were supplied with something like it" (Qur'ān 2:25, following AH).

One form is not the same as another, for the knower is aware of the fact that they (the forms) are similar, (not identical), to each other, (and hence) different (from each other). He who verifies (ṣāhib al-taḥqīq the divine realities) sees multiplicity in the One, just as he knows that the divine names, although their realities are many and different, apply to only one essence. With respect to reason, there is multiplicity; however, it applies to one essence. Thus, in self-manifestation, multiplicity is witnessed in one essence, just as Prime Matter (hayūlā) exists²² in everything, and Prime Matter, though having many and various forms, (125) is actually reduced to a single substance (jawhar).

¹⁷ In the world to come, one will be able to see the truth.

²² Or Prime Matter "is found" (read tūjadu [Affifi, I, p. 124, n. 6] instead of tūkhadhu of the text).

Thus, whoever knows himself (or his soul) through this knowledge knows his Lord, because He created him in His image;²³ moreover, he is the very ipseity and reality of God. For this reason, none of the scholars have arrived at the knowledge of the self (soul) and its reality except for the metaphysicians among the messengers and the Sufis.

As for the people of contemplation and discursive thinking among the ancients and the speculative theologians (mutakallimūn), in their discussion of the self (soul) and its essence, none of them have achieved its reality; discursive discussion never provides this knowledge. Whoever seeks knowledge of the self (soul) through discursive discussion overvalues this device and uses it not in its proper place.²⁴ Undoubtedly, they are among “those whose efforts were in vain in this world, while they thought that they were doing well” (Qur’ān 18:104). Whoever seeks this knowledge through an improper way will not arrive at its reality.

How beautiful is God’s saying regarding the cosmos and its (perpetual) changes, because of His breaths “in a new creation” (Qur’ān 50:15), in a single essence. He said (this) about a single group, nay, about most people: “No, they doubt a new creation” (ibid.).²⁵ They do not know of the renewal of the cosmos’s creation due to God’s breaths. However, the Ash’arites arrived at the notion of the perpetual creation of some existents, that is, the accidents (ʾaʾrāḍ), and the Sophists (al-ḥisbāniyya)²⁶ thought that the whole cosmos is created perpetually. All the people of contemplation regarded them as ignorant.

However, both groups erred. In spite of the Sophists’ belief that the whole cosmos is always changing, their error lies in not ascribing these changes to a single essence which brings the cosmos into existence and in not making the cosmos intelligible through God. Had they held this notion, they would have attained the rank of realization of the truth. As for the Ash’arites, they did not know that the whole cosmos is an aggregation of accidents and that it is changing all the time, for accidents do not endure two instants.²⁷ This appears in (their) definition of things, for when they define a thing it becomes manifest that it has accidents,²⁸

²³ See p. 37, n. 4 above; Sell, Mystical Languages, p. 245, n. 9; Masataka Takeshita, “The Homo Imago Dei Motif and the Anthropocentric Metaphysics of Ibn ‘Arabī in Inshāʾ al-Dawāʾir, Orient 18(1982):111–128.

²⁶ Kāshānī, p. 316. The Sophists were so called because ḥisbān means conjecture. J. van Ess, “Skepticism in Islamic Religious Thought,” Al-Abhath 21 (1968), p. 1.

²⁸ In the Ash’arite view, everything is composed of atoms (jawhar, pl. jawāhir) and accidents. The atoms are indivisible particles which do not differ from each other; they

(126) and that these accidents, which are mentioned in the definition, serve as the essence of the atom and its reality. Every atom exists by virtue of itself (qā'im bi-naqsihi). From the standpoint of its being an accident, a thing does not exist by virtue of itself. From the aggregation of that which does not exist by virtue of itself (accidents) comes that which does exist by virtue of itself.²⁹ For example, the atom, which exists by virtue of its essence, is defined as having the property of occupying one place (taḥayyuz)³⁰ and as having the property of being a substrate for accidents, (and these two properties are) essential to its definition. No doubt, receivability (qabūl) is an accident, because it exists only in a recipient (qābil), for it does not exist by virtue of itself, and this property is an essential (element) of the atom. (Likewise) occupying one place is an accident that exists only in some place, hence it does not exist by virtue of itself. Occupying one place and receivability are not something added to the essence of the defined atom, for essential definitions are the essence of the defined thing and its ipseity. Thus, that which does not remain for two instants becomes that which does remain for two instants and more, and that which does not exist by virtue of itself comes to be that which does exist by virtue of itself. They (the Ash'arites) were not aware of their state, (for) they "doubt a new creation" (Qur'ān, ibid.).³¹

As for the people of unveiling, they believe that God reveals Himself in every breath and never repeats his self-manifestation. They (also) believe from witnessing that every self-manifestation bestows a new creation and removes a preceding creation. Its removal is the essence of annihilation (fanā') in the passing self-manifestation and subsistence (baqā') in the bestowal of the following self-manifestation. So understand!

are the stable element of everything, while the accidents are the changing elements of all bodies, such as color, states of aggregation, heat or coldness, etc. See the preceding reference. For atomism in the Kalām, see Pines, Atomism, pp. 1–41.

²⁹ The combination (ijtimā') of accidents is itself an accident. Thus, that which does not exist by virtue of itself causes the existence of that which exists by virtue of itself.

³⁰ Pines, Atomism, p. 12.

13 The bezel of the wisdom of spiritual power¹ exists in the essence of Lot

(126) Al-malk means power (shidda) and al-malik is the powerful (shadīd). When you powerfully knead a lump of dough (shaddadta al-‘ajīn), you say malaktu al-ajīn. (The poet) Qays ibn al-Ḥaṭīm² says, describing a stab:

I seized (so) powerfully the place of the wound by the palm of my hand and widened (anhartu) it/so that one standing in front of the wound could see that which is behind (the wounded),

(127) meaning I seized so powerfully (the place) of the stab. This is what God said about Lot: (Lot said) “If only I had the power to stop you or sought shelter in a strong support” (rukn shadīd) (Qur’ān 11:80, trans. AH). God’s messenger said: “May God have mercy upon my brother, (because) he sought shelter in a strong support.”³ The Prophet called (our) attention to the fact that Lot was with God, because God is Powerful. By “a strong support” Lot means (his) tribe, and by “if only I had the power” he means will (or aspiration, himma) which pertains especially to humans. God’s messenger said “since that time,” meaning from that time when Lot said “or sought shelter in a strong support,” God sent a prophet only when he was protected by his tribe. This was the case of Abū Ṭālib (who sheltered) God’s messenger (Muḥammad). Lot said, “If only I had the power,” because he heard God saying, “It is God who created you of weakness” (Qur’ān 30:54), as an essential trait, “then, after weakness, he gave them strength” (ibid.). The strength occurred (‘araḍat) through giving, hence it is an accidental strength (quwwa ‘araḍiyya), “then after strength He gave weakness and white hair” (ibid.). God’s giving is associated with white hair, while weakness means returning to the fundamental trait of his creation which is expressed in His words, “created you of weakness” (ibid.). Thus, He returned humans to the first state of their creation, as He said: “then...God will return (some of you) to the most despicable state of life, so that after having knowledge they will know nothing” (Qur’ān 16:70). He pointed out that humans are brought back to the state of the first weakness; hence, as regards weakness, an old man is like a child.

1 Hikma Malkiyya. Lot could not overcome his corrupted people, because he was weak, hence he turned to God seeking His help against them. Chittick, “Chapter Headings,” p. 23.

2 A very important poet of Yathrib (al-Madīna). See on him E 12.

3 Bukhārī, LX:11 (3372).

No prophet has been sent before he has reached the age of forty, at which time one begins to decline and weaken. For this reason, Lot said: "If only I had the power," (meaning that this situation) requires effective will. If you ask: "What prevents him from having an effective will, which exists in the followers who travel on the way and the messengers are most worthy of it?" We shall answer: "You are right, but you lack another knowledge, because knowledge does not leave to the will (128) the power to act freely (taṣarruf)." Whenever knowledge increases, the power to act freely decreases, because of the will.

Two aspects explain this: The first is one's firm awareness of the station of servanthood ('ubūdiyya) and his consideration of the root of his natural creation, and the second is the unity of the one who acts freely and the one freely acted upon. He (the prophet) did not know to whom he should direct his will, and this prevented him from exercising it. In this state (mashhad), he saw that his opponent did not deviate from his reality and the state of his fixed entity and absence. That which appears in existence was only that which exists as an absent fixed entity. (His opponent) neither exceeded his reality nor infringed on his way. Designating this way, "opposition" is only accidental matter, which the veil over human eyes makes appear, as God said about them: "...but most of them do not know.⁴ They know the manifest side of life in this world, but are heedless of the next" (Qur'ān 30:6–7). This emerges from the word hearts (qulūb)⁵ in their saying, "Our hearts are covered" (Qur'ān 2:88), meaning (our hearts) are in wrapping, that is, cover which prevents (literally: conceals) them from perceiving things as they really are. This and similar (situations) hinder the knower from acting freely.

Shaykh Abū 'Abdallah ibn Qā'id asked Shaykh Abū al-Su'ūd ibn al-Shibl.⁶ "Why do you not act freely?" Abū al-Su'ūd answered: "I leave God to act freely for me as He wills." By this he means what God said commanding Muḥammad: "Make Him your agent (wakīl)" (Qur'ān 73:9). The agent is the one who acts freely. Moreover, Muḥammad heard God saying: "Spend from what We gave you as substitutes" (Qur'ān 57:7). Abū al-Su'ūd and the gnostics knew that that which was in his hand did not belong to him and that he is just a substitute. Then the Real actually said to him: "Make Me an agent of the matter over which I made you a substitute and granted you mastery." Abū al-Su'ūd obeyed God and made Him an agent. How (129) can a will, by which one acts freely, remain for the one who witnesses this matter, while the will acts only through the combination of all one's powers (jam'iyya),⁷ and no room is left for anything else? The knowledge (of this matter) makes him aloof from this jam'iyya. Thus, the knower whose knowledge is perfect appears as totally incapable and weak.

4 The beginning of the verse reads: "It is God's promise. God does not break His promise." Thus, the ignorance of people refers to God's promise; however, Ibn al-'Arabī transfers, as he often does, the subject matter so that it fits his aim.

5 Read qulūb instead of maqlūb, which has no meaning here.

One of the Substitutes (abdāl)⁸ said to Shaykh ‘Abd al-Razzāq:⁹ “After greeting Abū Madyan ask him why nothing is difficult for us, while things are difficult for you, notwithstanding, we desire your station and you do not desire ours?” This was the situation of Abū Madyan, who had attained this station and others, whereas we are more complete in weakness and incapability than him. Nevertheless, this Substitute said to him what he said. This story refers to the same matter (with which we are dealing).

Regarding this station, Muḥammad said about God’s order to him to (act): “I do not know what will be done with me or you; I follow only what is revealed to me” (Qur’ān 46:9, trans. AH). The Messenger should act according to what is revealed to him; he has nothing else. If it was revealed to him with certainty to act, he acted, and if he was prevented from acting, he abstained from acting. If he was given the choice (to act or not), he chose not to act, unless his knowledge was defective (and he chose to act). Abū al-Su‘ūd said to those who believed in him: “Fifteen years ago, God gave me (the ability) to act freely, but I did not act, because of a display of affectedness.” This is arrogance (idlāl). As for ourselves, we did not act not because of a display of affectedness, which means to prefer acting, but because of perfect knowledge, for knowledge does not require an act through choice. When the knower acts freely in the world by his will, his act derives from a divine command and compulsion, not from choice. No doubt, the position of the prophetic mission (risāla) requires (the ability of the prophet) to act freely so that his mission will be accepted and that what appears in him will affirm his mission in the eyes of his community and his people in order that God’s religion will be made manifest. The case of the saint (walī) is different. Notwithstanding, the messenger does not require (the ability to act freely) manifestly, because the messenger (130) has compassion for his people and he does not want to exaggerate in manifesting the (divine) argument against them,¹⁰ for (the appearance of this argument) might cause their destruction, and he wants their subsistence.

The messenger also knew that if a miracle (al-amr al-mu‘jiz)¹¹ appears to the community, some will believe when seeing the miracle; others, aware of its veracity, will nevertheless deny it in disbelief out of evilness, arrogance and envy; and still others ascribe it to magic and delusion.¹² Since the messengers perceived that the believers are only those in whose hearts God aroused the light of belief, and that when a person does not contemplate through this light called belief, a miracle is of no benefit to him, they refused to require miracles, because their effect neither embraces these (people) who see them nor does it enter their hearts. Regarding the most perfect of all messengers and the wisest and most righteous of all creatures, God said: “You will not guide whom you want to guide, but God will guide whom He wants” (Qur’ān 28:56).

If the will (himma) necessarily¹³ had affected (its object), then none would have been more perfect, elevated and stronger than God’s Messenger regarding this power. In fact, the Messenger’s will did not influence his uncle, Abū Ṭālib, to become a Muslim and the above-mentioned verse was sent down regarding him. For this reason, God said referring to Muḥammad that he should only convey (the divine message to the people): “It is not incumbent on you to guide them, but God will guide whom He wants” (Qur’ān 2:272). And He adds in sūrat al-qaṣaṣ (28): “And He knows best those who are rightly guided” (Qur’ān 28:56). By “by those who are rightly guided,” He means those who made Him know their being guided in the state of their absence through their fixed entities.¹⁴ God affirmed that knowledge follows the thing known (al-ma’lūm). Whoever is a believer in his state of being a fixed entity and in his state of absence appears as a believer in the state of his concrete existence. God knows the future position of the believer, and for this reason He said: “And He knows best those who are rightly guided” (ibid.). Since He said this, He also said: “My statement cannot be changed” (Qur’ān 50:29), because My statement follows exactly My knowledge of My creatures – “And I do not wrong My servants” (ibid.), meaning I do not predetermine their unbelief, thus making them unhappy, then require them to do what they are incapable of doing. But I do treat them only in keeping with Our knowledge of them, and We know them only through what they give us, that is, their exact essence. If there is any wrongness, (it derives from them) and they are the wrongdoers. For this reason, God said: “But (131) they wronged themselves” (Qur’ān 2:57). Hence, God did not wrong them. In like manner, We said to them only what Our essence gave Us to say to them. And Our essence is too known to Us in its exact state to say this and not that. We say only what We know to say. We have the privilege to say, and they have the privilege to obey or not upon hearing (Our words).¹⁵

¹³ The author means without the intervention of God.

¹⁵ Strangely enough, Ibn al-‘Arabī gives the human the choice to act or not, and this capacity to choose contradicts what he said previously about the decree of the fixed entities. Also, the Greatest Master contradicts himself when saying that he knows how God’s essence acts, whereas he states many times that God’s essence cannot be known.

Everything is from Us and from them/learning of this is from Us and from them

If they are not from Us/We no doubt are from them

So realize, O my friend, this wisdom of spiritual power that exists in the essence of Lot, for it is the core of knowledge.

The mystery is now manifest to you/and the matter is evident

That which is called uneven/is included in the even¹⁶

¹⁶ In this image, Ibn al-ʿArabī seems to say that just as the uneven is included in the even, so vice versa, meaning just as God is within us, we are within God.

14 The bezel of the wisdom of predetermination¹ exists in the essence of Ezra

(131) Know that the decree (qaḍāʾ) is God's judgment of things established by His knowledge of and about them. God's knowledge concerning things is in keeping with what the objects of knowledge give, that is, their exact essences.² Determination (qadar)³ means appointing the time for the exact states of things without any addition (to them). The decreeing of things is established by the essences of things. This is the very mystery of determination "for whoever has a heart, for whoever listens and bears witness" (Qur'ān 50:37) "and to God belongs the conclusive argument" (Qur'ān 6:149). That is because the judge (ḥākim) actually follows the essence of the issue he judges and its requirements, and the one who is judged judges the judge in complying with the former's essence. Thus, every judge is equal to the one who is judged through and in which he judges, whoever the judge (132) may be. Hence, be aware of this issue, for determination is unknown only because of its intense manifestation; it is unknown, and hence people seek it and persist in their seeking.

Know that God's messengers, in their capacity as messengers and not as saints and gnostics, occupy the same levels as their communities. The knowledge with which they have been sent corresponds to the needs of their community, no more and no less. Now, the communities excel (tafāḍala) each other, some are greater than others. Hence, the messengers excel regarding their knowledge of the message according to the level of their communities, as God said: "We preferred some of these messengers to others" (Qur'ān 2:253). Similarly, the messengers, as regards their knowledge of the sciences and rules which derives from their essences, also differ in excellence from each other in keeping with their predispositions, as God said: "We preferred some prophets to others" (Qur'ān 17:55). God said concerning creatures: "God preferred some of you to others regarding sustenance” (Qur’ān 16:71). Sustenance is divided into spiritual like kinds of knowledge and sensual like foods. The Real sends down sustenance only in keeping with a “known measure,” (Qur’ān 15:21) that is, deservingness required by the creatures, for God “gives everything (its measure) of creation” (Qur’ān 20:50), “and He sends down (things) in the measure He wills” (Qur’ān 42:27). He only wills what He knows and judges, and as we said above, His knowledge follows the known object.

1 Ḥikma qadariyya.

2 The notion that knowledge follows the object of knowledge is here reiterated. See the preceding chapter and ch. 5.

3 Generally in Islamic theology qaḍāʾ means predetermination, while a qadar decree appoints time. L. Gardet, "al-Ḳaḍāʾ wa'l-Ḳadar," E I2. Ibn al-ʿArabī adopts in principle this division ascribing predestination to the fixed entities in God's thought, and the decree in time to the concretization of the fixed entities in a certain time. Chittick, "Chapter Headings," pp. 23f.

The appointment of time belongs to the known thing, and also the decree, knowledge, desire and will follow the determination (qadar).⁴ The mystery of determination is one of the loftiest kinds of knowledge, and God causes only those who are particularized by perfect knowledge to understand it. Knowledge of the mystery of determination brings about both absolute repose and painful suffering for the knower. Thus, it causes two contradictory effects. Through this mystery God describes Himself as Wrathful and Content, and through it the divine names oppose each other. Its reality (the reality of this mystery) judges both the absolute existence and the limited existence, and nothing is more perfect (133), stronger, greater than it, because of its general determination and its judgment of the contingent appearances and the essences of things.⁵

Since the prophets learn their knowledge only from specific divine revelations, their hearts are bereft of rational contemplation, because they know the intellect’s inadequacy with respect to the rational perception of things as they really are. In like manner, divine communication is unable to perceive what can be perceived only by mystical experience. Consequently, perfect knowledge remains only within the confines of divine self-manifestation and in the Real’s removing of the veils covering the hearts and eyes so that they are able to perceive things, eternal and contingent, nonexistent and existent, impossible, necessary and possible, as they really are in their essences.

Since Ezra sought the unique way, he was rebuked, as it was related in a tradition.⁶ Had he sought revelation as we mentioned, maybe he would not have been rebuked regarding this matter. The proof of his heart’s inadequacy is the question asked in one event: “How will God revive (this town) after its destruction?” (Qur’ān 2:259) We think that in this verse Ezra resembles Abraham, who said: “My Lord, show me how you revive the dead” (Qur’ān 2:260). This (question) requires an actual response which the Real made manifest in the Qur’ān, saying “God made him die for hundred years then revived him” (ibid., 259) and: “Look at the bones, how we revive them then cover them with flesh” (ibid.). He really saw how bodies grow, thus God showed him the modality (kayfiyya) (through which bodies are restored to life).

4 The last sentence shows that essentially no difference obtains between qaḍā’ and qadar in that both decisions follow the known thing. The only difference is the time element, which the author ascribes to qadar in the beginning of this chapter but confuses in the last sentence with qaḍā’.

5 Kāshānī, p. 337.

6 See this tradition below.

Then he asked about God's predetermination, which can be perceived only through revelation of things in their state of fixed entity, (that is), of nonexistence. Ezra was not given this (knowledge), for it belongs only to divine perception, and only God knows it, because this knowledge is the first keys, I mean, "the hidden keys which none knows but He" (Qur'ān 6:59). God informs only those of His servants He wills about some of these things.

(134) Know that these are called keys only in the state of opening (fath); the state of opening is the state of linking the act of bringing into being and the things brought into being, or if you wish, say the state of the connecting of God's power (qudra) to the object of this power (maqḍūr). Only God has experience (dhawq)⁷ of this act. Regarding this (the acts of connection), no manifestation or revelation occurs, because power and (the ability) to act belong to God alone, for he possesses the absolute existence which cannot be limited. Since we are aware of God's rebuking Ezra for his request concerning predetermination, we know that he asked for knowledge of predetermination and the power connected to the object of power. Only the one who has absolute existence can require this knowledge and power. Ezra asked for something the existence of which cannot be experienced by humans, for the modalities (of creation) are perceived only through experience.

As for the tradition we related, that is, what God revealed to Ezra to the effect that "if you do not stop, I will erase your name from the register of prophecy,"⁸ meaning I will remove from you (My) way of giving information and give you (the knowledge of things) through manifestation. (Now) manifestation occurs only in keeping with your predisposition, through which experiential perception takes place, hence you will know that your perception mirrors your predisposition. Then you contemplate the thing you sought, and if not seeing it, you know that the predisposition you sought is lost and that ability is one of the qualities of the divine essence. You know that God gives everything (its measure) of creation, and He withheld from you this unique predisposition; it is not your (measure) of creation. If it had been your (measure) of creation, the Real, who said that "He gives everything (its measure) of creation" (Qur'ān 20:50), would have given you this (predisposition). In this case, you yourself should abstain from making this request, to avoid the need of a divine prohibition. This was God's providence for Ezra; some people know it and others do not.⁹

Know that Sainthood (walāya)¹⁰ is (like) the all-encompassing general sphere (al-falak al-muḥīṭ);¹¹ for this reason it never stops and has (the function) of general prophecy (al-inbā' al-āmm). However, the prophecy of legislation (nubuwwat

⁸ Ibrāhīm ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥalabī, Niʿmat al-dharʿa fī nuṣrat al-sharʿa, Dār al-Masīr, al-Riyāḍ 1998, p. 113.

⁹ This paragraph exemplifies Ibn al-ʿArabī's way of writing in the present volume, which is full of repetitive explanations.

¹¹ Very probably, our author uses this astronomical term to denote both the steadfastness and the exaltedness of walāya.

al-tashrīf) and mission (risāla) came to an end. It ended with Muḥammad, (135) for no prophet has come after him, that is, a lawgiver or a person for whom a law is established, and no messenger, who is a lawgiver.¹² This report (about the difference between a prophet or messenger who is a lawgiver and God's saint [walī]) was a mortal blow to God's saints, because it involves the end of perfect and complete servanthood (which is enjoyed only by prophets). However, (on the other hand) the specific names "prophet" and "messenger" do not apply to God, because the servant does not want to share a name with his Lord.¹³ Hence, God is not called by "prophet" or "messenger," but is named "friend" (saint) and described by that name, hence He said: "God is the friend (walī) of the believers" (Qur'ān 2:257) and "He is the Friend, the Praiseworthy" (Qur'ān 42:28). This name (walī) never ends and is applied to God's servants in this world and the world to come. Because of the end of prophecy and mission, no name has remained which is specifically applied to the servant and not to God.

However, God still assists (laṭāfa) His servants by leaving to them general prophecy (al-nubuwwa al-ʿamma) in which there is no legislation. Yet, He has left to them legislation through independent judgment (ijtihād) with the aim of establishing rules. He has bequeathed their scholars the power of legislation, saying "The scholars are the heirs of the prophets."¹⁴ In this there is an inheritance only of the scholars' independent making of laws. If you observe a prophet speaking on matters not including legislation, he speaks in his capacity as a saint and a gnostic. For this reason, his position as a scholar is more complete and perfect than that of a messenger or legislator. If you hear one of the people of God saying or transmitting to you (the notion) that sainthood is higher than prophecy, he adds nothing to what we have said. Or if he says that the saint is above the prophet and the messenger, he means by this (the qualities) of one person, that is, the Messenger (Muḥammad) as a saint, is more complete than that of a prophet messenger. This does not mean that the saint who follows the Prophet is higher than the Prophet, for the follower never attains the rank of the one he follows in the way in which he follows him, because if he had attained his rank, he would not have been his follower. So understand (this)!

The (position) of the messenger and the lawgiving prophet derives from sainthood (walāya) and knowledge. Do you not see that God ordered the Prophet to seek increase in knowledge and not in anything else, hence he said, ordering him, "and say, O my Lord (136) increase my knowledge!" (Qur'ān 20:114) That is because you know that the law means the obligation (taklīf) to perform specific acts and the prohibition to perform others, and the place of this obligation is this world which will come to an end. However, sainthood is not like an obligation, because if it had been terminated, it would have been terminated because of itself,¹⁵ just as the mission ended because of itself. Had sainthood been terminated because of itself, its name would not have remained. But the name “saint” remains God’s name, and this name is assimilated and realized by His servants and is associated with them.

This is his saying to Ezra: If you do not stop to ask about the essence of predetermination, I will erase your name from the register of prophecy. Then the issue (of predetermination) will reach you through revelation and self-manifestation; the name “messenger” and “prophet” applied to you will disappear, but sainthood will remain. However, since the circumstances demonstrate that God’s address to him took the form of a threat, he knew, whenever these circumstances were connected to a divine address, that this was a threat to deprive him of some specific characteristics of sainthood in this world, for prophecy and mission are some traits of sainthood among others. Then he knew that he was superior to the saint who was deprived of legislative prophecy and mission.

However, another possible state that prophecy requires and that is connected to a saint proves this trait is a promise and not a threat. This is because his request is acceptable, for the prophet is a unique saint. By (observing) circumstances, the saint knows it is inconceivable that the prophet who shares in sainthood should do anything he knows God does not will or (try) to do anything that is impossible. If these circumstances affect one whom they affect in a stable condition, the divine address for him “I will erase your name from the register of prophecy” is a threat. This statement becomes a report that points to the sublimity of a remaining position. This position is for the prophets and messengers in the world (137) to come, which is not a place where laws are observed by the people who enter Paradise or those come to Hell.

We have limited (our discussion) to going into the two abodes, Paradise and Hell, for in the Day of Resurrection God gives laws to people who lived between two eras of prophets, to young children and the insane.¹⁶ They will be gathered in one place to do justice, to punish the wrongdoers and to reward the people of Paradise.

When they are gathered in one place secluded from the others, God will send to them a prophet, who is the best individual among them, and this prophet will bring a fire and it will be presented to them on this day, and he will say: “I am the messenger of the Real to you.” Some of them will believe in him and some will not. And he will say to them: “Enter into this fire with your souls, and whoever obeys me will be saved and enter Paradise, and whoever disobeys me and offends my command will perish and be among the people of Hell.” (It will happen actually): Whoever among them obeys the prophet and throws himself into the fire will be happy and be rewarded for his acts; he will find this fire cool and peaceful. Whoever disobeys him deserves punishment and will enter into the fire and dwell therein because of his disobedient deeds, so that God will do justice to his servants. This corresponds to God's words, "On the Day when matters become dire" (Qur'ān 68:42, trans. AH), that is, a grave affair of the events of the Hereafter, and "they will be called to prostrate themselves" (ibid.), which means obligation and legislation. Among them are those who are able (to prostrate themselves) and those who are not. God said regarding the latter: "they will be called to prostrate themselves, but they will not be able to do so" (ibid.), just as some servants, like Abū Jahl¹⁷ and others, could not obey God's command in this world. This is the measure of legislation, which will be left in the world to come on the Day of Resurrection, before the entry into Paradise and Hell. For this reason we have limited our discussion. Praise be to God.

¹⁷ Abū Jahl was one of the staunch enemies of the Prophet in Mecca. See Qur'ān 96:6, 7, and their commentaries.

15 The bezel of the prophetic wisdom¹ exists in the essence of Jesus

(138) From the water of Maryam or from the breath of Jibrīl/in the form of a human being produced of clay

The spirit came into being in an essence untainted/of the Nature which is called *sijjīn*²

For this reason, his stay (in heaven) lasted by decree for a long time/more than a thousand years

It was a spirit of God not from another, hence/he revived the dead and produced birds out of clay

Till his association with His Lord/through which he influenced the high and the low (people) became valid

God purified his body and cleansed/his spirit and made him like Himself in (his power) of creation³

Know that one of the traits of the spirits is that everything they tread on becomes alive and life permeates throughout it. For this reason, al-Sāmīrī,⁴ knowing this affair, took a portion of sand from the messenger's tracks, who was Jibrīl, that is, the Spirit. Since al-Sāmīrī realized it was Jibrīl, he knew that life permeated everything Jibrīl trod on. Hence, he took a portion of sand from the tracks of the messenger,⁵ either with his hands (qabḍa) or with his two fingers (qabṣa), that is, a handful or with the tips of his fingers.⁶ He threw the sand at the calf and the calf lowed, for the voice of the cow is lowing. Had he established (the idol) in some other form, the form established would have made the appropriate sound, such as the grumbling of camels, the bleating of lambs and sheep, and the speaking of human beings.

1 According to al-Qaysarī and al-Kāshānī, Ibn al-ʿArabī ascribes prophecy to Jesus, because his prophecy is eternal. Chittick, "Chapter Headings," p. 25.

2 A unique word in the Qurʾān, which mainly designates a heavenly book or the lowest place on earth in which the Devil and his followers reside. E12.

3 Because like God, Jesus created birds out of clay.

4 There is a discussion in Qurʾān exegesis on the essence of this figure. See, for example, Ibn Kathīr, Tafsīr, Vol. IV, p. 534 (on Qurʾān 20:95); Al-Rāzī, Mafātīḥ al-ghayb, part 22, p. 101 (on Qurʾān 20:85).

5 Qurʾān 20:96,

6 Wehr's dictionary defines qabṣa as follows: "as much as may be taken between the finger and the thumb, a pinch."

This measure of life which permeates things is called divine nature (lāhūt), and human nature (nāsūt) is the substrate in which this spirit dwells. Nāsūt is called spirit, because of that which inheres in it. When the trustworthy spirit (al-rūḥ al-amīn – Qurʾān 26:193), Jibrīl, took on the shape of a perfect human being before Maryam (139), she imagined that he was a man who wanted to lie with her, hence she sought refuge in God with all her heart, so that God would save her from this person, because she knew that this was prohibited. As a result, she experienced the complete presence of God, which is the essential spirit (al-rūḥ al-maʿnawī). Had Jibrīl blown his breath into her when she was in this state, Jesus would have been born such that none would have tolerated him, because of his ill-temperedness which derived from his mother's state. When he (Jibrīl) said to her, "I am but a messenger of your Lord" and I came "to grant to you a pure son" (Qurʾān 19:19), she was relieved of her depression and was delighted. At that very moment he blew Jesus into her.

Jibrīl was transmitting God's word to Maryam just as a messenger transmits God's word to his community. These are God's words: "(Jesus, the son of Maryam, was God's messenger) and His word which He conveyed to Maryam and a spirit from Him" (Qurʾān 4:171). Thus, a desire arose in Maryam. As a result, the body of Jesus was created from the real water of Maryam and the imaginary water of Jibrīl,⁷ which pervaded the moisture of his breath, because the breath of an animate being contains humidity, an element of water in it. The body of Jesus was composed of imagined and real water, and he appeared in the form of a human being because of his mother and because of Jibrīl's taking the form of a human being. (All this happened) to make the creation of this human species occur in the usual way.⁸

Jesus appeared as one who revived the dead, because he was a divine spirit. In this act, revivification belonged to God and the breath to Jesus, just as the breath belongs to Jibrīl and the essence of creation (literally: the word) to God. Hence his revivification of the dead was real with respect to his breath, just as he appeared out of the form of his mother. His revivification was also assumed as his own act, but actually it was God's act. Thus, in his reality in which he was created, he combined (the real and the imagined aspects), as we said, he was created of imagined and real water. Consequently, revivification is ascribed to him in a real manner in one respect, and in an imagined manner (140) in another. It was said about Him that in a real manner "he revives the dead" (Qurʾān 42:9) and in an imagined manner: "You breathed into it (the clay) and it became a bird by God's permission" (Qurʾān

⁷ Qurʾān 86:6–7.

⁸ I do not know for certain what Ibn al-ʿArabī means when he says "this human species." Possibly he means that Jesus was born like all human beings. However, Maryam's conception was extraordinary, and regarding this, it is inconceivable to state that it was the usual way. Thus, only the birth was as usual; however, our author does not speak here in an exact manner. On Jesus' spirit see Souad Hakim, "The Spirit and the Son of the Spirit," Journal of the Muhyiddin Ibn ʿArabi Society 31 (2002):1–29.

5:110).⁹ The phrase “by God’s permission” is connected to “it became,” not to “you breathed.”¹⁰ It is also possible that the agent who is Jesus breathed into the clay, and as a result the clay became a corporeal, sentient form. In like manner (we should deal with) “he cured the blind and the leprous” (ibid.) and all that is ascribed to him and to God’s permission in the phrases “by My permission” or “by God’s permission.” If “by God’s permission” is connected with breathing, then he who breathes has permission to breathe, and the bird becomes alive through the one who breathes with God’s permission. If the breather does so without God’s permission, (even) then the creation of the bird derives from His permission. In such a case, the agent exists in the word yakūnu (it will be). If this occurrence did not involve imagination and reality (simultaneously), this form would not have these two aspects. However, this matter involves two aspects, because the creation of Jesus involved both.

Jesus sprang from humility to such an extent that his community was ordered “to pay the poll-tax with their own hands (‘an yadin)¹¹ being humiliated” (Qur’ān 9:29), and also if one of them (the Christians) is struck on his cheek he should turn the other cheek toward the one who struck him and not try to overcome his assailant or seek vengeance. This trait of Jesus was inherited from his mother, because the woman is lower and humbler (than the man), for she is under his authority formally and sensually. Jesus’ power to revive and heal derived from Jibrīl’s breath when the latter took a human form. Thus, Jesus revived the dead when he was in a human form. If Jibrīl had not come¹² in the form of a human, but rather in another genus of the genera, whether animal, plant, or mineral, Jesus would have revived (the dead) only after assimilating this genus and appearing in it. Likewise, had Jibrīl come in his luminous form, which is devoid of terrestrial genera and elements, because he does not go beyond his nature, (141) Jesus would have revived the dead only by appearing in this luminous natural form, not in an elemental form, still retaining the human form he received from his mother.

When he was reviving the dead, it was said about him: “he/not he.” Looking at him induced perplexity, just as the intelligent person became perplexed when contemplating Jesus, because the former saw a human being resurrecting the dead, humans not animals, which is a divine trait. (Hence), the seer became perplexed, for he saw a human form that possesses a divine faculty.

Thus, some people believed in incarnation (ḥulūl) and (thought) that he was God, because he revived the dead. For this reason, concealment (kufīr)¹³ was attributed to them, because they concealed God, who revived the dead employing Jesus’ human form. Hence, God said: “Those who said that God was al-masīḥ (Messiah), ⁹ The accurate citation is “by My permission.” “By God’s permission” appears in a parallel verse told by Jesus himself (Qur’ān 3:49).

¹⁰ In this case the agent of creation is God and not Jesus.

¹¹ I translate this phrase on the basis of Uri Rubin’s translation of the Qur’ān into Hebrew (Tel Aviv 2005).

¹² Read wa-law lam (Kāshānī, p. 358) instead of wa-lam in Affifi’s edition, which seems to be a misprint.

¹³ For the meaning of kufīr as concealment, see the third chapter on Noah.

the son of Maryam, are concealers” (Qur’ān 5:17, 72). In their complete saying they combined error and concealment; they did not err, because they said “he is God,” or because of their words, “he is the son of Maryam,” but because they ascribed to God, (who in their view) was responsible for the revivification of the dead, a human mortal form, when they said, “the son of Maryam,” and no doubt he was the son of Maryam. However, the listener imagined that they attributed divinity to a human form, and made divinity the essence of this form, but this they did not do. (Instead) from the beginning, they included God’s essence in the form of a human who is the son of Maryam. Hence, they distinguished between the form and its appearance (literally: its aspect); they did not identify the form with its very appearance, like Jibrīl who took the form of a human and did not breathe (into Maryam), then he breathed. Thus, the breathing is distinguished from the form. Although the breathing issued from the form, the form might remain without breathing, for breathing is not essential to the definition of the form.

For this reason, debate arose among the people of religious communities regarding (142) the nature of Jesus. Some argued from the viewpoint of his mortal human form and said that he was the son of Maryam. On the basis of his apparent human form, others argued that he was related to Jibrīl. Referring to his resurrection of the dead, still others argued that he was related to God’s spirit; that is, through his breath, he brought the dead back to life. Sometimes people imagined that God was in him, sometimes that the angel was in him, and other times that mortality and humanity were in him. Thus, each thinker regarded Jesus according to the form that prevails in him (the thinker). Consequently, Jesus was God’s word, God’s spirit, God’s servant, and these appellations concerning his sentient form are not related to others, but every person is related to his real father, and not to the one who breathed his spirit into the human form. Because when God shaped the human body, as He said, “When I shaped him” (Qur’ān 15:29), it was God who breathed into him his spirit, ascribing the spirit in the human being and his essence to Him. The case of Jesus is different, for the shaping of his body and his human form was included in the spiritual breath, and other humans were not shaped like him.

All existents are God’s words, which will never be exhausted,¹⁴ because they derive from the word “be,” and “be” is God’s word.¹⁵ Can the word “be” be ascribed to God, to his ipseity, so that its essence cannot be known? Or does God descend to the form of him who says “be,” so that the word “be” serves as the reality of this form to which He descends and in which He manifests Himself? Some gnostics adhered to the first view and some to the second, and some others became perplexed not knowing (the solution). This issue can be known only through experience, as when Abū Yazīd (al-Bisṭāmī) breathed into the ant he had killed, restoring it to life. In this moment he knew the One who breathes, and then he breathed. In (this matter) he was like Jesus.¹⁶

¹⁴ Cf. Qur’ān 18:109: “If the whole ocean were ink for writing the words of my Lord, it would run dry before those words were exhausted...” (trans. AH).

¹⁵ Every existent is created by God’s word “be” (kun). See Qur’ān 2:117, 16:40.

¹⁶ Abrahamov, Ibn al-Arabī and the Sufis, pp. 48f.

As for spiritual revivification through knowledge, that is, the divine, eternal, elevated, and luminous life, (143) God said: “Whoever was dead and We restored him to life and established for him light by which he walks among people” (Qur’ān 6:122). Everyone who restores life to a dead soul by the life of knowledge regarding a specific issue connected with the knowledge of God brings him to life, so that he has a light by which he “walks among people,” that is, among his likeness in form.

Had he and us not been/what exists would not have been
 We are really servants/and God is our master
 We are His essence, know (this)!/when you say “a human being”
 Do not be concealed by human being/for He gave you a proof
 If you are real and created¹⁷/you will be merciful through God
 If you feed His creation through Him¹⁸/you will (cause people to) rest and receive good nourishment¹⁹

We give Him what is manifested/in us through Him and He gives us
 The whole matter is divided/between Him and us
 Whoever knows through my heart revives this matter/when He revives us
 We are in Him as beings/essences and pieces of time
 (Whereas) He is not permanent in us/but He gives us life

The proof of what we have said regarding the spiritual breath which joins the mortal human form is that the Real qualifies Himself by the merciful breath (al-nafas al-raḥmānī),²⁰ and that which is qualified by a quality should follow this quality and all that this quality requires. You know that the one who breathes (follows) what the breath (144) requires. For this reason, the divine breath receives the forms of the cosmos. It serves as a material substance for the forms and it is nature itself.

The elements are one of the natural forms as that which is above them and that which derives from them, the latter being the elevated spirits placed above the seven heavens. As for the spirits of the seven heavens and their essences, they are elemental, because they emerge from the smoke²¹ that is generated from the elements. Also the angels who are generated from each heaven are elemental, while those who are above them are natural. For this reason, God described them, the heavenly group, as rivals,²² because nature is self-contradictory, and the self-contradiction which exists in the divine names, that is, the relationships, derives from the breath. Do you not see how the Essence which is beyond this aspect (of self-contradiction) does not need the created beings? For this reason, the cosmos emerged in the form of its originator, that is, the divine breath.

¹⁷ If you are real in essence and created in form, you will be merciful.

¹⁸ You should feed your soul with God’s spirit.

¹⁹ Qur’ān 56:88.

²¹ The identification of the heaven with smoke appears in Qur’ān 41:11.

²² Qur’ān 38:69.

When it is hot, it rises, and when it is cold and humid, it falls, for precipitation belongs to coldness and humidity, and when it is dry, it is stable without trembling. Precipitation drives from coldness and humidity. Do you not see how the physician who wants to give a patient a remedy to drink (first) looks at the sedimentation in his urine? When he sees that it is precipitating, he knows that the illness has completely matured and gives him medication to drink in order to hasten his cure. The urine precipitates only because of its natural humidity and coldness.

God kneaded the clay of the human being with his two hands. Though both are right hands, they confront each other, yet the difference between them is quite evident, even if they are only two, I mean two hands, because that which affects nature is only that which fits her, and nature is self-contradictory. He brought two hands (to create the human being). Since He brought him into existence with two hands, which are ascribed to Him (al-yadayni al-muḍāfayni),²³ He called him bashar, because of His direct connection (mubāshara) (to the creation) fitting this (honorable) act. God did so because (145) of his concern for this human species, and He said to the one (the Devil) who declined prostration before Adam: “What prevented you from prostrating before him whom I created with My own hands, do you deem yourself greater” (Qur’ān 38:75) than one who was like you, that is, (composed of) of elements? “Or are you loftier” (Qur’ān ibid.), than the elements? (In fact) you are not so.

By “loftier” He means one who in his luminous form makes himself loftier than the elemental (beings), even if one is a natural entity. The human being is superior to other elemental species only because of his being created directly (bashar) of clay by God. He is superior to all entities created of elements (but) without direct connection (mubāshara). His rank is above the terrestrial and celestial angels; however, according to the divine statement, the higher angels are better than the human species.

Whoever wishes to know the divine breath should know the cosmos, for whoever knows himself (or his soul) knows his Lord,²⁴ who is manifested in the cosmos. This means that the cosmos manifests itself in the breath of the Merciful who gives vent to the divine names which feel distressed because their effects are not manifested. Hence, God bestows favor on Himself by that which He brought into existence with His breath, for the first effect of His breath was in this divine domain (janāb),²⁵ and afterward the effects of the divine breath do not cease descending (in the cosmos hierarchy) by the divine encompassing release till the last existent thing.

²³ Ibn al-‘Arabī does not express reservations concerning this anthropomorphic picture of the creation of the human being. However, the fact that he uses the verb adāfa (he ascribed) to designate the connection between God and His hands points to some kind of reservation; that is, God does not have hands, but as they are ascribed to him in the Qur’ān, one cannot escape describing Him by this word.

²⁴ For this dictum, see ch. 3, n. 4.

²⁵ Very probably by this effect the author means the appearance of the divine names and attributes. Kāshānī, p. 373.

All things are latent in the essence of the breath/as is light in the essence of dawn

And knowledge through proof is/like daybreak for the sleeper

Because he (the sleeper) sees what I said/(that is) a dream which shows the breath

My words relieve him of every anxiety/when he recites (sūrat) ‘*abasa*²⁶

God manifests Himself to him/who comes seeking burning coal

He (Moses) considered it fire, but it was light/to kings and nightfarers²⁷

(146) If you understand my words/you will know that you are needy

Had he (Moses) sought something else (not fire)/he would have seen the Real in it, and God does not change His way (of self-manifestation)

As for the essence of Jesus (we say) that when the Real placed Himself in the station of “until we know” (Qur’ān 47:31),²⁸ and (in fact) He knew, He asked Jesus about what was ascribed to him, was it true or not, notwithstanding His foreknowledge of this ascription’s occurrence or nonoccurrence. Thus, God said to him: “Did you say to the people take me and my mother as two gods rather than God?” (Qur’ān 5:116) Out of courtesy, one should answer the questioner. Since He manifested Himself to Jesus in this station and form, wisdom required an answer that distinguishes the essence of many, and he said giving precedence to God’s transcendence: “May You be exalted” (subḥānaka, Qur’ān ibid.), Then turning directly to God, he used the word “You” (and he added) “I am not allowed,” with respect to myself in comparison to You, “to say what I have not the right to say,” that is, what my identity and essence require. “If I had said such a thing, You would have known it” (ibid.), for you are the speaker, and whoever says something knows what he says, and you are the tongue by which I speak, as God’s messenger informs us about his Lord in the divine tradition: “I am his tongue by which he speaks.”²⁹ He made His essence similar to the tongue of the speaker, ascribing speech to His servant.

Then the righteous servant completed his answer, saying, “You know what is in myself” (my soul – ibid.), for the speaker is the Real, “while I do not know what” (ibid.) it contains.³⁰ He denied knowledge of Jesus’ essence, with respect to his essence, not referring to his being a speaker and a producer of effects. “Indeed, You are” (innaka anta, ibid.). He says these words (“You are”), (using ²⁶ ‘Abasa means “he frowned” (Qur’ān 80:1). This chapter of the Qur’ān deals mainly with the Resurrection.

²⁷ That is, to the elite and the common people.

²⁸ This verse speaks of God’s trial of the people in order to know their characteristics. However, God knows from eternity these traits, but he wishes to know them from terrestrial phenomena, that is, to know people from their own acts and not from His eternal knowledge. As usual, Ibn al-‘Arabī exploits complete verses and phrases of verses, taking them out of their context for his own objectives.

²⁹ Bukhārī, LXXXI:38 (6502). Ch. 1, n. 81.

the pronouns) of separation and support (al-faṣl wa 'l-ʿimād),³¹ to emphasize and confirm his message, because only God knows absolutely the hidden things (ʿallām al-ghuyūb – ibid.).

(In his answer) he separated and joined together, unified and multiplied, broadened and narrowed, then he said, completing the answer: “I did not say to them but what you commanded me to say” (ibid., 117). First, he denied that he had said, and then he spoke in the affirmative (147) out of courtesy to the questioner. Had he not acted in this manner, he would have been described as lacking in knowledge of the realities, which was far from his conduct. For this reason, he said: “but what you commanded me to say” (ibid.), (which means) You are the speaker through my tongue, and You are my tongue.

(Now), think how subtle and precise is the following spiritual and divine message: (Jesus said) “Worship God”! (ibid.). He introduced the name God (allāh), because the worshipers differ in their religious observances and because of the variety of religions; he did not particularize a name, but rather introduced the name which embraces all (religions). Then he said: “My Lord and your Lord” (ibid.). It is well known that one’s relationship with a certain existent lord differs from one’s relationship with another. For this reason, when he said, “my Lord and your Lord,” he distinguished between two appellations; the first applies to the speaker and the second to the addressee. (He said), “but what you commanded me to say” (ibid.), thus he affirmed himself as one who is commanded, which meant his being only a worshiper, for the one commanded is supposed to obey, even if he does not.

Since the command descends according to the law of ranks, everyone who appears in a certain rank is characterized by the reality that this rank grants. The rank of the commanded possesses a law which appears in every commanded person, just as the rank of the commander possesses a law which is manifested in every commander. The Real says: “Observe the prayer” (Qurʾān 2:43), for He is the commander, while the obliged person (mukallaḥ)³² is the commanded.³³ And the servant says: “O my Lord, forgive me” (Qurʾān 7:151, 38:35, 71:28), for he is the commander, and the Real is the commanded. What the Real requires from the servant by His command is the same as what the servant requires from the Real by his command. For this reason, every request is necessarily complied with, even if its compliance is postponed, just as some people who are obliged to observe a prayer time postpone their prayer, and when possible pray at another time. Thus, compliance with the request is necessary if only by intention.

Then he (Jesus) said: “I was (a witness) over them” (Qurʾān 5:117), and he did not say over me with them, as he said, “my Lord and your Lord” (ibid.), “(I was) a witness during my stay among them” (ibid.), because prophets are (148)

31 W. Wright, A Grammar of the Arabic Language, Cambridge 1967, II, p. 259.

32 This term can also be translated as “one who is charged with responsibilities.” Izutsu, p. 171.

33 I read wa 'l-mukallaḥ (huwa) al-ma'mūr instead of al-mukallaḥ al-ma'mūr in the text, because of the structure of the following sentence.

witnesses over their communities so long as they stay in them. “When You took my soul” (ibid.), meaning when You raised me to Yourself,³⁴ concealing them from me and me from them, “You were the watcher over them” (ibid.) not in my matter but in theirs, for You were their sight, which required observation.

The person’s witnessing of himself is like the Real’s witnessing of him. (Jesus) made Him a watcher through this name (al-raqīb), because He described himself as a witness. Wishing to distinguish between himself and his Lord, he would be known as (a witness), because of his being a servant, and the Real is the Real, because He is his Lord. He called himself a witness and the Real the Watcher, giving precedence to his people over himself and saying: “Over them (I was) a witness during my stay among them” (‘alayhim shahīdan), while postponing their appearance in relation to the Real, saying, “You were the Watcher over them” (ibid.), because the Lord merits precedence in rank.

Then he let (us) know that the Real, the Watcher, bears the name which Jesus attributed to himself, that is, the Witness, in his words “a witness over them” (ibid.). And he said: “You are Witness of everything” (ibid., wa-anta ‘alā kull shay’ shahīd); the word “every” (kull) denotes generality, while “thing” denotes the most undefined word. He introduced the name “witness,” because He is the Witness of every witnessed thing in keeping with what this witnessed thing requires. He pointed out that the Real is the Witness of Jesus’ people, saying, “over them (I was) a witness during my stay among them” (ibid.). This is the witness of the Real as embodied in Jesus’ matter, just as it was proved that He was his tongue, hearing and seeing.

Then Jesus expressed a phrase referring to himself and another referring to Muḥammad. As for the phrase that belonged to Jesus, it was Jesus speaking God’s message about him in His book, and as for Muḥammad’s phrase, it reached him in a certain place, and he uttered it repeatedly without turning to another phrase until dawn’s first light. “If you punish them, (it is) because they are Your servants, and if You forgive them, (it is) because You are the All-mighty, the All-Wise” (ibid., 118). Both the word “they” and the word “he” are third-person pronouns³⁵ (149), as he said: “They were the ones who disbelieved” (Qur’ān 48:25, AH), using the third-person pronoun (the pronoun of the concealed), for hiddenness concealed them from what is meant by the witnessed one who is present (al-mashhūd al-ḥāḍir).³⁶ And he said, “If you punish them” (ibid.) with the third-person pronoun, which is the very veil that conceals them from the Real. He reminded them of God before they will be present (on the Day of Resurrection), and when they will be in attendance before Him, the heaven will dominate the dough and will make the dough like itself. “Because they are Your servants,” (he said), particularizing his form of address (in the second-person pronoun) because of their state of unity with God.

No humiliation is greater than that of servants, because they are incapable of acting freely, for they submit to the will of their master, who has no partner in the dominion over them. That is because he said: “Your servants.” Hence, he singled them out. By punishment he meant their humiliation, and no people were humiliated more than they, because they were servants. Their essences required their being humiliated, hence You did not demean them any less than is required by their essences.

³⁴ Cf. Qur’ān 3:55.

³⁵ Literally: pronoun of the hidden or the concealed (damīr al-ghā’ib).

³⁶ Meaning: Jesus.

“If You forgive (taghfir) them” means if You conceal them from being punished as they deserve, because of their transgression; that is, You prepared a cover for them to conceal them from punishment and shield them from it.³⁷ “Because You are the All-Mighty” (the All-Mighty – al-‘azīz) means the one whose protection is unassailable (al-manī al-ḥimā).³⁸ When the Real gives this name to one of His servants, He is called the Strengtheners (al-mu‘izz), and the one who is given this name is called mighty (al-‘azīz). The one whose protection is unassailable is kept from the harm of punishment and suffering intended by God as the Punisher and Afflicter. He presented the pronoun of separation and support (al-faṣl wa’l-‘imād)³⁹ to emphasize his message and as a safeguard of the coherence of his verse: “You are the Knower of the hidden things” and “You are the Watcher over them.” Likewise he said: “Because You are the All-Mighty, the All-Wise.” (In this verse) Jesus asked God, beseeching Him in his request all nightlong until daybreak for an answer. Had he heard an answer after the first question he would not have repeated (his request). The Real detailed the reasons for their punishment and Jesus responded (150) each time repeating this verse (ibid., 118). Had he considered God’s presentation preferable, he would have invoked God against them, not for them. Jesus put before God what they deserved, that is, submission to God and their exposing to His forgiveness.

It is related that when the Real loves the voice of his servant invoking Him, He postpones His response to him until the servant repeats his request out of His love for him and not out of His turning away from him. For this reason, he indicates the name “the All-Wise,” because he who is wise puts things in their proper places and does not allow them to deviate from what their realities require through their attributes. Thus, the wise is he who knows well the order of things. Jesus repeated this verse, because he possessed great knowledge of God. Whoever recites (the Qur’ān) should recite it in this manner, otherwise silence is more appropriate for him.

If God guides a servant to speak of something, He guides him only because He wishes to respond to him and satisfy his need. Hence, let no one think that what one is directed to comes late. Let him rather persist like the Messenger’s persistence in his repetition of this verse in all his states, so that he may hear with his ears or with his inner hearing (sam), in whatever way you want, or in whatever way God may make him⁴⁰ hear His response. If God rewards you with a request of the tongue, He will make you hear with your ear, and if He rewards you with a spiritual request, He will make you hear with your inner hearing.

³⁷ For the verb ghafara in the meaning of “he concealed,” see the beginning of p. 74 of the Arabic text.

³⁸ Ibn al-‘Arabī uses here improper annexation (iḍāfa ghayr ḥaqīqīyya). Wright, Grammar, II, p. 64.

⁴⁰ The text has “make you hear” (asma‘aka).

16 The bezel of the wisdom of mercy¹ exists in the essence of Solomon

(151) “It” (Qur’ān 27:30), meaning the letter, “is from Solomon” (ibid.), “and it is” (ibid.), that is, its contents are (written) “in the name of God, the All-Merciful and the All-Compassionate” (ibid.). Some people learned the precedence of Solomon’s name over God’s name, but (this conclusion) is wrong. What is said concerning this precedence is improper with respect to Solomon’s knowledge of God. How could their utterances be appropriate, for as Bilqīs² said about this: “A honorable letter has been delivered to me” (ibid. 29), that is, one honoring her? Possibly what stirred them to speak as they did was the incident in which Chosroes tore up the Prophet’s letter. However, he did not tear it up until he had read it and knew its contents. So too would Bilqīs have done, had she not been guided as she was, and the letter would not have been protected from being burned, whether its honorable sender’s name had been given precedence over God’s (name) or not.

Solomon introduced two kinds of mercy: the mercy of favor (raḥmat al-imtinnān) and the mercy of obligation (raḥmat al-wujūb), which correspond to the All-Merciful (al-raḥmān) and the All-Compassionate (al-raḥīm), respectively. As the All-Merciful He bestows His favors freely, and as the All-Compassionate He is obliged to give favors. This obligation derives from His bestowal; the All-Compassionate is included in the All-Merciful. That is because God decreed on Himself mercy³ for (the benefit of) the servant, because the Real mentions the acts carried out by the servant for which he deserves mercy. Mercy is incumbent on God, and He ordained it for Himself, I mean the mercy of obligation. Servants who belong to this kind (of people who carry out acts and deserve mercy) know the identity of the one who carries out their acts.

Human acts are divided among eight organs. The Real informed us that He is the essence of every organ, hence the agent of human acts is solely the Real,

1 Solomon is associated with Mercy, because in his letter to Queen Bilqīs he mentioned God the All-Merciful, the All-Compassionate. Qur’ān 27:29–30. See below.

2 This is the name of the Queen of Sheba in the Qur’ān. At first Ibn al-‘Arabī thought that she was born to a father of the demons (abūhā min al-jinn) and to a human mother (ummuhā min al-ins), then he changed his mind and denied his first view of her. Al-Mu‘jam, pp. 215.

3 Qur’ān 6:54.

while the form (of the act) (152) belongs to the servant.⁴ The essence is contained in him (the servant), that is, only His name, because He is the essence of what is manifested. (Because God is manifested in things) He is called Creation (khalq) and because of Him the names The Manifest and the Last belong to the servant, given that he was nonexistent then existent. And because the manifestation of the servant and his acts depend on Him, he bears the names The Hidden and The First. Thus, when you see creation, you see the First and the Last, the Manifest and the Hidden.

This knowledge⁵ was not concealed from Solomon, but rather it was part of the dominion (he enjoyed over things) which was appropriate to none after him, that is, the manifestation of his dominion in the sensuous world. Muḥammad was given the same trait Solomon received, but he did not manifest it. God gave Muḥammad the power to overcome a demon which came to him in the night to kill him. He planned to seize and tie it to one of the mosque's columns until morning so that the children of al-Madīna could play with it.⁶ He (Muḥammad) mentioned Solomon's request, but God thwarted it. Although Muḥammad was granted power, he did not manifest it, while Solomon did. Solomon (asked God to grant him) a dominion (mulk),⁷ not absolute dominion, hence we know that he wished to possess some dominion. We are aware that other people shared with him each part of the dominion granted to him by God, but he was particularized by joining all these parts together and by the report about the manifested demon. Thus, he was particularized by the aggregation of all parts of dominion and by its manifestation. Had Muḥammad not spoken in the tradition that "God enabled me to (overcome the demon)," we would have said that since he did not wish to seize it, God reminded him of Solomon's request. That way he might know that God had not granted him power to seize it. Thus, God denied him (his request). Since he said, "God enabled me to (overcome the demon)," we know that God granted him the power to act freely. And God reminded him and he remembered Solomon's request, (thus) teaching himself how to behave. As a result, we learn in general that no other human being after Solomon was bequeathed with manifestation of this power.

Regarding this issue, our aim is only to discuss it, calling attention to the two kinds of mercy Solomon mentioned whose names in Arabic are al-raḥmān al-raḥīm (the All-Merciful, the All-Compassionate). God restricts (153) the mercy of obligation and derestricts the mercy of favor, in His saying, "My mercy encompasses all things" (Qur'ān 7:156), even the divine names, that is, the realities of relationships. He bestows favors on the divine names through us. Thus, we are the result of the mercy of favor through the divine names and the lordly relationships.

4 Here Ibn al-ʿArabī uses the word "agent" (ʿāmil) to indicate that the Real is the cause of the occurrence of the act but not of its characteristics. This is reminiscent of al-Ghazālī's theory of causality as elaborated in his non-philosophical works. According to this theory, God's power makes the series of causes and effects move. Abrahamov, "Al-Ghazālī's Theory of Causality."

5 Solomon was aware of the idea that God is the agent of his acts and that he is a manifestation of Him.

6 Bukhārī, VIII:75 (3423).

7 Qur'ān 38:35.

Then he obliged Himself to bestow favors through our self-manifestation and he made us know that He is our essence so we may know that He obliged Himself to bestow favors only for Himself. Consequently, mercy does not exceed Him, for on whom would He bestow favors were none to exist other than He?

However, we should not ignore the difference between entities, for people excel one another in knowledge, so it is said that this person is more learned than another, although the Essence (of all things) is one. This means that the attribute of knowledge overcomes the attribute of will (irāda), just as the attribute of will overcomes the attribute of power, and this is the hierarchy of the divine attributes.⁸ Likewise, the divine hearing and seeing (are arranged). All the divine names are graded in a hierarchy. In the same manner creation is arranged according to a hierarchy; for example, we say that one individual is more knowledgeable than another, although the Essence is one. Just as you give precedence to a certain divine name and you call and depict it by all the names, the manifested creation has all the attributes of that with which it is compared. Thus, every part of the cosmos contains all its parts; that is, every part is the substrate of the realities of the whole cosmos. Hence, our saying that Zayd is inferior to ‘Amr in knowledge does not infringe (the idea) that the Real’s Essence is the essence of both. Equally, just as ‘Amr’s essence is more perfect and knowing than Zayd’s, the divine names excel each other, yet they are none other than the Real.

As a knowing God is more general than God who wills or is All-Mighty, His Essence, (nevertheless), does not change and He is as He is. As a result, you, my friend, cannot know Him and be ignorant of Him or affirm Him and deny Him in one aspect, unless you affirm Him by the aspect He affirms Himself and deny Him by the aspect He denies Himself. (This is) like the verse combining denial and affirmation with respect to Him when (154) God says: “There is nothing like Him” (Qur’ān 42:11), by which He denies, and “He is the All-Hearing and All-Seeing,” by which He affirms. He affirms (Himself) through an attribute which includes every creature that hears and sees. In this world a creature can exist that is concealed from the perception of some people, but it will be made manifest to all people in the world to come, which is the abode of living just like this world. In the latter, the living essence is concealed from some servants, so that particularization and difference concerning (the perception) of the realities of the cosmos are manifested (only to some people). The Real is more manifested in him who possesses a general perception than in him who does not possess such a perception. Do not be veiled (from the truth) through the hierarchy of things and say that the statement that the Real is the Essence of creation⁹ is false, after I have shown you the hierarchy of the divine names whose identity with the Real you do not doubt, for He is named by them, and this is God.

Moreover, how could Solomon give precedence to his name over God's name,¹⁰ as they claimed, despite his being a part of the whole creation which the attribute of mercy brought into existence? He should have placed the All-Merciful and the All-Compassionate first so that the dependence of the object of mercy on the Real would be right. Making that which deserves the place of the last be the first and vice versa is the reverse of realities.

Because of her wisdom and elevation, Bilqīs did not mention the one who sent the letter to her. She did so to teach her followers that she was aware of things whose ways they did not know. This is a part of the divine direction regarding kingdom, for if the people of the state do not know the way reports reach the king, they will be afraid to act freely. Only when they know they are protected from danger of the ruler discovering their deeds will they act freely. If they knew for certain who delivers reports to their king, they would blandish him and bribe him liberally in order to do as they want, knowing that their deeds will not reach the king's notice. Bilqīs merely said: "(A honorable letter) has been delivered to me," without naming the sender, because that was her policy, by which she kept the people of her kingdom and its elevated leaders cautious of her. (155) Thus, she earned the right to be superior to them.

As for the superiority of the human knower over the demonic knower regarding the knowledge of the mysteries of action and the special nature of things, it is known through the aspect of time, for a twinkling of the eye of the beholder¹¹ is quicker than one's rising from one's seat, because the movement of a glance in the perception of its object is more rapid than the motion of the body. That is, because the duration of the movement of a glance is the same as the (duration of the) perception of the object of sight, notwithstanding the distance between the beholder and the object. (For example), the duration of opening the eye equals the duration of the eye's perception of the fixed stars, and closing the eye equals the ceasing of perception. Rising from one's seat is not as quick.

Asaf ibn Berechya¹² was faster than the demons, for his speech and action occurred in the same instant. As a result, in this moment, Solomon saw with his own eyes Bilqīs' throne established before him, lest he should imagine that he perceived the throne in its place without its being moved (from its place). In our view, because of the simultaneous occurrence (of speech and the establishment of the throne), no movement (of the throne from its original place to Solomon's palace) happened. Instead, (the throne in its original place) entered a state of non-existence and was brought back into existence (in Solomon's palace) with the awareness of none, except the one who knew God's saying: "No indeed, they are perplexed regarding a new creation" (Qur'ān 50:15). They immediately saw what they were looking at.

¹⁰ Qur'ān 27:30.

¹¹ Cf. Qur'ān 27:40.

If the case is as we pointed out, then the time of its absence, I mean the absence of the throne from its place, is the time of its existence with Solomon, because of the repetition of creation by means of (God's) breaths.

One has no knowledge of this measure (of repetition of creation). Moreover, no one is aware that in himself with each breath one becomes nonexistent then (thumma) existent again. Do not say that the word "then" (thumma) requires a lapse of time – this is not correct. According to the Arabs, this word requires only (156) the precedence of a cause (to its effect) in specific circumstances, as the poet said: "Just as (you) throw the lance, then it trembles."¹³ No doubt, the instant of throwing is the same instant it trembles. (The poet) uses the word "then," (although) no lapse of time occurs (between the throwing and the trembling). In like manner, the repetition of creation by breaths takes place; the moment of a thing's nonexistence is the same moment of the existence of its like, as with the repetition of the creation of accidents in the Ash'arite theory.¹⁴

The existence of Bilqīs' throne (in Solomon's palace) is a (most) difficult matter, but only for one who does not know what we mentioned earlier regarding this story. Asaf's advantage in this matter was only (his responsibility for) the occurrence of recreation in Solomon's court. Whoever understands what we have said (knows) that the throne traveled no distance, that no land was contracted for it, and that it did not break through the earth. This act was carried out by one of Solomon's followers, so that Solomon would greatly (impress) those present (in his court), that is, Bilqīs and her entourage.

The reason for this (event) is that Solomon was God's gift to David, as the Qur'ānic verse states: "We gave (wahabnā) David Solomon" (Qur'ān 38:30). A gift (hibba) is one's bestowal of favor (in'ām), not because of an agreement or deservingness. This gift is a lavish favor, a strong argument, and a devastating blow.¹⁵ As for Solomon's knowledge, God said: "We made him understand the case"¹⁶ (Qur'ān 21:79), although Solomon's judgment contradicts David's. However, God "granted both of them judgment and knowledge" (ibid.). God made David acquire his knowledge from Him, while Solomon's knowledge on this matter came to him directly from God, for (actually) God was the judge. Solomon served as a transmitter of truth in an assembly of sincerity (maq'ad ¹³ This is a fragment of a line of poetry written by Abū Dāwūd ibn al-Ḥajjāj. Affifi, II, p. 215.

¹⁴ The text here has the word dalīl, which literally means proof or sign. The Ash'arites hold the recreation of the accidents, and in this manner Ibn al-'Arabī's idea is reminiscent of theirs.

¹⁵ The last two phrases are directed toward Bilqīs' followers, who were confronted with the power of Solomon.

¹⁶ According to the Tradition, the case to which the Qur'ān alludes is David's trial of a shepherd whose flock of sheep entered a field and ruined its harvest. David judged that the flock should be transferred to the owner of the field to be his possession, while Solomon opined that the shepherd should repair the damage and until he does so, the owner of the land will enjoy the milk and the wool of the sheep. Ibn Kathīr, Tafsīr, Vol. V, p. 576.

sidq).¹⁷ This issue resembles the case of an independent legist (mujtahid)¹⁸ who reaches the correct legal decision, which God would have arrived at, had He taken it upon Himself, or the case of one who judges in accordance with the revelation to God's Messenger. In both cases the judge receives two rewards, while one who makes incorrect decision receives one reward, because, notwithstanding his fault, he uses knowledge and judgment. The Muḥammadan community was given the rank of judgment of both Solomon and David. How excellent a community it is!

(157) Although Bilqīs knew the great distance (between her palace and Solomon's) and the impossibility, in her view, of the throne's movement in so short a time, when she saw her throne, she said: "It looks like it" (Qur'ān 27:42, AH). She believed in what we have mentioned, that is, recreation by similars. It is it – the idea you are the same in the time of recreation as you were before is correct.

Solomon's perfect knowledge (is shown) in the Qur'ān's notice regarding his palace. "(Then) it was said to her: 'Enter the palace'" (ibid., 44). The palace was perfectly paved with smooth glass. "When she saw it, she thought it was a deep pool of water, and bared her legs" (ibid., AH) to prevent the water from reaching her dress. Solomon informed her that the throne which she saw is like this water. This is the utmost degree of justice, for he told her that she was right in saying "It looks like it" (ibid., 42). Then she said: "O my Lord, I have wronged myself, and I submitted myself with Solomon" (ibid., 44), that is, like Solomon, "to God, the Lord of all beings" (ʿālamīn)¹⁹ (ibid.). She did not submit to Solomon, but rather to God, the Lord of all beings, because Solomon was one of the beings. In her submission, she did not bind herself (to Solomon), just as the messengers do not bind themselves (to people) in their belief in God, contrary to Pharaoh, who said: "The Lord of Moses and Aaron" (Qur'ān 7:122).²⁰ Even if Pharaoh's submission was somewhat similar to that expressed by Bilqīs, he was too weak (to submit to God); Bilqīs was more learned in her submission to God. Pharaoh was subject to the (event)²¹ of this time when he said: "I believe in what the Children of Israel believe."²² He singled out (his belief), because he saw the sorcerers saying concerning their belief in God: "The Lord of Moses and Aaron" (Qur'ān 7:122). Bilqīs' submission (islām) was identical to Solomon's, for she said, "with Solomon" (Qur'ān 27:44), then followed him in such a way that she believed in all Solomon's creeds, just as we walk ¹⁷ For this phrase, see Qur'ān 54:55.

¹⁹ For ʿālamīn see p. 37, n. 7 above.

²⁰ Strangely enough, in the Qur'ān, Pharaoh's sorcerers said this as written in verses 121–122: "The sorcerers fell to their knees and said: 'We believe in the Lord of all beings, the Lord of Moses and Aaron.'" See also Qur'ān 26:47–48.

²¹ He said this when he was drowning with his troops.

²² This is a paraphrase of Qur'ān 10:90, which reads: "I believe there is no God except the One the Children of Israel believe in."

on God's Straight Path (al-ṣirāṭ al-mustaqīm),²³ because our forelocks are in His grasp. It is inconceivable that we should leave Him. We are with Him by being contained (in Him),²⁴ and He is with us, as it is clearly announced: "He is with you wherever you are" (Qur'ān 57:4). We are with Him, because He seizes our forelocks (158), and He is with Himself wherever He leads us on His Path. Everything in the cosmos is on the Straight Path, which was established (for it) by His Lord. This is what Bilqīs learned from Solomon and then said: "to God, the Lord of all beings" (Qur'ān 27:44). She did not single out one being to the exclusion of others.

As for the faculty of subjugation by which Solomon was distinguished and excelled others, and through which God granted him dominion which "no one else after him would achieve" (Qur'ān 38:35), it derived from Solomon's command. God said: "We subjected to his power the wind, which blows at his command" (Qur'ān 38:36). The fact that the wind is subjected to a human is not the issue here, for God's words include all of us, excluding none: "He subjects for you all that which is in the heavens and the earth" (Qur'ān 45:13). God mentioned the subjugation of the winds, the stars, and other things; however, this subjugation is not at our command, but at God's command. If you consider (the matter), He singled out Solomon, (granting him) only the power of command, with neither the faculty of concentration (jam'iyya) nor of spiritual aspiration (himma). We say this, because we know that the terrestrial bodies are affected by the souls' spiritual aspirations if the latter are placed in the station of concentration.²⁵ We have examined this in the Way.²⁶ However, Solomon had only to utter the command to any entity he wanted to subject without spiritual aspiration or concentration.

Know, may God inspire us and you by His spirit, that if such a gift is bestowed on a servant, whoever he is, this does not diminish his dominion in the next world and nor does it harm his credit, though Solomon asked this from his Lord. Experience of the Way requires that God should give him in advance what He preserves for others in the world to come, and if God wishes, He will settle Solomon's account in the next world. God said to him, "This is Our gift" (Qur'ān 38:39), and he said, neither to you nor to others, "so bestow" (ibid.), that is, give "or withhold without settling an account" (ibid.). We know from experiencing the Way that Solomon's request of this (faculty) derived from God's command. If a request occurs at the divine command, the one who requests receives complete reward for his request. If the Lord wills, He fulfills the servant's need regarding what he asked of Him, and if He wills (159), He withholds (His response). That is because the servant

²³ For this term, see the beginning of ch. 10.

²⁵ That the soul affects the body is an idea developed by Ibn Sīnā. Kitāb al-najāt, pp. 196–205.

carried out what God obliged him; to wit, he obeyed his Lord's command concerning his request. Had his request come from himself and not as a reaction to his Lord's command, He would have settled his account with him. This (procedure) pervades all that is requested of God, as He said to His Prophet Muḥammad: "Say: 'O my Lord, increase my knowledge'" (Qur'ān 20:114). Hence, he obeyed his Lord's command, asking increase in knowledge to such an extent that when he was given milk, he interpreted it as knowledge, just as he interpreted his dream in which he saw himself receiving a cup of milk, which he drank, and the remainder he gave to 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb. They (his followers) asked him: "What is your interpretation of the milk?" He answered: "It is knowledge."²⁷ In like manner, when he was made to travel (usriya bihi) by night,²⁸ an angel brought him a vessel of milk and another of wine, and Muḥammad drank the milk. Then the angel said to him: You did the right thing according to your inborn trait (fiṭra); may God do the right thing by you for your community. Thus, when milk appears in a dream, it is an image of knowledge, which takes the form of milk, just as Jibrīl took the form of an ordinary human being before Maryam. For when Muḥammad said: "People are sleeping, and when they die, they wake up,"²⁹ he was calling attention to all that the human being sees in his life in this world as being like the dream of a sleeper, (that is), imagination which should be interpreted.

Being is only imagination/(but) in truth it is (also) reality

Whoever understands this/attains the mysteries of the Way

Thus, when milk was given to Muḥammad, he used to say: "God bless us by it and give us increase of it," because he saw the milk as an image of knowledge, and he was commanded to ask for an increase in knowledge. (However) when he was given something other than milk, he used to say: "God bless us by it and feed us by something better than this."³⁰ God will not settle His account with him whom God gives what He gives by a request done at a divine command, because of this request in the Hereafter. (But) whoever is given something by God because of his request made without God's command, it is for God to decide, as He wishes, whether to settle his account (160) or not. I hope God will not settle His account especially concerning knowledge, for His command to His Prophet to ask increase in knowledge is the same command to his community. That is because God said: "God's Messenger was a good model for you" (Qur'ān 33:21). What better model is there for one who learns from God? If we called attention to Solomon's station in its completeness, you would see something that would frighten you to know thoroughly, for most scholars of this Way did not know Solomon's state and position, and the matter is not as they maintained.

17 The bezel of the wisdom of existence exists in the essence of David (160) Know that since prophecy, I mean legislative prophecy (nubuwwat al-tashrī), and messengerhood (risāla) are special divine (gifts), they are not acquired absolutely. God's gifts of this kind to them are not rewards for which they are asked to give (something in exchange). He gives them (gifts) through bestowing favors. God said: "And We gave him Isaac and Jacob" (Qur'ān 6:84), that is, to Abraham, the friend (of God). And about Job, God said: "We gave him his family and their like with them" (Qur'ān 38:43). And regarding Moses, He said: "Out of our Mercy We gave him his brother Aaron as a prophet" (Qur'ān 19:53), and other (verses) like that. What bestowed favors on them at the beginning is the same (entity) that bestowed favors on them in all or most of their states, and it is only His name the Bestower (al-wahhāb).

And He said concerning David: "We bestowed our favor on him" (Qur'ān 34:10) without connecting this favor to a reward He would ask in return from David, and without informing him that He gave the aforementioned favor as a reward. When God asked thanks for this act, He asked it from David's family; He did not mention David, so that his family would thank Him for the favor He bestowed on David. Regarding David, it was a gift of favor and beneficence, while regarding his family, it was not so, because He asked them to respond and said: "Thank God, family of David, for few of My servants are thankful" (Qur'ān 34:13). If the prophets (161) thanked God for the favors He bestowed on them, they did so not because God asked them to thank Him, but out of their own choice, just as God's Messenger stood thanking Him, until his legs became swollen, for He forgave him his earlier and later sins.¹ When someone said (something) to him concerning his behavior, he said: "Shall I not be a thankful person?"² God said about Noah: "Indeed, he was a thankful servant" (Qur'ān 17:3), because few of God's servants are so.

The first favor God bestowed on David was His giving him a name composed of disconnected letters, dāl, alif, and wāw. Thus, He severed his connections from the world, informing us about him purely by his name. However, God named (His Prophet) Muḥammad by using both connected and disconnected letters in order on the one hand to connect Muḥammad to Him and on the other to separate him from the world. Hence, in his name, He combined the two states of Muḥammad, while these two states were internally expressed in David without God's establishing them in his name. This, that is, calling attention to his two states, was Muḥammad's special trait which David lacked. (And so) his personality (literally: his matter) became perfect in all aspects, just as it is in his name Aḥmad.³ This derives from God's wisdom. Then He said, regarding David and His bestowing on him favors, that the mountains and the birds reverberated the praise of (God) with David's praising, so that their praises joined his.⁴ God granted him power and described him by it, and granted him wisdom and decisive resolution (faṣl al-khiṭāb).⁵ Then He (granted) him the greatest favor and nearness to Us⁶ and stated specifically that the vicegerency belonged to him alone. God did not do this for any other human being, even if there were vicegerents among them. He said: "O David, We appointed you a vicegerent in the earth, so judge justly between people and do not follow your own will" (Qur'ān 38:26), that is, what comes to your mind when you judge without taking into account My inspiration, "lest this may lead you astray from (162) God's path" (ibid.), that is, the way revealed to My messengers. Then God treated David tenderly, saying: "Those who stray from God's path will be severely punished, because they forgot the Day of Reckoning" (ibid.). He did not say to him: "If you stray from My path, you will be severely punished."

If you say: "The vicegerency of Ādam was also appointed (in the Qur'ān)," we shall answer: "Ādam's appointment is not similar to David's, (because God only) said (it) to the angels: 'I am appointing a vicegerent in the earth' (Qur'ān 2:30), and He did not say: 'I am appointing Ādam a vicegerent in the earth.'" Even if He had said so, it would not have been like His saying "We appointed you a vicegerent," regarding David, because the latter statement is definite and the former is not. The mention of Ādam after that in the story does not indicate that he was the vicegerent whom God appointed. Hence, pay attention to God's reports of His servants.

Likewise, regarding Abraham, the Friend, (God said): "I am appointing you a leader (imām) of people" (Qur'ān 2:124), and He did not say "vicegerent," even if we know that leadership (imāma) here means vicegerency (khilāfa). These (two concepts) are not the same, because He did not mention its (the leadership's) most specific name, which is vicegerency.⁷ Regarding David, there is an additional element of particularization, because He appointed him a vicegerent of judgment that originates only from God, for He said to him: "Judge justly between people" (Qur'ān 38:26). However, Ādam's vicegerency was likely not of this degree.

Rather it was the replacement of whoever lived in the earth before his time, not that he was a vicegerent of God among His creatures with divine judgment over them. Even if he actually was God's vicegerent, we are only talking about his appointment and its manifest form.

God has in the earth vicegerents who are the messengers. At present, vicegerency derives from the messengers and not from God. They judge only according to what the Messenger promulgated to them and do not violate his rules. However, here is a subtle issue, which only people like us know, that is, learning the judgments in keeping with the Messenger's legal way.

The Messenger's vicegerent is the one who learns judgments from the transmitted traditions (from the Messenger) (163), or by applying the method of personal efforts (ijtihād), (the authority of) which is also transmitted from the Messenger. Among us are some who learn from God, hence they are God's vicegerents through the same criterion, and the content (of the rules) they receive is the same as that which the Messenger received from God. Thus, seen outwardly, they are followed by others, because they do not contradict the Messenger's judgment, like Jesus when he will come down and judge and like Muḥammad in God's saying: "Those are the people whom God has guided, so follow their guidance" (Qur'ān 6:90). Concerning what he knows about the way of learning, the follower is distinguished and successful, and he is like the Prophet, who followed the messengers who preceded him. So we follow him, because he established the rule of following the preceding messengers, and not because of the rules of the messengers who preceded him. In like manner, the vicegerent's learning from God is the same as the Messenger's learning from God. Speaking from the perspective of revelation, he is God's vicegerent, and with respect to the outward realm, he is the Messenger's vicegerent. For this reason, the Messenger died without appointing a vicegerent. He did not appoint a vicegerent, knowing that in his community was one who would take the vicegerency from his Lord. Thus, he would be a vicegerent of God accepting the existing laws. Since Muḥammad knew of this (notion), he did not prevent its application. Among His creatures, God has vicegerents who took from the Messenger and the messengers the authority that the messengers had taken (from God). The vicegerents know the preceding Messenger's superiority, because the Messenger received increase (in knowledge), while the vicegerent does not receive such an increase, which he would have received, had he had been a messenger. The vicegerent gives only knowledge and judgments which were specifically given to the Messenger. Hence, outwardly, contrary to the Messenger, he follows the latter and does not oppose him.

Do you not see Jesus' (conduct)? The Jews thought well of Jesus when he did not promulgate laws which Moses had not promulgated; as we have said concerning the vicegerency today in relation to the Messenger, they believed in him and confirmed (his position as vicegerent) (164). However, when he added (a new) judgment or abrogated a judgment brought by Moses, because Jesus was a messenger, they did not tolerate this, for he opposed their belief in Moses. The Jews did not know the matter as it was and wished to kill Jesus. Of what happened to him, God informs us in His Noble Book about him and them. Since he was a messenger, he was allowed to change⁸ (his religion), either by omission (naqṣ) of an existing rule or by adding a new one. However, without a doubt, omission of a rule implies adding a new rule.

The vicegerency today does not have the same status as it once had; it omits or adds rules which were promulgated by personal efforts (ijtihād), (but) not (the kind of) rules promulgated by Muḥammad. Sometimes a vicegerent seems to contradict a legal tradition, and as a result, one imagines that this contradiction derives from ijtihād, but this is not the case; rather, this tradition was not affirmed for this leader through revelation from the Prophet, and if it were affirmed, he would judge according to this rule. If the way this tradition was transmitted is from one honest person to another, such a person is not immune from fancy or transmission according to the meaning.⁹ Such a thing might occur today to a vicegerent, as it occurred to Jesus, for when he will descend, he will cancel many rules promulgated through ijtihād and through this cancellation he will make clear the truth established by Muḥammad's laws, especially when the rules of religious leaders concerning an event contradict each other. We know for certain that if a revelation descended concerning an event it would guide to one solution, and this solution constitutes the divine law. In other cases, even if the Real affirms (a solution), it is a law which is affirmed to remove difficulty from this community and to spread (divine) laws in it.

As for Muḥammad's saying, "if two persons are acknowledged as vicegerents, kill the last of them,"¹⁰ it applies to an external vicegerency which can be removed by sword. (165) Even if both agree, one must be killed, contrary to the spiritual vicegerency in which killing is forbidden.¹¹ Killing (of one vicegerent) takes place only in the external vicegerency. However, even if such a vicegerent does not have the position of the spiritual vicegerent, he is still the vicegerent of God's Messenger, if he behaves justly. The principle (of establishing one ruler) is a fundamental and it resembles the assumption of the existence of two gods (as God said): "If there had been in them (the heaven and the earth) gods except God, they would have been ruined"¹² (Qur'ān 21:22), even if they agree. However, we know by supposition that if two gods disagreed, the one whose judgment would be carried out is truly God, and the other whose judgment cannot be carried out is not God. Hence, we know that each judgment which is carried out in the world today is God's judgment, even if it opposes the external established judgment which is called law (sharʿ). No judgment except God's is workable, because the order which takes place in the world

⁸ The text has ziyāda (addition), which seems to me inappropriate.

⁹ Does Ibn al-ʿArabī mean by this phrase that the transmitter changes the content of the tradition according to his own understanding and not according to what was transmitted to him?

¹⁰ Muslim, XV, 61 (1853).

¹¹ Literally: in which there is no killing.

¹² This verse serves Muslim theologians, both rationalists and traditionalists, to corroborate the argument from assumed mutual prevention. Abrahamov, al-Ḳāsim Ibn Ibrāhīm, p. 190, n. 89.

complies with divine will (al-mashīʿa al-ilāhiyya),¹³ not with established law, even if its establishment derives from God's will. For this reason, the establishment of a judgment takes place in a particular way, for the will is concerned only with the establishment, not with the fulfillment of the judgment.

The rule of the will is great, hence Abū Ṭālib (al-Makkī)¹⁴ named it the Throne of the Essence, because it is the Essence which requires judgment. Everything in existence occurs or not only through God's will, for if God's command is disobeyed – called here a transgression (maʿṣiya) – it is not God's creative command (al-amr al-takwīnī) (which is disobeyed) but rather a command addressed to people indirectly (through angels or prophets). No one can disobey in all one's actions the command of the divine will. If there is disobedience, it is of the indirect command. So, understand it! The will of God only applies to the bringing of the action into existence and not to its agent, hence it is inconceivable that it would not exist.¹⁵ However, in this specific substrate (the human being), sometimes this action constitutes a transgression of God's command and other times acceptance of and obedience to God's command. (166) Praise or blame follows in accordance with what happens. Since the matter in itself is as we have established, all people achieve happiness of different kinds. God expresses this station (saying) that "Mercy encompasses everything"¹⁶ and that it precedes divine Wrath.¹⁷ That which precedes is the first, and when the judgment of the latter follows, the first (that is, Mercy) judges it, because it precedes Wrath.¹⁸ This is the meaning of "His Mercy precedes His Wrath," in order that the first will judge that which comes later, for the aim is Mercy and everything is going toward Mercy. The human being comes necessarily to Mercy leaving Wrath, and Mercy judges everyone who comes to it according to his state.

Whoever understands will witness what we say/if he does not, he will learn from us

There is nothing except what we have stated, so rely/on it and be in the same state as we are

¹⁴ Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī (d. 996) is the author of the mystical treatise Qūt al-qulūb, which exerted much influence on the teachings of al-Ghazālī.

¹⁵ This idea that God creates the human act but not its modality is reminiscent of an interpretation of al-Ashʿarī's theory of acquisition (kasb), according to which it is the human being which assigns to the act its moral value. For example, if one enters a house and takes money from it, his act will be lawful if he enters his own house, but unlawful in case it is not his house. So the act itself is an objective entity which can be applied to different situations. Abrahamov, "A Re-Examination of al-Ashʿarī's Theory of Kasb according to K. al-lumaʿ, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (1989):210–221.

¹⁷ Bukhārī, LIV:416 (7554).

¹⁸ This explanation seems awkward, because Ibn al-ʿArabī does not explain why that which comes first overcomes the latter.

What we have told you comes from Him to us/and what we have given to you comes from us to you

As for the “softening of iron,”¹⁹ (it is said) that hardened hearts²⁰ are softened by rebuke and threat as fire softens iron. However, the difficult thing is hearts that are harder than stone,²¹ for fire breaks and calcifies the stone but does not soften it. God softened iron for him so that he could make shields, and (in this act) He called his attention to (the notion) that what attacks you, that is, spears, swords, knives, and arrowheads, are made of the iron from which you make shields. So you protect yourself from iron with iron. The Muḥammadan religion sets forth (the rule): “I seek refuge from You in You.”²² So understand! Thus, this is the spirit of softening iron, for God is both the Avenger and the All-Compassionate, and He gives us success.

18 The bezel of the wisdom of breath¹ exists in the essence of Jonah

(167) Know that this human formation in its totality, (that is), spirit, body, and soul, was created by God in His image. Only God, who created this structure, can be responsible for its disintegration, whether by His hand or by His command, which is always the case.² Whoever engages in the disintegration of the human structure without receiving God's command wrongs himself, transgresses God's law regarding the human being, and strives to ruin whom God orders to protect his life. Know that feeling pity for God's servants and caring for them are more deserving than jealousy of God.³

David wanted to build the Holy House and built it several times.⁴ However, each time he completed the building, it was ruined. He complained of this to God, who revealed to him: "My House will not be built by one who has shed blood." Then David said: "O my Lord, was this act (of shedding blood) not carried out for Your sake?" God said: "Indeed, but were they not My servants?" David said: "O my Lord, appoint for its building one of my family." Then God revealed to him: "Your son Solomon will build it."

The aim of this story is to preserve this human formation and (to show) that its keeping up is better than its destruction. Do you not see that God imposed poll tax and peace on the enemy of the religion in order to spare human life and said: "If they incline toward peace, incline to it yourself and trust in God" (Qur'ān 8:61)? Do you not see that the Law enjoins the avenger of blood, who is obliged to retaliate, to take ransom, or to forgive? But if the killer refuses, the avenger is allowed

1 Al-Qūnawī and following him al-Qaysarī reads here ḥikma nafsiyya (the wisdom of the soul) instead of ḥikma nafasiyya (the wisdom of the breath), claiming that the soul, as that which connects body and spirit, or the divine (barzakh, isthmus), is like Jonah, who cries out to God from the belly of the fish, just as the soul turns to God. Chittick, "Chapter Headings," p. 31.

2 The last phrase stands between "by His hand" and "by His command." It cannot refer to both phrases, because of the alternative nature of the text, and because God creates by the command "be"; hence, I prefer to attach "which is always the case" to "by His command." This disorderly construction often characterizes the writing of our author.

3 Ibn al-ʿArabī refers here to killing people on account of religious motives, such as the killing of pagans.

4 I did not find the source of this information.

to execute him. God's decision may be seen in the following case: When the avengers of blood are a group and one of them is pleased with blood money or forgives the killer, while the rest only desire to kill him, the Law takes into consideration the one who forgives and his opinion preponderates the opinion of the others who do not forgive, and the wrongdoer will not be executed (168) as a retaliation. Do you not see the Prophet saying of the owner of the thong: "If the avenger of blood kills him, he will be like him"?⁵ Do you not see Him saying: "Requital of an evil deed is an evil deed like it" (Qur'ān 42:40)? Thus, God made the punishment an evil deed, meaning that this act (of punishment) is wrong, notwithstanding its being lawful. "However, whoever forgives and makes peace (between people) will receive his reward from God" (Qur'ān, ibid.), because he was created in God's image. Whoever forgives and does not kill receives reward from God, who created him in His image, because he is most deserving the reward, for God created him for this purpose. God is manifested through the external name (al-ism al-zāhir), only through the human being's existence. Thus, whoever preserves his own existence preserves the Real.

The human being is not blamable because of his essence, but because of his action, and his action is not him, and we are speaking of his essence. Every action belongs to God, notwithstanding human acts are blameworthy and praiseworthy. God detests blame for the sake of blame. There is nothing blameworthy except that which religion considers so, for the religious blame derives from a rationale (ḥikma) known to God or to one God makes know, just as He enacted retribution for the benefit of preserving humanity and deterring one who transgresses God's laws. "In retribution there is life for you, O you wise people" (Qur'ān 2:179). These are people who know things as they really are (ahl lubb al-shay')⁶ and find the mystery of the divine and wise laws. If you know that God preserves this human formation and its persistence, you are most entitled to preserve it, for in that you attain felicity (sa'āda); as long as the human being is alive, it is hoped that he will attain the trait of perfection for which he was created. Whoever makes efforts to destroy a human being makes efforts to prevent him from reaching the aim for which he was created.

How good is what God's Messenger said: "Do I not tell you that which is better and more excellent for you than meeting your enemies and killing them and being killed by them? This is the remembrance of God."⁷ That is because only the one who remembers God, a remembrance required of him, knows the value of this human formation, for God is the companion of the one who remembers Him, and the one who remembers witnesses (the existence) of the companion. When the one who remembers does not witness the Real, who is his companion, (169) he does not remember, for the remembrance of God permeates the whole structure of the servant, not only his tongue by which he remembers Him. That is because in 5 A person was found killed, and his thong was taken by the killer, who was identified by a relative of the dead person. When the relative wanted to execute the killer, the Prophet said this sentence. Muslim, XXVIII:32 (1680).

6 Literally: the people of the core of things.

7 Nasā'ī, XXV:24. Tafsīr al-Baghawī to Qur'ān 29:41.

this time, the Real will be specifically the companion only of the tongue, and the tongue will see Him through that which it sees, not through that which the human beings see Him, that is, the sense of sight. Understand this mystery regarding the remembrance of the neglectful (ghāfilīn), for the part of the neglectful person which remembers God is present with God, and the remembered is his companion, because He sees him. The neglectful person with respect to his negligence does not remember, hence (God) is not the companion of the neglectful person.

The human being is (composed) of many parts and his essence is not one, while the Essence of the Real is one, but He is many through His names, just as the human being is many through his parts, and the remembrance derived from one part does not necessarily entail the remembrance of another part. Thus, the Real is the companion of the remembering part, while other parts are described as neglectful of remembering. There is necessarily a part in the human being through which he remembers, and the Real is the companion of that part, while the Real takes care of the other parts. The Real does not take upon Himself the destruction of this (human) formation through what is called death. Death is not annihilation (īdām), but only the separation (of the parts), meaning that the Real takes the human being to Himself (as God said:) “To Him all things go back” (Qur’ān 11:123).

When the Real takes the human being to Himself, He makes for him a composite formation, different from his present composite body, one appropriate for the kind of abode to which He transfers him.⁸ This is an abode of eternal life, because of its temperance (li-wujūd al-ītidāl).⁹ Hence, the human being will never die, meaning, his parts will never be separated.

As for the people of the Fire, they finally attain felicity, but in Hell, for the form of the Fire will become necessarily cool and safe for those who dwell in it at the end of their punishment period. This is their felicity. The felicity of the people of the Fire after exhausting the (sufferings) they deserve is like the felicity of God’s friend (Abraham) when he was thrown into the fire. He suffered, because he saw it, and he knew from his past knowledge (170) that fire causes injury and pain to creatures which come near it. He did not know God’s intention: what the fire was meant to impart to him. However, after experiencing these sufferings, he found the fire cool and safe,¹⁰ though he still witnessed the color (of its flames flashing back at) him, for it was fire in the people’s eyes.

One thing may appear in different forms in the eyes of the beholders. And so it is with the divine self-manifestation. If you wish, you can say that God manifests Himself like this thing, and if you wish, you can say that the cosmos is observed like the Real in His self-manifestation. In the eyes of the beholder, the cosmos takes on different forms accordant with the beholder's temperament, or his temperament differs with the various forms of the self-manifestation. All this is allowable concerning the realities (of the cosmos).

⁸ Ibn al-‘Arabī seems here to make a concession to the philosophers who claim that the physical phenomena of the next world mentioned in the Qur’ān are just metaphors illustrating to the common people what they will encounter in the world to come. It is reminiscent of the view that in the world to come God will create a sixth sense by which people will be able to see Him. Abrahamov, Anthropomorphism, pp. 17f, 130f.

⁹ In ancient times and the Middle Ages, medicine held the concept that temperance of the essential parts of the body guarantees its health. Often Ibn al-‘Arabī employs the theory of temperance. SPK, pp. 140, 351. See ch. 19, p. 133, n. 8, below.

If a dead or killed person, whoever he may be, had died or had been killed and had not returned to God, then God would not have decreed the death of anyone or judged his killing. However, all is in God's grasp, for with respect to Him, no loss has occurred. He established killing as a law and decreed death, for He knows that his servant will not pass away, because he returns to Him as He said: "To Him all things go back" (Qur'ān 11:123), which means that He acts freely (with everything). Everything which comes out of Him is His Essence; moreover, His Ipseity is the essence of everything, and He gives everything its manifestation, as He said, "To Him all things go back" (ibid.).¹¹

¹¹ Loyal to his idea that the cosmos reflects God's names, our author cannot hold the passing away of human beings. Hence, after their death, they continue to live in a different form.

19 The bezel of the wisdom of the unseen¹ exists in the essence of Job

(170) Know that the mystery of life permeates through water, since it is the root of the elements² and foundations (‘anāṣir, arkān). For this reason God makes “of water every living thing” (Qur’ān 21:30). Everything in the cosmos is living, for everything celebrates God’s praise;³ however, we can understand this celebration only through divine unveiling (kashf ilāhī). Only a living being can praise. Hence everything is living. And the root of everything is water.

Do you not see the Throne, how it rests on the water,⁴ because (171) it was composed of water; it floats on the water, and the water preserves it from beneath. Likewise, God created the human being as a servant and (then) he became haughty and wished to excel Him, but God, notwithstanding, preserved him from beneath, taking into account the seeming loftiness of the servant who is ignorant of himself. This is (illustrated in Muḥammad’s tradition): “If you let a rope fall down, it will fall on God.”⁵ God alluded to His being both below and above in His saying: “They fear their Lord above them” (Qur’ān 16:50, trans. AH), and in His saying: “He is the High Master over His servants” (Qur’ān 6:18, 61). Thus, God possesses the high and the low positions.⁶ For this reason, the six directions⁷ are manifested only through the human being, who (was created) in the image of the Merciful.

There is no sustainer but God. He said regarding a group of people: “If they carried out (the precepts) of the Torah and the Gospel” (Qur’ān 5:66), then He said in an indefinite and general manner: “and what was sent down for them from their Lord” (ibid.). In this last sentence He included every law which was sent down to people through a messenger or inspired human beings. (“If they carried out . . .”), “they would eat from above” (ibid.), because He sustains from above, as is ascribed to Him, “and from beneath their feet” (ibid.), and sustaining from beneath is (also) ascribed to Him by the medium of His Messenger who transmitted from Him.

If the Throne were not on the water, its existence would not be preserved, for the existence of the living is preserved through life. Do you not see that when the living dies a normal death, the parts of his formation are resolved and his faculties disappear from his unique bodily structure?

God said to Job: “Stamp your foot! This is a place to wash” (Qur’ān 38:42), meaning water, “cool” (ibid.), because of the extreme heat caused by his pain. Therefore, God calmed him with cool water. For this reason, (the core) of medicine is to decrease that which is increased and to increase that which is decreased, with the aim of achieving temperance,⁸ which can be attained only approximately. We say “can be attained only approximately,” that is, temperance, because the (divine) realities and witnesses⁹ are eternally responsible for creation along with the (divine) breaths. Creation derives from an inclination in nature called deviation or decomposition. Regarding God, it is called will (172), which is an inclination toward a specific object of the will, and not to another. Temperance shows that all things are equal, but this is not the case in reality. Hence, we avoid (the use of) the rule of temperance.¹⁰

In the divine prophetic knowledge, the Real is described as content, angry, and (other) attributes. However, contentment nullifies anger and anger nullifies contentment, while temperance means the equality of anger and contentment. One who is angry with someone cannot be content with him at the same time, and vice versa. Such a person is characterized by one of the two traits (anger or contentment), which is an inclination. This statement is aimed at those who claim that God has not ceased to be angry at the people of the Fire. Consequently, they (the people of the Fire) do not enjoy God’s contentment. Thus, our aim is valid. However, if the situation is as we have said, that is, the suffering of the people of the Fire is finally removed, even if they remain in the Fire, this is contentment, for God’s anger disappears, because of the disappearance of suffering. That is because the essence of suffering is the essence of angry, if you understand. The one who is angry suffers, hence he tries to take revenge on the object of his anger by causing him suffering in order to gain relief by his act, and as a result his suffering passes to the object of his anger.

If you separate the Real from the cosmos, He is highly exalted above this quality according to this definition.¹¹ If, however, the Real is the Essence of the world, all the laws emerge from Him and in Him, which is (attested) in his saying: “All things return to Him” (Qur’ān 11:123) in reality and in revelation, and “hence, worship Him and trust Him” (ibid.), while He is veiled and hidden from you. This

⁹ Possibly, here the realities and the witnesses stand for the fixed entities and the divine attributes, respectively.

¹¹ The author seems to say that God cannot be described as being angry like the human being. Speaking here of the aloofness of God from the cosmos means that in terrestrial language we consider God as avenger.

is because there cannot be a world more wonderful than the present world (laysa fi'l-imkān abda' min hādha al-ʿālam),¹² for it is in the image of the Merciful. God brought the world into existence; that is, His existence is manifested by the manifestation of the world, just as the human being is manifested by the existence of his natural form. We are His external form, while His Ipseity is the spirit which governs the form.¹³ This governing is only in Him, just as it is from Him, for He is the First in essence, and the Last in form.

(173) He is the External through the changing of determinations (of things) and states, and He is the Internal through His governing (of the world), and He is the Knower of everything.¹⁴ He is Witness to everything (Qurʾān 58:6, 85:9), knowing by witnessing and not by reflection. Such is true knowledge gained from mystical experience,¹⁵ not by reflection, which amounts to guessing and conjecture, that in no way is knowledge.

Let us return to Job. He was given water to drink to remove the pain of his thirst, caused by the weariness and suffering inflicted upon him by the Devil.¹⁶ (The weariness and suffering are metaphors) indicating remoteness from the perception of the realities as they really are. Through this perception he (Job) is near God. Everything witnessed is near to the eye, even if the object is far away. That is, sighting (something) makes contact with it, therefore by way of vision it is witness. If he could not see the object, he would not witness it, or the object would make contact with his eyesight in a certain way. This is the closeness between eyesight and its object. For this reason, Job alluded to affliction and attributed it to the Devil. Notwithstanding the nearness of affliction, he said: "He who is far away from me, but his judgment of me is near." Thus, you know that remoteness and closeness are relative values; they are relationships with no essential existence; however, they establish the remote and the close things.

Know that God's mystery exists in Job, of whom He made a lesson for us and a written book about him which this Muḥammadan community reads in order to know its content and to attach itself to its subject in honor of him.¹⁷ God praised Job for his forbearance (ṣabr), notwithstanding Job's invocation to remove the injury from him. Thus, we know that when a servant invokes God to remove injury from him, this does not impair his forbearance and his excellence as a servant, for as God said, he "always turns to God" (Qurʾān 38:44), meaning, he directs himself to God, and not to causes. Concerning the removal of injury, the Real acts through a cause, because the servant relies on causes, for the causes which remove something are many, while the Causer is one

¹² The source of this statement is al-Ghazālī, whose wording is somewhat different: "There cannot be a more wonderful entity than this" (laysa fī'l-imkān abda' mim mā kāna). For the lengthy discussions in Islamic theology on al-Ghazālī's dictum, see Eric L. Ormsby, Theodicy in Islamic Thought: The Dispute over Al-Ghazālī's "Best of All Possible Worlds", Princeton 1984.

¹⁵ Literally: taste, dhawq, pl. adhawāq).

¹⁶ "Bring to mind Our servant Job who cried to his Lord, 'Satan has afflicted me with weariness and suffering'" (Qurʾān 38:41, trans. AH).

¹⁷ Possibly Ibn al-ʿArabī refers to Qurʾān 38:41–44, in which Job is mentioned, because in Islamic culture there is no specific book on him.

entity. The turning of the servant to the single entity which removes injury by a cause is better than turning to a specific cause, which might not coincide with God's knowledge of that cause. Consequently, the servant might say, "God does not (174) answer me," though he does not invoke God, but turns to a specific cause which neither the period nor the moment requires. Because Job was a prophet, he acted according to God's wisdom, because he knew that for the Sufis (tā'ifa) forbearance means restraining the soul from complaining; however, this is not our definition of forbearance.

The (true) definition is only restraining the soul from complaining to an entity other than God, not to God. The Sufis confined their approach to the idea that the one who complains impairs his contentment with God's decree (al-riḍā bi'l-qaḍā'). However, this is not so, because contentment with God's decree is not impaired by complaining to God or to another entity; however, what is impaired is the contentment with the thing decreed (al-maḳḍī). We have not been addressed of the contentment with the thing decreed, because the injury lies in the thing decreed, not in the decree itself. Job knew that in restraining the soul from complaining to God to remove injury there is a resistance to God's compulsion, which amounts to ignorance of the person who does so. That is because (it is) God who puts him to test by causing him pain, hence he should invoke God to remove the painful thing. Moreover, in view of the verifier (al-muḥaqqiq), the one who suffers pain should beseech God and ask Him to remove his pain. For according to the gnostic, the one who experiences unveiling, the elimination of pain derives from God, because He describes Himself as "hurt" and said: "Those who hurt God and His Messenger" (Qur'ān 33:57). What hurt is greater than to test you when you are heedless of Him or of a divine station you do not know, so that you will turn to Him complaining and He, as a result, will remove your hurt? Then, your need of Him, which is your reality, becomes true, and the hurt of the Real is removed by your beseeching Him, when he removes it from you, because you are His external form.

This resembles (what happened to) one of the gnostics who suffered hunger and wept, and one of those who has no mystical experience censured him. The gnostic's response was: "He (God) made me hungry only to cause my weeping," meaning, He put me to test with suffering so that I would beseech Him to take away my suffering. "This in no way impairs my being forbearing." Thus, we know that forbearance is only restraining the soul from complaining to an entity other than God. By "other than God" I mean a specific aspect of God. God (allāh) established the Real (175) as a specific aspect of Himself called the aspect of Ipseity. So one should invoke Him using this aspect to alleviate an affliction and not to use other aspects called causes, which are identical to Him only with respect to particularizing God's aspects. When the gnostic beseeches His Ipseity in order to cure him of his affliction, he does not prevent himself from knowing that all causes constitute His essence and that each (cause) is a different aspect of Him.

This is a way to which only the Courteous¹⁸ among God's servants cling. Those are the reliable servants who keep God's secrets, for God has reliable servants; only He knows who they are and they know each other. We have counseled you, so act accordingly, and ask Him!

¹⁸ God's courtesy (adab) is the rules He promulgated to people, and those who cling to them are called udabā'. SPK, p. 175.

20 The bezel of the wisdom of the majesty¹ exists in the essence of John

(175) This is the wisdom of priority regarding names, for God named him Yahyā (he will live), meaning that the memory of Zakariah² will live through him. “We have chosen this name for no one before him” (Qur’ān 19:7). God joined the attribute which existed in the deceased, who left a son through whom his memory will live on, and the name He gave to the son. He named (Zakariah’s son) Yahyā, and the name of the father will live on like experiential knowledge (al-‘ilm al-dhawqī).³ Hence, Ādam’s memory lived on in Seth, and Noah’s in Shem (Sām), and this goes on with all the prophets. However, before John, God did not connect anyone’s proper name with the attribute; however, he did so out of concern for Zakariah. This is because he said (to God): “Grant me from Yourself a successor” (Qur’ān 19:5), positing the Real before mentioning his son, just as Āsiya (Pharaoh’s wife) gave precedence to the Neighbor (God) before the house (Paradise), saying: “(My Lord, build for me) a house near You in Paradise” (Qur’ān 66:11).

God honored him by fulfilling his need and naming his son with this attribute, so that his name would be a reminder to what His prophet Zakariah asked Him; that is, because Zakariah preferred the continued remembrance of God in his offspring, for the son is the mystery of his father. Hence, Zakariah said: “who will be my heir and be an heir of Jacob’s family” (Qur’ān 19:6). Regarding them, what is inherited is only the station of the remembrance and invocation of God. Then He announced to him the peace which He bestowed on him the day (176) he was born, the day of his death, and the day he will be raised again to life.⁴ God brought the attribute of life, which is his name, and informed Zakariah of granting peace to his son, and God’s statement is true and certain.

1 As a person who inclined to sorrow and weeping, John represents some of the traits which pertain to God’s majesty (jalāl) as against His beauty (jamāl), which contains, inter alia, gentleness and compassion. Chittick, “Chapter Headings,” p. 33.

2 Zakariah was John’s father. Qur’ān 19:7.

3 By this comparison Ibn al-‘Arabī very probably means that just as experiential knowledge lives in one’s memory after the termination of the experience, so the memory of Zakariah will last.

4 Qur’ān 19:15.

If the saying of the Spirit (Jesus), “Peace was on me the day I was born, and will be the day I will die and the day I will be raised again to life” (Qur’ān 19:33), was the most perfect regarding unity, then the present saying (concerning John) was the most perfect regarding both unity and belief and foremost for nullifying incorrect interpretations. What was miraculous about Jesus was that he spoke (in the cradle),⁵ for his intellect was perfect and enabled him to speak at the time God made him speak. The one who is able to speak, being in some state or another, does not necessarily speak the truth, contrary to the one who is the object of God’s witness, like John. Considering this aspect, the peace God granted John is more valuable for reversing obscurity regarding God’s providence than the peace Jesus granted himself, even though the circumstances in his case prove his proximity to God and his truth, for he spoke in the cradle in order to free his mother from the guilt (of fornication). This was one witness (of her innocence), and the other is the dry trunk of a palm tree which dropped fresh fruit without being fertilized by the male,⁶ just as Mary (Maryam) gave birth to Jesus without a male and normal sexual intercourse.

If a prophet said, “My sign and miracle is that this wall will speak,” and the wall says: “You are a liar, you are not God’s messenger,” the sign would be verified and it confirms his being God’s messenger, and no attention should be paid to whatever the wall said.⁷ Since there is a possibility of such an interpretation regarding Jesus’ speech in the cradle as a result of his mother’s allusion to it, the peace granted by God to John is more elevated in this respect.⁸ The proof that he (Jesus) is God’s servant is based on what was said about him being God’s son. Those who believed in his prophecy knew that he was God’s servant only through the proof of his speech. What remains is the increase of possible interpretations based on rational considerations; however, only the future will show his truth concerning all that he said in the cradle. Then, what we have alluded to will be ascertained.

⁷ The miracle is the wall’s speech and not the content of it.

⁸ God’s saying is more elevated than the miracle performed by Jesus in the cradle.

21 The bezel of the wisdom of the dominion¹ exists in the essence of Zakariah

(177) Know that God's Mercy encompasses everything² that relates to existence and rule³ and that the existence of His Wrath derives from His Mercy with His Wrath. His Mercy precedes His Wrath, meaning that the relation of Mercy to Him precedes the relation of Wrath to Him.⁴ Since every essence has an existence which it seeks from God, His Mercy encompasses every essence, for with the Mercy by which He is Merciful He fulfills the essence's request to have existence and then brings it into existence. For this reason we said that God's Mercy encompasses everything with respect to existence and rule.

The divine names belong to the (genus of) things and they derive from one essence. The first thing God's Mercy encompassed was the thingness (shay'yya) of the essence which brought into existence Mercy through Mercy.⁵ The first thing Mercy encompassed was itself, then its thingness, to which we have alluded, then the thingness of every existent which is brought into existence unendingly with respect to this world and the next, accidents and atoms (jawhar wa-ʿaraḍ), composed and simple things. No consideration is given to attaining an aim or concord in nature, but all the fitting and unfitting things are embraced in God's Mercy with respect to (their) existence.

We have mentioned in The Meccan Revelation (al-Futūḥāt al-makkiyya) that only the nonexistent exerts influence, not the existent, and if the existent exerts influence, it is as if it is nonexistent.⁶ This is a strange knowledge and a rare issue known only to the people of imagination through experience (dhawq). As for those not influenced by imagination, they are far removed from this issue.

1 God gave Zakariah power, which affects his aspirations. Hence, this chapter is entitled according to Zakariah's unique characteristic. Chittick, "Chapter Headings," pp. 33f.

2 Qur'ān 7:156. See ch. 16.

3 God not only brings things into existence, but also has dominion over them, in that He compels them to behave in specific ways.

4 First of all, He should be qualified by Mercy, and then by Wrath.

5 Mercy as an existent has an essence which brings it into existence, and this existence must be created by Mercy itself, but with respect to essence and not to activity.

6 Ibn al-'Arabī refers here to the act of the spirit and imagination which exerts influence on the coming of things into existence. Futūḥāt, Vol. I, pp. 141f (ch. 2, the last paragraph).

God's Mercy permeates (all) beings/existing in essences and entities

The position of Mercy is the highest if you know/through the evidence of discursive reasoning

(178) Everything mentioned by Mercy is happy, and there is nothing that is not mentioned by Mercy. The Mercy's mention of things amounts to bringing them into existence. Every existent is the object of Mercy. O God's friend, do not be veiled from perceiving what we have said because you have considered the afflictions people suffer and because you believe the torments of the next world will not cease to plague those people.

First you should know Mercy alone is bringing into existence, in general, for through Mercy torments are brought into existence. Also, Mercy exerts influence in two ways. Its first effect is on the essence, meaning it brings every existent essence into existence, without any regard for a specific aim or absence thereof, or for suitability or lacks of it, because it only heeds the essence of every existent before its existence. Moreover, it concerns itself with the thing (purely) as a fixed entity ('ayn thābita). For this reason, it sees the god created in beliefs as one of the fixed entities, and hence has mercy⁷ on it through bringing it into existence. Because of this, we said that the god created in beliefs is the first thing on which mercy is bestowed after Mercy bestows mercy on Itself, (when we refer to) its connection to the bringing of existents into existence. Another effect Mercy has is initiated by request. The veiled ones ask the Real to have mercy on them in their belief, while the people of revelation ask God's mercy to exist in them, and request it by God's name, saying: "O God, have mercy on us" (Qur'ān 23:109). The mercy that is shown to them is only the existence of mercy in them, which is the dominating principle (ḥukm) that exists in them, for the dominating principle is actually the accident that exists in the substrate (al-ma'nā al-qā'im bi'l-maḥall). This accident is that which actually has mercy on them, for God has no mercy on His servants for whom He feels concern, only through (His attribute of) Mercy. When mercy exists in them they experientially find its dominating principle. When Mercy remembers a person, it has mercy on him. The active participle is both raḥīm and rāḥim. The dominating principle is not described as created, because it is an accident required by the essence (of Mercy).

The states (aḥwāl)⁸ are neither existent nor nonexistent; that is, they have no concrete essence in existence, because they are relationships. (179) Concerning the dominating principle, they are not nonexistent, because the one possesses knowledge is called "the knower," which is a state. And a knower is an essence qualified by knowledge, yet the state of knowledge neither constitutes the essence of the knower nor the essence of knowledge. There is only knowledge and an essence in which knowledge exists. Being a knower means a state of essence that is qualified by the accident (of knowledge). The relationship between knowledge and its substrate is termed the knower.

⁷ Mercy with an uppercase letter indicates God's attribute, while the lowercase points to the action of this attribute, or the accident.

⁸ Ibn al-'Arabī here employs two terms to designate first the accident (ma'nā, pl. ma'ānin) and second the result of the accident (ḥāl, pl. aḥwāl).

Actually, Mercy is attributed to the Merciful, which means that Mercy entails the dominating principle and shows mercy. Whoever brings mercy into existence in the recipient does not do so to show mercy, but rather to bring it into existence to cause the recipient to have mercy.⁹ God is not a substrate of accidents (ḥawādith), hence He is not a substrate in which mercy is brought into existence. However, He is the Merciful, and He is worthy of this quality only because Mercy exists in Him. Consequently, it is confirmed that He is identified with Mercy Itself.¹⁰

Whoever does not experience (literally: taste – dhāqa) this issue and has no part in it does not venture to say that God is identical with Mercy or with any other attribute, but he may say that He is neither this attribute nor other than it.¹¹ In his view, the Real's attributes are neither Himself nor other than Himself, for he cannot deny them or make them identical with His essence.¹² He inclines toward this expression, which is good; however, another expression is a more appropriate response to the question and may remove obstacles. This is the view which denies the realities of the attributes as existents in the essence of the qualified entity (the Real). They (the attributes) are only relationships and attributions between the qualified entity and their intelligible essences.

Even though Mercy is comprehensive, it differs relative to each divine name.¹³ For this reason, God is requested to show His Mercy to people through every name. Hence, God's Mercy and the pronoun connected with it¹⁴ encompass everything. Mercy has many branches, owing to the multiplicity of the divine names. However, when God is asked to have mercy on someone through a specific name, Mercy is not comprehensive regarding that name or another. Even regarding the name the Avenger, one who seeks revenge is allowed to say: "O Avenger, have Mercy on me." That is because these names refer to the Essence indicated, but through their real expressions they point (180) to different meanings.¹⁵ By these names that exist in Mercy, one invokes (God) in their reference to the Essence which is indicated by ⁹ God wants people to be merciful, hence He brings Mercy into existence in them. Affīfī, I, p. 179, n. 3.

¹⁰ Since God is not a body, He cannot be the recipient of accidents, and the only possibility to affirm His being the Merciful is to state that He and Mercy are one entity, just as His other attributes are related to Him. In holding this view, Ibn al-ʿArabī seems to have adopted Abū al-Hudhayl al-ʿAllāf's (d. between 840 and 850) solution to the problem of God's attributes. According to Abū al-Hudhayl, the attributes are none but God. The attributes do not constitute separate spiritual entities within God, but are identified with His essence. Thus, God is Merciful by virtue of Mercy, which is Himself. H.A. Wolfson, The Philosophy of the Kalam, Cambridge, MA 1970, pp. 225–232.

¹³ Mercy acts through giving sustenance, through bestowing knowledge, etc. Kāshānī, p. 454.

¹⁴ By this the author means My Mercy (rahmatī). Qurʾān 7:156.

¹⁵ One turns to God's essence, but in its capacity as Sustainer, Avenger, etc.

a specific name and no other; one does not invoke the name which is different from other names (but God's Essence). (With respect to) its indicating of the Essence, a name does not differ from another, but it is distinct from another through its own characteristic, because it is a reality distinct from other names through its essence irrespective of any acceptable name referring to it, even though all the names are directed to show one Essence. There is no controversy that each name has its own rule which no other name possesses. This should be taken into account, just as one should take into account the notion that each name points to the indicated Essence. For this reason, Abū al-Qāsim ibn Qasī¹⁶ said regarding the divine names that each separate name is named by all the other names; if you give a name priority by mentioning it, you depict it by all the names, because it points to one essence, even if there are many names for this essence and their realities are numerous.

Mercy can reach people in two ways. (The first is) the way of necessity, as He said: "I shall decree it for those who fear (God) and give alms" (Qur'ān 7:156), and (Mercy also includes) the theoretical and practical attributes by which He restricts them. The second way in which Mercy can reach people is by divine grace, which is not a reaction to the human being's act, and this is his saying: "My Mercy encompasses everything" (ibid.).¹⁷ To this second way of Mercy refers the verse "so that God may forgive you your earlier and later sins" (Qur'ān 48:2) and the tradition "Do all you wish, for God has already forgiven you."¹⁸ So know this!

¹⁶ He died in 1151. Abrahamov, Ibn al-ʿArabī and the Sufis, pp. 145–150.

22 The bezel of the wisdom of the intimacy¹ exists in the essence of Elias

(181) Eliās is Idrīs. He was a prophet before Noah, and God raised him “to a high position” (Qur’ān 19:57).² He dwells in the heart of the celestial spheres, that is, the sphere of the sun. Afterward, he was sent to a town named Baalbek; Baal is the name of an idol, and Bek is the ruler of this town. This idol called Baal was characterized as a ruler. Eliās, who is Idrīs, had a vision of the mountain named Lubnān, from lubāna, meaning a need, which was split open to reveal a fiery horse, all of whose organs were made of fire. When Eliās saw the horse, he mounted it and consequently passion left him, and he became an intellect without passion and with no connection to the intentions of the (lower) soul. In him the Real was transcendent, and hence he knew half the knowledge of God, for when the intellect learns the sciences governed only by speculation, it knows God only as transcendent, not as immanent. (But) when God gives the human being knowledge through revelation, his knowledge of God becomes perfect, thus he regards God as transcendent in one way and immanent in another and sees the permeation of the Real in natural and elemental forms, so that he sees the Real’s Essence in their (the forms) essences.

This is the perfect knowledge which was brought by the religions God sent down, and through this knowledge all (kinds of) imagination have dominion over (human beings). For this reason, the power of imagination is stronger in this world than the power of the intellect, for whatever the intelligent person attains through his intellect, he is not free of the power of imagination over his objects of intellection. Imagination is the greatest power in this perfect human form, and the revealed religions brought it. The religions made God transcendent and immanent, likening Him (shabbaha) in His transcendence (tanzīh) through imagination and making Him transcendent (nazzaha) in His immanence (tashbīh) through the intellect. Each is connected with the other, so that (182) transcendence cannot be free of immanence, and vice versa. God said: “There is nothing like Him” (Qur’ān 42:11), thus making Himself transcendent and immanent, and “He is the All-Hearing and the All-Seeing” (ibid., trans. AH), thus making Himself immanent.

This is the greatest verse of transcendence ever sent down, even though it is not free of immanence because of the letter kāf (like).³ He is therefore the greatest knower of Himself, and He expressed Himself only in the way we mentioned. Also He said: “Your Lord, the Lord of Might, is exalted above their description (of Him)” (Qur’ān 37:180). They describe God in terms of their rational perception. God placed Himself above their (perception) of His transcendence, because they limit Him by that transcendence, for their intellect is unable to perceive the (true) transcendence.

Then all religions brought (notions) dominated by imagination. They did not free the Real from any attribute through which He manifests Himself. All religions said and brought the same (ideas concerning God). The religious communities act accordingly and, as a result, God bestowed on them His self-manifestation, hence they adhered to God’s messengers as God’s inheritors, imitating what He said: “God knows best where to place His message” (Qur’ān 6:124, trans. AH). (The word) “God” in “God knows best” has two aspects: First, it is a predicate of God’s messengers,⁴ and second, it is a subject of “knows best where to place His message.” The two aspects are true regarding God; therefore, we hold immanence in transcendence and vice versa.

After establishing this issue, we drop the veils and lower the curtains over the eyes of the critic and the believer, even though both are among the forms in which the Real manifests Himself. However, we are ordered to cover (their eyes), so that the differences in the predispositions of the forms may be manifested and so that (we may know) that the one who manifests Himself does so according to the predisposition of a certain form; its reality and inherent traits are necessarily attributed to Him. For example, one sees the Real in his sleep and does not deny his vision; this is undoubtedly the Real Himself. As a result, the inherent traits of this form and its realities through which the Real manifests Himself in sleep are attached (to this vision). After one wakes up, one can pass from that which one sees in sleep to something else which, according to the intellect, requires transcendence. If the person who interprets his vision possesses unveiling (kashf) and belief (īmān), he does not pass from the vision to transcendence alone, but gives both transcendence and the form appearing in sleep (= immanence) that which they deserve. (183) For God is actually an expression (to be interpreted) by one who understands allusions.

The spirit of this wisdom and its frame (fāṣṣ – literally: bezel) lies in the division into that which affects (mu’aththir) and that which is affected (mu’aththar).

3 The exact translation of ka-mithlihi (like Him) is “like (ka) his simile,” which means that God has simile, consequently He is not transcendent but immanent, although His simile is not like other similes. Hence, even the first part of the verse implies both transcendence and immanence. See pp. 38, 78 above.

4 In the verse indicated, the phrase “God’s messengers” precedes the word “God,” and thus God becomes the predicate of God’s messengers. This signifies the identification of the messengers with God, an indication of immanence, whereas the second aspect indicates a distance between God and His messengers.

These are two expressions, the first of which in every respect, in every state, and in every realm is God, and the second in every respect, in every state, and in every realm is the world. When this wisdom comes to you, attach everything to its appropriate source, for that which comes to you is necessarily and always a branch stemming from a root, just as the Divine Love derives from the human being's supererogatory acts. This is an affect (sign – athar) between that which affects and that which is affected, just as the Real is His servant's hearing, seeing, and power, which derive from this love. This is an established affect which cannot be denied, because religion proves it, if you are a believer. As for a sane individual, he is either one who experienced divine self-manifestation in a natural manifestation and knows what we are talking about, or a Muslim believer who trusts that which is documented in the Ṣaḥīḥ.⁵ The imagination dominates necessarily the person who seeks that which the Real brought in this form, because he believes in it. As for the person who is not a believer, he governs his imagination through imagination, rationally thinking that he ascribes to God that which self-manifestation gives him in his vision, while his imaginings in this case do not leave him, for he is unaware of his negligence of himself. Concerning this, God said: "If you call on Me, I will answer you" (Qur'ān 40:60).⁶ God said: "If My servants ask you about Me, I am near. I will answer the one who calls Me, when one does so" (Qur'ān 2:186), for He does not answer, unless there is one who calls Him, even though the one who calls and the one who answers are the same.

There is no controversy concerning the variety of forms. No doubt, they are twofold. All these forms are like Zayd's organs; it is known that Zayd is one individual reality, (however) his hand is other than the forms of his leg, head, eye, and eyebrow. He is many and one (at the same time), (184) many in forms and one in essence, just as the human being is no doubt one in essence. 'Amr is undoubtedly distinct from Zayd, Khālīd, and Ja'far, and the individuals of this single essence (humankind) are infinite in existence. Even though the human being is one in essence, he has many forms and (his essence exists in many) individuals.⁷

If you are a believer, you know for certain that God will manifest Himself on the Day of Resurrection in a specific form and will be known, then change His form and will be not known, then once again change his form and will be known; it is He, not other than He, who manifests Himself in every form. It is known that each form is distinct from another; it is as if the Single Essence is reflected in a mirror, and when the beholder looks at the mirror and sees the form of his God in belief, he knows and confirms it. If it happens that he sees the form of another

5 This term refers to the two collections of the traditions, al-Bukhārī's and Muslim's, and indicates their reliability. Here Ibn al-'Arabī alludes to the tradition of the supererogatory works mentioned above.

6 Our author wishes to say that one should call on God and not be satisfied with his own intellect, which is deluded by his imagination. One believes that one rationally reasons, but actually is misled by fancies. Hence, one needs God's help.

7 For a possible influence of al-Ghazālī on the Greatest Master in this issue of the one and the many, see Abrahamov, Ibn al-'Arabī and the Sufis, pp. 121–124.

God in belief, he will not know Him, just as one sees in the mirror his form and the form of another person. The mirror is a single essence, yet the beholder sees many forms in the mirror, which (itself) has no comprehensive form, though the mirror affects the forms in one aspect and not in another. It affects the forms through the reflection of different measures, such as smallness, largeness, tallness, and broadness, which go back to the mirror. The changes that take place in mirrors derive from their different measures. If you look, for example, at one mirror among these, you do not look at all of them, just as you look at God with respect to His Essence, because He does not need anything. (And if) you look at Him with respect to His names, it is as if you are looking at many mirrors. If your soul looks at a divine name, its reality appears in you. This is the idea, if you understand.

Do not worry and do not be afraid, because God loves bravery even in killing a snake, and the snake is only your soul. The snake is a snake because of itself in form and in reality. And a thing is not killed on its own. Even if you destroy the form in your sense perception, (185) its definition preserves it and the imagination does not remove it. If this is the case, then the essences are safe, strong, and protected (from damage), for you cannot destroy the definitions (of the essences). What strength is better than this? You can imagine that you killed (someone); however, through imagination and intellectual perception his form remains with its definition.⁸ The proof of this (is): “You (Muḥammad) did not throw when you threw, but God threw” (Qur’ān 8:17). The eye of the beholder saw only Muḥammad’s form, and the sense of sight affirmed it throwing. First, God denied the act of throwing, then He affirmed it (“when you threw”), and finally corrected (the first phrase) by saying that it is God who threw in Muḥammad’s form.⁹ One must believe in this. Consider this effective factor through which God appeared in the form of Muḥammad. God Himself, not one of us, informed His servants of this. His message is true, and belief in it is obligatory, whether you perceive the knowledge (in the message) or not, be you a learned person or Muslim believer.

What proves the weakness of intellectual speculation is the judgment of the intellect that a cause cannot be an effect of the thing for which it serves as a cause. This is clearly the judgment of the intellect. However, in the science of self-manifestation, a cause can be the effect of the thing for which it is a cause. The judgment of the intellect is right,¹⁰ but its speculation must be revisited. The aim of this reconsideration is to say the following: After it was established that the Essence is one in many, then with respect to its being a cause of a certain effect in a certain form, it cannot be an effect of its effect in the state of its being a cause, but its aspect (of being a cause) changes when it moves in the forms, so that it becomes an effect of its effect, so that its effect becomes a cause to it (the effect).¹¹ If one reconsiders things as they really are and does not stop at his rational thinking, one attains this aim. If such is the case regarding causality, what do you think about expanding rational speculation into other difficult realms?¹²

⁹ In theological debates the verse cited serves to prove God’s predetermination. See, for example, al-Rāzī, Maṣāṭīḥ al-ghayb, part 15, p. 139.

The messengers are the most intelligent people, and the message they brought (186) stemmed from the Divine Presence (al-janāb al-ilāhī).¹³ They affirmed what the intellect affirmed and added what the intellect alone cannot perceive and what the intellect considers immediately as absurdity but acknowledges (it as true) after God's self-manifestation. When a person is alone, by himself, he is perplexed regarding what he has seen; if he is a servant of his Lord, he ascribes his intellect to Him, and if he is a servant of his own speculation, he ascribes the Real to the rule of the intellect. This is so only as long as he remains in this world, being veiled from the next world while in this life, for the gnostics outwardly appear here as if they were in the form of this world, because they are dominated by the rules of this world; however, no doubt, God transforms their outward appearance into the inward appearance of the next world. In their outward form they are known (really) only to those to whom God has revealed their insight so that they can perceive (the true nature of the gnostics). The gnostics are only those people who know the divine self-manifestation, because they possess the form of the next world. They are gathered (ḥashr) in this world for the Last Judgment and resurrected in their tombs, and they see what you cannot see, and witness what you cannot witness, because of God's Providence for some of His servants.

Whoever wishes to find this wisdom of Elias (who was) Idrīs, whom God twice brought into being – first, because he was a prophet before Noah, and then was raised up to heaven and then descended as a messenger, thus God joined for him the two positions (prophethood and mission) – must give up the domination of his intellect in favor of his desire. Then he will be a pure animal so that he can discover what every animal discovers, except the jinn and mankind (al-thaqalāni),¹⁴ and so will realize his animality. Elias possessed two signs, the first being this discovery; he could see the one tormented in the grave and the one who was delighted therein, and he could see the dead alive, the dumb speaking, and the 11 Let us try to explain the last sentence. Since the cosmos is the reflection of God's Essence, which means that it exists in every form, and since the Essence is the cause of the cosmos, one can state that the Essence is both a cause and an effect. Also, with respect to a certain form, which contains as noted the essence, it is both a cause and an effect. Moreover, one can state that an effect, that is, a certain form, may produce another effect, thus being an effect of its effect.

12 If rational speculation fails in the basic principle of causality, which is the cornerstone of every investigation, how much more so when it is applied to other problematic issues. It is worth noting that Aristotle at the very beginning of his Metaphysics points out the importance of causation in science.

13 Chittick translates this phrase as the Divine Side. SPK, p. 39.

14 Literally: the two heavy ones. Qur'ān 55:31. Here Ibn al-Arabī expresses the idea that in order to receive revelation one must relinquish all his knowledge.

sitting walking. The second sign is dumbness, for if he wished to speak of what he saw, he would be unable to do so; consequently, he would realize his animality.¹⁵

A student among us experienced such a revelation, but he did not become dumb, and so did not realize his animality. (But) when God placed me in this station, I fully realized my animality; I saw (things) and wished to speak (187) of what I had witnessed, but I could not, so there was no differentiating between me and the dumb, who cannot speak.

When an individual (like Elias) realizes what we have mentioned, he will be transformed into a state of pure intellect in an unnatural material, witness things that are the sources of the manifest natural forms, and know with intuitive knowledge (‘ilm dhawqī) from where this rule of the natural forms is manifested. If he experiences a revelation (which communicates to him) that nature is the same as the Breath of the Merciful, he will be given great benefit. If he is confined to what we have mentioned, this measure will suffice him to know what dominates his intellect. Then he will join the gnostics and know intuitively (the verse): “It was not you who killed them but God” (Qur’ān 8:17, trans. AH); only the iron and the striker and He who is behind these forms killed them. The killing and the throwing occurred by the joining of these elements, and in seeing things in their roots and forms, he thus completes his knowledge.¹⁶ If he witness the Breath (of the Merciful), he is both complete and perfect (in his knowledge), because he sees only God as the essence of what he sees, thus identifying the seer and the object of seeing. This measure (of explanation) is enough, and God guides us to the right way.

¹⁵ Ibn al-‘Arabī argues that al-Ghazālī could not attain unveiling because he failed to erase from his heart the sciences he had learned. Abrahamov, Ibn al-‘Arabī and the Sufis, pp. 131–133.

¹⁶ Meaning that his knowledge has all the elements needed, that is, the roots and the forms.

23 The bezel of the wisdom of virtue¹ exists in the essence of Luqmān

(187) If God wills Himself to desire sustenance/then all of Being is His food

If He wills us to desire sustenance/He is the food as He wills

His will is His desire, then adhere to it/He wills it, and it is the object of his will

He desires both increase and decrease/and what He wills is the object of His will

This is the difference between them, then realize (it)/from another perspective, their essence is the same²

(188) God said: “We gave Luqmān wisdom” (Qur’ān 31:12), “and whoever is given wisdom, is given much good” (Qur’ān 2:269). Thus, in the Qur’ān, (that is), through God’s witness, Luqmān possessed much good. Wisdom may be spoken or unspoken, as Luqmān said to his son: “My son, if even the weight of a mustard seed were hidden in a rock or anywhere in the heavens or earth, God would bring it (to light)” (Qur’ān 31:16). This is wisdom that is spoken, an act of God which He transmitted and affirmed in His Book; it is not ascribed to the one who utters it. However, unspoken wisdom is known by its circumstantial connections, for God neither spoke of the one to whom this seed was brought nor mentioned him, and Luqmān did not say to his son that God would bring it to him or to someone else. God spoke of this bringing in general, and placed the thing brought either in the heavens or on earth to call the thinker’s attention to God’s saying, “He is God in the heavens and the earth” (Qur’ān 6:3).

Through the spoken and the unspoken (content), Luqmān draws attention to (the idea) that the Real is the Essence of every known thing, for the known is more general than the thing, because (the Real) is most indefinite of all. Then he completed and exhausted the wisdom so that the cosmos (nash’a) will be perfected by it and said: “God is the All-Subtle (laṭīf)” (Qur’ān 31:16). Owing to His grace

² It seems that mashī’a (will) is the essential will which cannot be changed, while irāda (desire) is usually embodied in God’s prescriptions, which may be obeyed or not. See ch. 11 above. Here one cannot differentiate between the two terms.

(luṭf) and subtlety (laṭāfa), regarding the thing that is so named and so defined, He is its essence, so that of this thing it is said about it only what its name indicates through agreement and usage. Thus, one speaks of the heaven, the earth, the rock, the tree, the animal, the angel, the sustenance, and the food.

The essence of everything and in everything is one, just as the Ash‘arites said that the whole world takes the form of one substance, which is the core of our view, that the essence is one.³ Then the Ash‘arites said that each thing varies by its accidents. This is also our view that things are different and multiply through forms and relationships, so that they are distinct from each other, and so one may say this thing is different from that thing with respect to its form or accident or temperament. You may say whatever you wish. Yet this is the same thing as that with respect to its substance; for this reason, (189) the same substance exists in each form and temperament. However, we say that substance is in fact the Real. But the speculative thinker (mutakallim) assumes that what is named substance, even though it is real, is not identified with the essence of the Real of which the people of revelation and self-manifestation speak. This is the wisdom of His being the All-Subtle (laṭīf).

Then he (Luqmān) described (God) as the All-Knowing (khabīr), meaning knowing through experience (ikhtibār, or putting something to the test). As He said: “We shall test you in order to know” (Qur’ān 47:31); and this (then) is knowledge through experience (ilm al-adhwāq). In spite of His knowledge of things as they really are, God made Himself acquire knowledge. We are incapable of denying what the Real determined about Himself, for He distinguished between experiential knowledge and unrestricted knowledge, because the former is limited by the (human) faculties. He said of Himself that He is the essence of His servant’s faculties when he said: “I am his hearing,”⁴ which is one of the servant’s faculties, as well as His seeing, and His tongue, foot, and hand, which are the servant’s organs. In His definition (of the human being), He did not limit Himself to the faculties alone, but also mentioned the human organs, for the servant is nothing but organs and faculties. Thus, the essence of what is named “the servant” is the Real. This does not imply the identification of the servant with the master, because the relationships (between the servant and God’s names) are differentiated on account of themselves, while the essence to which they refer is not differentiated, because in all relationships only His Essence exists. This one essence (alone) combines all relationships, references, and attributes.

Part of Luqmān’s complete wisdom in instructing his son is these two divine names which he brought forth in this verse, the All-Subtle and the All-Knowing, by which he named God. However, had Luqmān placed the two names in being, that is in existence, saying, “God is (kāna) (the All-Subtle, the All-Knowing),” his wisdom would have been more complete and deeper.⁵ God related Luqmān's utterance exactly as he said it, without adding anything to it, even though (190) the words "God is the All-Subtle, the All-Knowing" were God's words, for God knew that Luqmān would have completed his utterance with these words, had he concluded what he was saying.

As for His saying, "if even the weight of a mustard seed" (Qur'ān 31:16) for whom it is food, (the weight of a mustard seed) is only the atom, mentioned in His verses: "Whoever has done a speck's weight of good, will see it, and whoever has done a speck's weight of evil, will see it" (Qur'ān 99:7–8, trans. on the basis of AH). (Whoever eats this speck) is the smallest feeder, for the master seed is the smallest (speck of) food. If there had been a smaller particle, God would have produced it, as His verse says, "God does not shy away from giving an example of a gnat or something higher" (Qur'ān 2:26). Now, since He knew that nothing is smaller than a gnat, He said, "or something higher," meaning concerning smallness. This is God's saying here and also in Qur'ān 99. Know this, for we know that God does not restrict Himself to the weight of a speck, while there is something smaller than that, because He brought it forth for the purpose of exaggeration, and God knows best.

As for his forming a diminutive of his son's name (bunayya), it is a diminutive of mercy. Because of his mercy, he advised his son that if he acts properly, he will gain happiness. The wisdom of his advice lies in forbidding him from "attributing associates to God, for attributing associates to Him is a great evil" (Qur'an 31:13). This evil refers to God's state of unity, because it describes Him as divided (into parts), while He is one Essence, and this is the utmost ignorance, because His Essence is His only associate.

The reason for this is that the person who does not possess the knowledge of things as they really are and of their reality does not know that when the Essence appears to him in different forms, this difference goes back to one essence, hence he makes each form an associate of the essence, and each form becomes a part of this essence. However, it is well known regarding an associate that what distinguishes it from that with which it is an associate is not the essence of another associate, because the other is distinguished by something else. (191) Consequently, really there is no associate, because among the things of which we say they are associates, each associate has a distinguishing element of its own. The reason for this (view) is general association. Even if it is general, the ability of each associate to freely act cancels its generality. "Say: 'Call on God, or call on the Merciful'" (Qur'ān 17:110).⁶ This is the spirit of the subject (here discussed).

⁵ Probably by the addition of this verb, Ibn al-ʿArabī intends to say that God always, in the past, present, and future, knows and puts humans to the test, and that these traits are components of His fixed relationships with the cosmos. Kāshānī, p. 482.

⁶ According to this verse, there is no difference between God's names, because they are related to one essence.

24 The bezel of the wisdom of leadership¹ exists in the essence of Aaron

(191) Know that Aaron's existence stemmed from the presence of divine Mercy (raḥamūt),² because God said: "We have bestowed on him," that is, on Moses, "out of Our Mercy, his brother Aaron as a prophet" (Qur'ān 19:53). His prophethood derived from the presence of divine Mercy, because he was older than Moses, nevertheless Moses was greater than him in prophethood. Since Aaron's prophethood derived from the presence of divine Mercy, he said to his brother Moses, "O son of my mother" (Qur'ān 20:94), calling on him by his mother, not by his father, because mercy is more fitted to the mother than to the father. Had the mother not possessed mercy, she would not have had the forbearance to rear children.

Then he (Aaron) said: "Do not seize my beard, nor my head (ibid.), and do not make my enemies gloat over me" (Qur'ān 7:150). All this is a breath of Mercy's breaths. The reason for this was that Moses did not look carefully at the tablets he threw down from his hands. Had he looked carefully at the tablets, he would have found in them guidance and mercy. Guidance is an explanation of the event that made Moses angry and of which Aaron was guiltless. Aaron found mercy in his brother's (behavior), because Moses did not seize Aaron's beard before the eyes of his people, taking into consideration his brother's older age. Aaron felt pity for Moses, because Aaron's prophethood derived from God's Mercy, and only mercy derives from His Mercy.

Thereafter Aaron said to Moses, "I was afraid you would say, 'You have caused division among the children of Israel'" (Qur'ān 20:94, trans. AH), thus making me the cause of their division, (192) for the worship of the calf divided them. Some of them worshiped the calf, following the Sāmīrī³ and imitating him, while some others abstained from worshipping it until Moses' return so that they could ask him about it. Aaron was afraid that Moses would attribute this sin to him. However, Moses knew the matter better than Aaron, because he knew of that which the people of the calf worshiped, and he also knew that God had decreed to worship only Him, and what God ordains will surely happen. Moses reproached his brother Aaron, because he denied that God's essence permeates everything.⁴ That is because the gnostic sees the Real in everything; moreover, he regards Him as the essence of everything. Thus, Moses taught Aaron by granting him knowledge, even though Aaron was older than him.

² This term is built on the pattern of jabarūt and malakūt.

For this reason, since Aaron said to Moses what he said, the latter returned to the Sāmīrī, saying to him, "What was the matter with you, O Sāmīrī?" (ibid., 95); that is, what did you make when you turned to the specific form of the calf? You made this form using the ornaments of the people until you deceived them because you took their property. Jesus (explained this phenomenon), saying: "O Children of Israel, the heart of every human being lies in the place of his property, thus, if you place your property in the heaven, your hearts will be there" (Matthew 6:21). Property (māl) is so called, because essentially the heart inclines (tamīlu) to it through worship.⁵ This is the greatest aim admired by the heart, because of its desire for it.

Forms do not last, and the form of the calf would necessarily have perished, had not Moses hurried to burn it. His fervor overcame his nature and he burned the calf and scattered its ashes upon the sea. Thereafter, he said to the Sāmīrī: "Look at your god" (Qur'ān 20:97). He called it a "god" in the manner of calling attention in order to teach, because he knew that the calf is one of God's manifestations. (He said), "I will surely burn it" (lanuḥariqannahu – ibid.).⁶ (Moses said this) because the animality of the human being can act freely over the animality of the animal, for God subjects animals to the human being (193), especially regarding a thing which is not an animal, which is more subject to the human being, because the inanimate things have no will and are controlled by that which acts freely over them without their being able to resist.

As for the animal, it possesses will and aim, and it can refuse to do some acts, and if it is able to manifest such a behavior, it can show defiant attitude toward what the human being wants from it. If the animal does not have the power (to resist), or if the (human wish) coincides with the aim of the animal, it obeys submissively to the human will. In like manner, the human being obeys a command, by which God raises him above others, because he hopes to attain some profit from his obedience. The profit is sometimes called reward, as He says: "We have raised some of them above others in rank, so that some may subject others" (Qur'ān 43:32, based on AH). Only because of his animality, not because of his humanity, is a human being subjugated to another human being, for the two similar persons are contraries (regarding humanity).⁷ Whoever is higher than another in rank, because of property or honor, subjugates another by his humanity, and the latter is a subject of him by his fear or greed arising from his animality, not from 4 This sentence is translated in the light of the following one.

5 The noun māl derives from the root m.w.l., while the verb tamīlu stems from m.y.l. As usual, this does not prevent Ibn al-ʿArabī from connecting their meanings. See above, ch. 3, n. 20.

6 The text has lanuḥarikannahu (We will surely burn it).

7 Here we see once again one of the basic elements of Ibn al-ʿArabī's doctrine, that is, the consideration of a matter from two or more points of view. One can consider a human being from the point of view of his animality, that is, for example, his lower soul, and also from the point of view of his humanity, that is, his intellect and ethical behavior.

his humanity. A person does not subjugate another who is like him. Do you not see animals stirring up each other because they are similar and the similar animals oppose each other? For this reason He said: "We have raised some of them above others in rank" (ibid.), and the one who subjugates differs in rank from the subjugated. Hence, subjugation occurs as a result of difference in rank.

Subjugation falls into two categories. First is the subjugation emanating from the subjugator's will to overcome the subjugated person, as the master subjugates the slave, even though both are human beings, and the ruler of his subjects, even though they are similar (in humanity) – (in both cases), subjugation occurs because of rank. The second is the subjugation deriving from circumstances, as when the subjects subjugate the ruler who takes care of them by defending them, fighting against (194) their enemies and safeguarding their property and souls. (In) all these acts the subjects subjugate the ruler because of their state, and this category is actually called the subjugation of rank, because the rank of the ruler determines this. Some kings work (only) in their own interests, while others know their role (literally: matter) and their rank of subjugation by their subjects. They (also) know the value and rights of their subjects. God rewards these (kings) as He rewards scholars who know things as they really are, and it is God's obligation to reward such people, because He takes care of His servants. In fact, the whole cosmos subjugates the One that cannot be called subjugated (God), (as) He said: "Every day He takes care of something" (Qur'ān 55:29).

Aaron could not deter the people from worshipping the calf and overcoming it as Moses did, because of God's wisdom which manifests itself in existence so that He should be worshipped in every form. When this form disappeared afterward, it disappeared only after it had been mixed with Divinity in the eyes of its worshipper. For this reason, every kind of thing is worshipped either as divine or as a subjugator. The intelligent person necessarily knows this. Nothing in the cosmos is worshiped unless its worshipper ascribes to it high value and elevated degree. For this reason the Real is called, for our sake, "The Elevated in degrees" (Qur'ān 40:15). He did not say "The Elevated in degree," for He multiplied the degrees in one essence. Thus, He decreed that only He should be worshiped in many various degrees, and that each degree embodies God's self-manifestation in which He is worshiped. The greatest and loftiest of the degrees in which He is worshiped is passion, as He said: "Have you seen him who has taken his passion to be his god?" (Qur'ān 45:23). It (passion) is the greatest object of worship, for only thanks to it everything can be worshiped, and it is worshiped only through its essence. Regarding this I say:

The essence of passion is that passion causes passion/had passion not been in the heart, passion would have not been worshiped

(195) Do you not see how perfect God's knowledge of things is, and how He completed (our knowledge) concerning him who worshipped his passion and took it to be his god, and said: "God led him astray (aḍallahu) knowingly" (ibid.), and going astray (ḍalāla) is confusion? That is because he (the Prophet) saw this person worshipping only his passion by obeying it. His passion ordered him to worship objects, so that even his worshipping God also derived from his passion, because had passion – which is will caused by love – not arisen in him regarding this sacred presence, he would neither have worshiped God nor preferred Him to other (objects). Likewise, whoever worships one of the forms of the world and takes it to be a god does not do this but through passion. The worshiper is always under the rule of his passion.

Also he sees that worshipers have different objects of worship, and one worshiper declares another who worships some other object to be an unbeliever. Whoever pays a little attention (to this phenomenon) is confused by the unity of passion, moreover its oneness, for it is the same phenomenon in each servant. For this reason, “God led him astray” (ibid.), that is, confused him, “knowing” (ibid.) that every worshiper venerates only his passion, making him a servant, whether he meets unexpectedly a religion or not.

The perfect knower (gnostic) is whoever regards every object of worship as a manifestation of God in which He is worshiped. For this reason, they all call every object of worship god (ilāh), although its specific name might be stone, tree, animal, human being, star, or angel. This is the particular name of each god. Divinity causes the worshiper to imagine that this is the object (literally: level – martaba) of his worship, while truly it is the manifestation of the Real in the perception of the worshiper who devotes himself to this object in its specific manifestation.

For this reason, some knowers expressed an ignorant view: “We only worship them because they bring us closer to God” (Qur’ān 39:3, AH), although they called them gods when they said: “Did he make the gods one god? This is an astonishing thing” (Qur’ān 38:5). They did not deny one god, but were astonished at this, (196) for they stuck to the multiplicity of forms and the relationship of divinity to them.⁸ Then the Messenger came and called them to one God, who can be known but not witnessed by them. However, they affirmed Him and believed in Him, saying: “We only worship them because they bring us closer to God” (Qur’ān 39:3, AH), for they knew those forms are made of stone. For this reason, they were refuted by His saying: “Say (to those who ascribe partners to God), name them” (Qur’ān 13:33). However, they named them only because they knew these names have a reality.

As for those who knew things as they really are, they made known their denial of the forms which were worshiped, because their degree of knowledge taught them to be subject to the rule of the messenger through which they were called believers, instead of being subject to the rule of time. The polytheists are worshipers of time (‘ubbād al-waqt),⁹ although they knew they did not worship the forms themselves, but only God in these forms, because they knew the rule of self-manifestation exists in the idols. The denier, who did not know the self-manifestation, was not aware of this (phenomenon), (while) the perfect knower, that is, the prophet, messenger, and inheritor (of prophet and messenger), concealed it from the people.

⁹ By this appellation, Ibn al-‘Arabī probably means those who do not know the essence of things, but only their external appearances in time.

God ordered the people to leave these forms, for the messenger of the time left them, so that they would follow him, desiring God's love, by His saying: "If you love God, follow me, then God will love you" (Qur'ān 3:31). He called for God, who is aspired to and generally known, but not witnessed, (for) "Glances do not perceive Him" (Qur'ān 6:103), but "He perceives the glances" (ibid.), because of His subtlety and the permeation of the things themselves. Glances do not perceive Him, just as they do not perceive the human beings' spirits which direct the bodies and their external forms. "And He is the All-Subtle and All-Knowing (of experience)" (ibid.). Experience means tasting, and tasting is the self-manifestation that exists in forms. Both they and He are necessary, and the one who sees Him through one's passion necessarily worships Him, if you understand, "and it is incumbent on God to show the right way" (Qur'ān 16:9).

25 The bezel of the wisdom of exaltation exists in the essence of Moses¹

(197) The wisdom of (Pharaoh's) slaying the boys was destined to support Moses through the life of every slain boy, who was killed as if he were Moses. (In this act), there was no ignorance, for the life of every slain boy was necessarily returned to Moses. Each life was pure, because its inborn trait (fiṭra) of the primordial covenant of *balā*² was unimpaired by selfish aims. Moses was the combination of the lives of all the boys who were killed as if each one was Moses, hence, every spiritual predisposition of each slain boy inhered in Moses. God particularized Moses in an unprecedented manner, for he possessed many kinds of wisdom. I shall present successively, if God wills, some of these in this chapter in measure of the occurrence of the divine instruction (amr ilāhī)³ in my thought.

The above notion was the first thing I was told (shūfihtu bihi)⁴ in this chapter. When Moses was born, he was the sum of many spirits and active powers, because the small part (of the human being) acts on the large part. Do you not see how the infant, with his special trait, acts on the adult so that the latter comes down from his leading position and plays with the infant, rocking him and appearing before the infant as his equal in understanding? Thus, the adult becomes subject to the infant without being aware of it. Also, the child occupies the adult with his rearing, protection, looking after his interests, and making his life easy, so that he will not be anxious. All this pertains to the ways the younger acts on the older, because of the power of the child's state, for the child has been recently acquainted with his Lord, for he is closer to his birth (198), while the older is more distant from this acquaintance. Thus, whoever is nearer to God subordinates the one more distant from Him, just as by virtue of their closeness to the king, his highest officials subordinate those

2 Qur'ān 7:172.

3 Since Ibn al-'Arabī was inspired to write this book and its content was dictated to him, it is advisable here to render amr as instruction, that is, what God taught him, and not a command.

4 The verb shāfaha means to speak mouth to mouth (face to face), and one can deduce from the use of this verb the notion of direct revelation to Ibn al-'Arabī who only transmitted what he was told.

more remote from him. God's Messenger used to bare himself to the rain uncovering his head so that the rain touched him; then he said the reason is that the rain recently had contact with God. Think of the Prophet's knowledge of God – how exalted, high, and clear it is. The rain subjugates the best people, because of its proximity to its Lord; it was like a messenger who sends down inspiration to the Prophet calling him directly by his essence, and the Prophet bared himself to him to receive what he brought from the Lord. Had the Prophet not received a divine benefit from the touch of the rain, he would not have exposed himself to it.⁵ Thus, this is the message of the water from which God made every living thing,⁶ so understand!

As for the wisdom of putting him (Moses) in the ark (tābūt) and throwing him into the river,⁷ (its meaning is the following): The ark alludes to his humanity, while the river is the symbol of the knowledge he attained through his body. Only via the body, composed of the four elements, can the human soul be supplied with the faculties of reasoning, sensation, and imagination. When the soul resides in the body and is ordered to act on and direct the body, God makes these faculties tools through which one can fulfill what God wants from him in directing his humanity (tābūt) in which God's presence (sakīna) inheres.⁸ He was cast into the river in order to attain different kinds of knowledge through these faculties. God taught him that even though the spirit which directs him is his ruler, the spirit directs him through these faculties. God made these faculties, which reside in humanity (expressed through the tābūt), associate the human being through allusions and kinds of wisdom.

In like manner, God directs the cosmos; He allows it to direct itself by itself or by its form,⁹ just as the existence of the child depends on his father's bringing him into existence (ijād al-wālid), the effects on their causes, the conditioned things on their conditions, the objects of knowledge on knowledge,¹⁰ the notions that are proved on their proofs, and the unquestionable notions (199) on their truths. All these things pertain to the cosmos and this is God's direction of it; He let it direct itself by itself. As for our saying "by its form," meaning the form of the cosmos, I mean the Most Beautiful Names and the highest attributes through which God is named and described. We find the meaning and the spirit of each of His names by which He is named in the cosmos. Thus, He directs the cosmos only through its form.

For this reason, He said regarding the creation of Ādam, who is the model (namūdhaq)¹¹ that includes the qualities of the divine Presence, that is, the Essence, ⁸ On the notion that the sakīna resides in the tābūt, see Qur'ān 2:248.

⁹ According to Ibn al-ʿArabī, everything is directed by the rules inherent in it and by God's names.

¹⁰ Read here al-maʿlūmāt ʿalā ʿulūmihā instead of al-maʿlūlāt ʿalā ʿilalihā (effects on their causes), which repeats what was already said.

the attributes and acts: “God created Ādam in His image.”¹² His image is only the divine Presence. In this noble archetype, which is the Perfect Human Being, He brought into existence all the divine names and the realities that are brought forth from him in the macro-cosmos outside him. God made him (Ādam) the spirit of the cosmos and subordinated to him the high and the low things, because of his perfect form. Just as everything in the cosmos praises Him,¹³ so everything in the cosmos is subordinated to this human being, because of the reality of his form. God said: “He has subjugated all that is in the heavens and the earth as a present for you” (Qur’ān 45:13). Thus, everything in the world is subject to the human being; the one who knows this is the perfect human being, while the human being who is like an animal does not know it.

Putting Moses in the ark and casting the ark into the river was an external form of destruction; however, from an inward perspective, it saved him from being killed. He lived just as the souls live because of knowledge, (escaping) the death of ignorance as God said: “Or whoever was a dead person” (Qur’ān 6:122), meaning because of ignorance, and “We restored him to life” (ibid.), meaning because of knowledge, and “We gave him light by which he can walk among people” (ibid.), meaning guidance (light), “Is this person like one who walks in darkness” (ibid.), meaning going astray, “unable to escape it” (ibid.), meaning that he can never be rightly guided, for going astray is inherent in his soul, and there is no other aim which can make him act otherwise.

Guidance means that the human being (200) is led to perplexity (hayra),¹⁴ so that he knows that (divine) matter involves perplexity, and perplexity is anxiety and motion, and motion is life. Hence, there is neither rest nor death; there is only existence and (therefore) no nonexistence. In like manner God said, regarding the water by which the earth lives and moves: “It (the earth) quakes” (Qur’ān 22:5), and concerning the earth’s pregnancy, He said: “(The earth) swells” (ibid.), and as for its giving birth, He said: “It brings forth every joyous pair” (ibid.). This means that the earth gives birth only to that which is like it, that is, natural like it. Pairing (zawjiyya, shafiyya) is the basis of what the earth gives birth and what appears from it.

Likewise, the existence of the Real (is attested) through the multiplicity of the cosmic phenomena and His many names, and the form of the world requires the realities of the divine names. Through the cosmic phenomena and their creator, the Unity of Manyness (aḥadiyyat al-kathra) is proved. (The Real) is One in His entity with respect to His Essence, just as the substance (jawhar) of primary matter is one with respect to its essence and many with respect to all the forms which appear through it and for which it serves as their substrate. Similarly, the Real is many, because of the forms of His self-manifestation; however, He is the manifestation of the cosmic forms, notwithstanding His intelligible Unity. Think how good is this divine instruction through which God particularizes whomsoever among His people He wishes him to learn (this idea).

Since Pharaoh's family¹⁵ found him in the river by the tree, Pharaoh called him Mūsā (Moses). In Coptic mū means water, and sā is a tree, thus he called him after the place where he found him, for the ark stopped at the tree in the river. Pharaoh wanted to kill him, but his wife – who was inspired by a divine speech (201) and whom God created for perfection, as the Prophet said about her when he acknowledged her and Maryam, the daughter of 'Imrān, as possessing perfection which (usually) pertains to males – said to her husband regarding Moses that he “is a delight for me and you” (Qur'ān 28:9). Thus, she was delighted by him through her perfection which was granted to her, as we said, and he (Moses) was a delight for Pharaoh through the belief God granted him as he was drowning.

God made him die when he was pure, immaculate, and free of evilness, because He put him to death being a believer before he acquired any sin. (Acceptance of) Islam erases what (one did) before.¹⁶ God made it a sign of his providence for whomsoever He wishes, so that no one despairs of God's Mercy, “for only unbelievers despair of God's Mercy” (Qur'ān 12:87). If Pharaoh had been one of those who despair, he would not have hastened to believe in God.

As Pharaoh's wife said, Moses was a “delight for me and you . . . maybe he will benefit us” (Qur'ān 28:9). So it happened, for God benefited both of them through Moses even though they did not know that he was the prophet who would be responsible for the destruction of Pharaoh's kingdom and people. When God protected him from Pharaoh, “the heart of Moses' mother became empty” (ibid., 10) of the anxiety which had affected her. Then God prevented him from being suckled until he was brought to his mother's breast, and she suckled him and so God made her pleasure in him complete.

In like manner, God taught (humanity) the religions, as He said: “We have made a law (shir'atan) and a path (minhājan) for each of you” (Qur'ān 5:48), meaning a way (ṭarīq). Minhājan means that from this way (minhā) each one came (jā'a).¹⁷ This statement makes an allusion to the sources (aṣl, literally: root) from which it came. This source (religion) is his sustenance, just as the branch of a tree is nourished only from its root.

What is prohibited in one law may be permitted in another, that is, with respect to the form. I mean (202) my saying that this is permitted.¹⁸ Essentially, a thing is not the same as it was, because everything is created anew, and there is no repetition (in creation). We have (already) called your attention to this (notion).¹⁹

¹⁵ The Qur'ān (28:9) speaks of Pharaoh's wife, as it is written here below.

¹⁷ The author divides the word minhājan into two words: minhā (from it, from the way) and jā'a (each one came).

¹⁹ Ibn al-ʿArabī here adopts the Ashʿarite doctrine of continuous creation. See pp. 91f.

God refers to this (notion) regarding Moses when He forbade employing a wet nurse,²⁰ because his mother was really the woman who suckled him, not the woman who bore him. The mother, who bore him, did this as one who receives a trust; the child was produced in her and nourished by her menstrual blood. She did not will this, so that she was not indebted to him, for he was nourished, and if he were not nourished by what nourished him and the menstrual blood did not come from her, this would destroy her or make her ill. Hence, the mother was indebted to the fetus, because it was nourished by this blood and it protected her from injury, which she would experience, if this blood did not come from her and if her fetus was not nourished by it. The wet nurse is different, because by her suckling the child, the aim is to give him life and preserve it. God gave this advantage to Moses' mother, and no other woman enjoyed this advantage except his mother, so that she would be delighted in rearing him and seeing him grow at her bosom, "that she might not grieve" (Qur'ān 28:13).

God rescued him from the anxiety of the ark, and Moses broke the darkness of nature because God granted him divine knowledge even if he did not go beyond of it (nature). God subjected him to trials,²¹ that is, put him to the test in many circumstances, so that he would realize patience in himself when God tempted him. The first trial God subjected him to was killing the Egyptian, for God inspired him to do this and made it fit his innermost part (his soul), even though Moses was unaware of this. However, he did not care to kill the Egyptian and did not wait to receive God's order to kill him, for the prophet is inwardly protected and is unaware (of it), until he prophesies, that is, is informed by God. For this reason, al-Khiḍr showed him the killing of the youth,²² which Moses disowned, forgetting his killing of the Egyptian.

Then, al-Khiḍr said to Moses: "I did it not of my own bidding" (Qur'ān 18:82, trans. Arberry), calling Moses' attention to his (al-Khiḍr's) degree before he was informed that he was protected regarding this very event, even though he was not aware of this protection. Also he (al-Khiḍr) showed him making a hole in the vessel (and as a result its sinking), which outwardly was its destruction, while inwardly it was saved from being plundered. Al-Khiḍr made this (event) (203) correspond to Moses' ark, which was in the river. Outwardly it signified destruction, while inwardly deliverance. His mother did it, looking at Pharaoh out of fearing his violence, because he could slaughter him in order to cause her harm.²³ She did it with the help of God's inspiration, without having been aware of it. She felt in herself a desire to suckle him; however, when she feared for his safety, she cast him into the river, for the proverb says: "If the eye does not see, the heart does not grieve." She did not fear for him because of what she saw, or grieve for him upon looking at him. Probably she thought that God would restore him to her because she had a good opinion of Him. She lived with this thought in herself, as hope, fear, and despair were blended (in such a situation). For this reason, when she was inspired, she said: "Perhaps this is the messenger who will destroy Pharaoh and his people." She lived enjoying this fancy, and with respect to her, this assumption essentially amounted to knowledge.

Then, Moses was sought (by the Egyptians) and he came out of the city, escaping from (his persecutors), outwardly out of fear, but inwardly for love of deliverance. That is because movement is always caused by love, and the one who looks at movement is prevented from seeing this cause, for (he has in his mind) other causes, that are not (the real cause). This can be explained by the fact that the origin (of all things) is the movement of the cosmos from nonexistence, in which it resides, to existence. For this reason, it is said that the whole cosmos derives from movement after its being at rest.²⁴ Movement, which is the existence of the cosmos, derives from love. God's Messenger called (our) attention to this, saying: "I was a hidden and unknown treasure and (therefore) I loved (or wanted) to be known."²⁵ Had this love not existed, the cosmos itself would not have appeared. Its movement from nonexistence to existence derives from love which brings it into existence, and the cosmos too loves to see itself in concrete existence, as it saw itself in a hidden fixed state (thubūt). Hence, in every respect its movement from fixed nonexistence to existence derives from the love of both the Real and the cosmos, because (204) perfection is loved by virtue of itself (al-kamāl maḥbūb li-dhātihi).²⁶ And His knowledge of Himself with respect to His ability to dispense with (all) things belongs to Him (alone) by virtue of His essence (huwa lahu bi-dhātihi). What remains is only to complete the degree of knowledge through the knowledge of what comes into being (al-ʿilm al-ḥādīth) based on the concrete entities, the entities of the world, when they exist (literally: are found – wujidat). The form of perfection is manifest through the knowledge of things that come into being and knowledge of the eternal things; the degree of knowledge becomes perfect through both aspects. The degrees of existence are perfected similarly, for existence is divided into the eternal and noneternal; the latter is what comes into being. The eternal is the existence of the Real by virtue of Himself, and the non-eternal is the existence of the Real in the form of the concrete (thābit) world. The non-eternal is called coming into being (ḥudūth), because parts of it appear to others, and appear in the form of the world. Thus, existence becomes perfect, and the movement of the world derives from love of perfection, so understand!

Do you not see how He relieves the constriction of the divine names²⁷ from the nonexistent manifestation of their effects in what is called the world? God loves ²⁴ Very probably by this phrase (at rest), Ibn al-ʿArabī means the state of the cosmos as a thought God had before His self-manifestation took place.

²⁵ The present tradition was considered spurious by the experts of Ḥadīth; hence, Ibn al-ʿArabī ascribed its authenticity to unveiling. SPK, p. 391, n. 14.

case, and He reaches it only through the existence of the forms, the highest and the lowest. Thus, it is proved that movement derives from love, and there is no movement in Being except that which stems from love.²⁸ Among the learned people some know this and some others are veiled from knowing it, because they consider the proximate cause which dominates their soul and makes them decide according to it.

Moses' fear because he killed the Egyptian was evident. (At the same time) this fear implied the will (love) of deliverance from being killed. (Outwardly) he escaped because he feared; however, inwardly he escaped because he willed (loved) to be rescued from Pharaoh and what he would do to him.²⁹ (The Qur'ān) mentions the evident and proximate cause, which was (in relation to the real cause), as the form of the body is to the human being. And the will (love) to be rescued was implicit in him, just as the spirit which directs the body is implicit in the body.

When the prophets turn to the people, they use external and general expressions and base their address on the understanding of the knower and the listener.³⁰ The messengers take into account only the common people, because they know the degree of their understanding, as the Prophet called attention to (205) this degree in the chapter of gifts and said: "I will give a gift to a man, even though another gift is dearer to me, for fear that God will throw him into the Fire."³¹ Thus, he took into consideration the low-minded who are driven by greed and natural desires.

Thus, the knowledge the prophets brought was covered with a garment (khiṭ'a)³² fitted to the lowest understanding, so that whoever cannot penetrate this cover would say how good is this garment and regard it as the last aim. However, the one who possesses subtle understanding and who dives to reach the pearls of wisdom, which he deserves to find, says: "This is a garment given by the king." Thereafter, he examines the value of this garment and its kind among other garments. He then realizes the value of the one on whom it was bestowed and finds a knowledge which others cannot attain, because they do not know the value of this garment.

Since the prophets, messengers, and (their) heirs knew that in the world and among peoples of the world there are such persons, they intended to express (their messages) in an outward understandable manner, one which both the common and the elite share. The elite person understands what the common people understand

²⁹ "So Moses left the city, fearful and wary, and prayed, 'My Lord, save me from people who do wrong'" (Qur'ān 28:21).

³⁰ Here Ibn al-ʿArabī follows the philosophers who claim that the Qur'ān expresses itself in a style which can be understood by the common people. Consequently, part of the Qur'ān, for example the descriptions of Paradise and Hell, should be interpreted metaphorically. Walbridge, God and Logic, p. 80.

³¹ Bukhārī, II, 19 (27).

³² The literal meaning of this word is "robe of honor." However, by this metaphor, our author means the outward cover of the prophets' statements that only the subtle scholar may penetrate.

and more, thus he is rightly called one of the elite and through this additional understanding he distinguishes himself from the common people. For this reason, those who transmit knowledge are satisfied (with this state of affairs). This is the wisdom in Moses' saying: "I escaped from you out of fear" (Qur'ān 26:21); he did not say I fled from you out of love of safety and well-being.

Thereafter, he came to Madyan and found two maidens and "he watered (their flocks)" (Qur'ān 28:24) without (asking) payment, "then he turned to the shadow" (ibid.) of God and said: "My Lord, I need the good You sent down to me" (ibid.). Thus, he made his act of watering the same as the good God sent to him, and described himself as one in want of God regarding the good that is with Him.

Al-Khiḍr wished to build a wall without (asking) payment, and Moses reproved him for that.³³ (As a response) al-Khiḍr reminded him that he watered the flocks without asking payment and other things he did not mention, until Muḥammad wished that Moses would have been silent and not raised objections, so that God could tell him of Moses' and al-Khiḍr's affair. (206) Hence, Muḥammad would know through God's story the place to which Moses was led without his being aware of this. Had Moses known (the role of al-Khiḍr), he would not have disapproved of al-Khiḍr's deeds. God made al-Khiḍr's deeds true in the eyes of Moses, purified him, and led him to the right way. Notwithstanding, Moses ignored al-Khiḍr's purification and the condition the latter had laid down so that Moses could follow him.³⁴ This (story) will shed God's Mercy on us, if we forget God's (hidden aims).³⁵ Had Moses known (the hidden meanings of al-Khiḍr's acts), al-Khiḍr would not have said to him "(How could you have patience in) matters beyond your knowledge" (Qur'ān 18:68, trans. AH.)? By this al-Khiḍr meant: I attained knowledge through mystical experience (literally: taste – dhawq), which you (Moses) could not attain, just as you possessed knowledge which I could not attain. Thus, al-Khiḍr was just to Moses.

As for the wisdom in al-Khiḍr's separation from Moses, it is (reasoned) in God's saying: "Accept whatever the Messenger gives you, and abstain from whatever he forbids you" (Qur'ān 59:7, trans. AH). Those who know God and the value of the Message and the Messenger stop at these words. Since al-Khiḍr knew that Moses was God's messenger, he began to watch Moses' sayings, so that he might behave with good manners toward the messenger as he deserved. Then Moses said to him: "From now on, if I ask you something, do not follow me" (Qur'ān 18:76). Thus, he forbade al-Khiḍr to be in his company. When Moses reacted to al-Khiḍr's act the third time, al-Khiḍr said: "This is the separation between me and you" (ibid., 78). Moses did not say to him do not act, nor did he ask al-Khiḍr to stay in his company, because he knew the value of his position, which told him to forbid al-Khiḍr's company. Moses remained silent, and the separation took place.

³³ Qur'ān 18:77.

³⁴ Al-Khiḍr stipulated that Moses would not ask him about his acts until he would inform him. Qur'ān 18:70.

³⁵ The author seems to say that whenever a human being does not understand God's acts, he should remind himself of the story about Moses, who did not realize the wisdom in al-Khiḍr's acts until he was informed.

Look at the perfection of the knowledge of these two persons. Moses maintained divine good manners and al-Khiḍr was just to Moses in acknowledging before Moses the (following): "I possessed knowledge which God taught me and you did not know, and you possessed knowledge which God taught you and I did not know." This announcement of al-Khiḍr regarding Moses constituted a remedy for the injury he caused Moses when he said: "How could you have patience about matters beyond your knowledge" (Qur'ān 18:68, trans. AH)? Al-Khiḍr said this though he knew the lofty position Moses held because of his mission and that he (al-Khiḍr) lacked such a position. This became manifest in the Muḥammadan community in the tradition of the pollination of the palm trees, concerning which Muḥammad told to his Companions: "You know best the interests of your worldly affairs."³⁶ No doubt, the knowledge of a thing is better than ignorance of it. For this reason, God praises Himself that "He (207) absolutely knows everything" (Qur'ān 29:62). Thus, Muḥammad admitted to his Companions that they are more cognizant of the worldly affairs than he, because he possessed no experience in these matters, for these things require experience and practice, and he did not find time to learn them, because he was engaged with more important things. In sum, I have called your attention to this important behavior which will benefit you if you use it.

God's saying: "My Lord bestowed on me authority (ḥukm)" (Qur'ān 26:21) means the vicegerency (khilāfa), "and made me one of the messengers" (ibid.) means the mission (risāla), for not every messenger is a vicegerent. Because the vicegerent fights with the sword, dismisses and appoints (officials), whereas the messenger is different, for he must transmit the message with which he is sent. If he fights for the message and protects it with the sword, he is (then) both a vicegerent and a messenger. Thus, just as not every prophet is a messenger,³⁷ so not every messenger is a vicegerent; that is, (not every messenger) is given kingship and the ability to handle it.

As for the rationale of Pharaoh's question regarding the divine essence,³⁸ it did not arise from ignorance, but from seeking information (ikhtibār), so that he could consider Moses' answer in the light of the latter's claim for God's mission. Pharaoh knew the messengers' degree of knowledge and he sought to prove by Moses' answer the truth of his claim. Pharaoh asked a question to let those present know – without being aware of (the nature of his question), as he was aware of it – (that Moses was ignorant). When Moses answered him as a learned person answers, Pharaoh showed, because he wished to preserve his position, that Moses had not answered him properly, so that those present came to know, because of their weak understanding that Pharaoh knew more than Moses. For this reason, since Moses answered what he did not need to answer – and outwardly it was not the answer to the question he was asked, and Pharaoh knew that he (Moses) would answer as he did – Pharaoh said to Moses' companions: "Your messenger who was sent to you is mad" (Qur'ān 26:27); that is, the knowledge I asked him about is concealed from him, for it is absolutely inconceivable that he should know. The question was legitimate, for asking (208) what-a-thing-is (māhiyya) is a question about the essence of what is sought, which must characterize the thing itself and no other. As for those who made definitions composed of genus and differentia (jins wa-faṣl),³⁹ (this procedure) applies to all things that are characterized by equivocality (ishtirāk). However, (God) who has no genus must have a specific essence not shared by others. Thus, the question is legitimate according to the people of truth, correct knowledge, and sound intellect, and Moses' answer to it is the only correct answer.

³⁷ For a theological and philological discussion of this point, see al-Baghdādī, Uṣūl al-dīn, pp. 153f.

³⁸ "Pharaoh said: 'What is the Lord of all things?'" (rabb al-ʿālamīn). Qur'ān 26:23.

Here is a great mystery, for Moses actually answered one who had asked for an essential definition, and for this reason, he (Moses) made the essential definition his reference to the forms of the world through which God manifests Himself, or the forms of the world in which He is manifest. One can understand his answer to the question "What is the Lord of all things?" (rabb al-ʿālamīn) (Qur'ān 26:23), as if Moses said: "The one in which the high forms of the world are manifest, that is, the heaven, and the low (forms), that is, the earth, "if you know for certain" (ibid.), or He manifests Himself through them. When Pharaoh said to his companions "he is mad" (ibid., 27), as we said above, Moses added (a phrase) to his explanation, so that Pharaoh would know Moses' rank in divine knowledge, because Moses knew that Pharaoh would realize this. Thus, Moses said: "The Lord of the east and the west" (ibid., 28), conveying (the idea) of what is manifested and what is concealed,⁴⁰ that is, the outward (ẓāhir) and the inward (bāṭin), and "what is between them" (ibid.), and this is His saying, "(He) absolutely knows everything" (Qur'ān 29:62). "If you understand (taʿqilūn)" (Qur'ān 26:28), meaning if you are people who limit (aṣḥāb taqyīd), because the intellect (ʿaql) limits (yuqayyidu). Thus, the first answer (Qur'ān 26:24) is for the people who know for certain, that is, the people of unveiling (kashf) and finding (wujūd). He (Moses) said to him (Pharaoh): "If you know for certain" (ibid.), that is, (you) the people of unveiling and finding, for I have informed you of what you knew for certain in your witnessing and finding. If you do not belong to this kind, (that is), if you are people of limit, restriction, and restraint, I shall respond with the second answer. Also (you should know) that the Real (that you know) is according to the proofs of your intellect. Moses brought these two aspects to light so that Pharaoh would know Moses' excellence and truthfulness. Moses knew that Pharaoh had known this, (209) or would know this, because Pharaoh asked about the essence, and he knew that his question was not based on the way of the ancient sages to ask "what," hence Moses answered as he did. Had he known something different, he would have regarded the question as an error. Since Moses identified the entity about which Pharaoh asked with the world, Pharaoh addressed him as he did, while the people (who were present) did not realize it.

39 "For Aristotle, a definition is 'an account which signifies what it is to be for something' (logos ho to ti ên einai sêmainei). The phrase 'what it is to be' and its variants are crucial: giving a definition is saying, of some existent thing, what it is, not simply specifying the meaning of a word." Robin Smith, "Aristotle's Logic," Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, <http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/aristotle-logic/#Def>. Each definition is composed of genus and differentia. For example, the definition of the term "human being" is an animal (genus), whose differentia is having the ability to reason.

40 The east is the direction of sunrise, hence it is the manifest thing, and the west is the direction of sunset, hence it is the concealed thing.

Pharaoh said to Moses: "If you take a god other than me, I will place you among the prisoners (masjūnīn)" (Qur'ān 26:29). Now, the letter sīn in al-sijn (prison) is one of the redundant letters,⁴¹ (hence) the meaning is "I shall conceal you," for you answered me in a manner that helped me express such a saying. If you say to me: "O Pharaoh, by threatening me, you act unknowingly, because the Essence is one, and how can you separate it?" I (Pharaoh) will say: "The ranks in existence separate the Essence, while the Essence, in principle, is not separated nor divided." "My rank" (Pharaoh continues), "is in actuality to dominate you, while I and you (are the same) through the Essence, but different in rank (in concrete existence)." When Moses understood Pharaoh's statement, he referred to what Pharaoh deserved, saying to him that he could not carry out (his threat). However, Pharaoh's rank attested to his ability to do this and to affect (Moses' state), for concerning Pharaoh's rank, the Real is the outward form that can dominate the rank of the form of Moses' appearance in this session.

Moses said, showing Pharaoh what can prevent him from attacking Moses: "Even if I show you something manifest?" (ibid., 30), to which Pharaoh could only say to Moses: "Bring it then, if you are truthful" (ibid., 31). (Pharaoh said this) for fear of appearing unjust and consequently one to be doubted in the eyes of his people, who were weak-minded. Pharaoh made those people unsteady,⁴² and as a result they obeyed him "because they were wrongdoers" (Qur'ān 43:54); that is, through using their sane intellect, they did not deny Pharaoh's claim,⁴³ which was expressed in clear and intelligible language, (210) for the intellect cannot go beyond its limit. However, one who possesses unveiling and certainty can exceed this limit. For this reason, Moses answered in a way which could be accepted by both one who knows for certain and another who knows by using his intellect. "Then, he (Moses) cast his rod" (ibid., 32). This was the form of Pharaoh's transgression which was expressed in his refusal to respond to Moses' claim "and behold, it became a clearly seen snake" (ibid.), that is, a manifest snake. Thus, the disobedience, that is, the evil deed, became obedience, that is, good deed, as He said: "God will change their evil deeds into good deeds" (Qur'ān 25:70), that is, regarding his judgment.⁴⁴ Here the judgment appeared as a particular entity in one substance (jawhar), that is, the rod, which is (also) the snake and the manifest snake. As a snake, Moses' rod swallowed up the snakes, and as a rod, it swallowed up the rods. Thus, Moses' argument overcame Pharaoh's arguments in the form of rods, snakes, and ropes (ḥabl, pl. ḥibāl), and the magicians had ropes,⁴⁵ which Moses did not have. Al-ḥabl means (also) a small hill (tall ṣaghīr);⁴⁶ that is, their abilities in relation to Moses' abilities are like small hills to lofty mountains.

When the magicians saw that, they realized Moses' degree of knowledge and that what they saw could not derive from human capability. Even if it was in the power of a human being, it would only be one who is distinguished in his unquestionable knowledge and who is free of imagination and obscurity. Consequently, they believed in the Lord of all creatures, the Lord of Moses and Aaron, that is, the Lord Moses and Aaron called upon, because they understood that the people knew that Moses did not call upon Pharaoh. Since Pharaoh was the ruler of his time and the vicegerent wielding the sword, even if he deviated from the conventional laws, he said: "I am your loftiest Lord" (Qur'ān 79:24); that is, even if all are lords in some respect, I am higher than them, because, taking into account the external aspect, I was given dominion over you. Because the magicians realized truth in his words, they did not contradict him, and indeed agreed with him and said: "You can judge only the life of this world, (211) so judge as (you wish)" (Qur'ān 20:72),⁴⁷ for the state is yours. For this reason, his statement "I am your loftiest Lord" is true. Even though he was identified with the Real, the form was Pharaoh's. He cut off hands and feet and crucified (people)⁴⁸ through a true essence in false form in order to attain the ranks which are only attainable through such acts.

That is because in no way can causes be canceled, for the fixed entities (ʿāyān thābita) require them. The fixed entities appear in existence in the same form as their existence in their state of fixity, for God's words (kalimāt) cannot be changed (tabdīl).⁴⁹ God's words are nothing but the entities of the existents; because of their permanence one ascribes them to eternity, and because of their (concrete) existence and appearance one ascribes to them coming into being (ḥudūth). As you can say, a person or a guest appeared in our (house) today; however, it does not follow from his appearance that he had no existence before his appearance (hudūth). For this reason, that is, the appearance of His words notwithstanding their eternity, God said in His venerable speech: “(Whenever) a new (muḥdath) reminder comes to them from their Lord, they listen to it while they play” (Qur’ān 21:2). “(Whenever) a new reminder comes to them from the Merciful, they deviate from it” (Qur’ān 26:5). And the Merciful comes only with mercy, and whoever deviates from God’s Mercy may meet punishment, which derives from absence of mercy. As for His saying, “When they saw our injury (punishment), their belief would not benefit them, this was always God’s way of treating His servants” (Qur’ān 40:85), “except for the people of Jonah” (Qur’an 10:98). Because of the exception expressed in the second verse, the first verse does not prove that their belief will not benefit them in the next world. God wished to say that this exception does not absolve them of blame in this world, and for this reason Pharaoh was blamed, notwithstanding the existence of belief in him. This would have been correct, had he been certain of his death in this moment. The situation proves that he was not sure of his death, because he saw the believers walking on the dry land which became manifest, because Moses struck the sea with his rod. Because Pharaoh believed, he was not certain of his destruction, contrary (212) to the dying person, so that one cannot combine the two cases (of Pharaoh and the dying person).

Pharaoh believed in what the Children of Israel believed, that is, the indubitable belief in deliverance. Of that which did take place he was certain; however, not in the manner he wanted. God saved his soul from the punishment of the next world, and (also) saved his body, as He said: “Today we shall save only your corpse as a sign to all posterity” (Qur’ān 10:92, trans. AH), because had his form (corpse) disappeared, perhaps people would have said that he became hidden.⁵⁰ He appeared as a dead person, in the usual form, so that people would know that it was he. Thus, his deliverance combines both the tangible and spiritual aspects.

Whoever deserves the punishment of the Hereafter does not believe in it, even though every sign comes to him.⁵¹ “until they see the painful punishment” (Qur’ān 10:97), that is, until they taste the punishment of the next world. Pharaoh did not belong to this kind of people. This is the plain meaning (zāhir) the Qur’an conveys (to us). After that, we shall say further that God decides in this matter, because the common people had no doubt regarding his suffering (in the Hereafter); however, they had no text to support their claim in this issue. As for his family, their judgment is different, but here is not the place to discuss it.

Also, you should know that God does not cause persons who are dying to expire unless they believe and trust in the divine messages. For this reason, sudden death and killing an inadvertent person are detested. Sudden death is defined as (a state in which) the internal breath comes out, while the external breath does not enter. This is sudden death, which is not the state of the dying person. It is like killing a heedless person by striking his neck from behind, while he is unaware. Thus, such a person dies in a state of either belief or unbelief. For this reason, the Prophet said: “He will be gathered in the state in which he dies,”⁵² just as he will die in the state of (either belief or unbelief). However, the dying person is a witness (of God’s messages), hence he believes as we have said, and he dies only in-the-state-in-which-he-is (‘alā mā kāna ‘alayhi), for the verb kāna as a word designating existence entails time only when it is connected with circumstances. Hence, one should differentiate between the dying unbeliever and the unbeliever who is killed while being inadvertent or one who died suddenly, as we have said in the definition of sudden death.

⁵⁰ Very probably Ibn al-‘Arabī had in mind the Shi’ite concept of the occultation of the twelfth imam.

⁵¹ This phrase is based on Qur’ān 10:96.

As for the wisdom of God’s self-manifestation and (His) speech (213) in the form of fire, it (happened) because Moses willed it. God manifested Himself in keeping with Moses’ wish, so that he would accept the revelation and not deviate from it. Had He revealed Himself in a form different from Moses’ desire, he would have deviated from God, because his interest was concentrated on a specific demand. Had he deviated, his act would have been fruitless and God would have turned away from him. However, he was the chosen and the favorite person. Because of that, God manifested Himself to him in keeping with his request, while he was unaware of this.

He saw this as the core of his need, like the fire of Moses/while it was God, and he did not know.

⁵² I could not find the source of this tradition. See n. 16 above.

26 The bezel of the wisdom of recourse¹ exists in the essence of Khālid

(213) As for Khālid ibn Sinān's² wisdom, he manifested in his mission the prophecy of the Isthmus (al-nubuwwa al-barzakhīyya).³ He claimed he wanted to inform (the people) of what exists in the Isthmus (barzakh) only after (his) death. Hence, he commanded that his tomb be uncovered in order to ask him. He related that things in the Isthmus are managed as life is in this world. Through this one can know that all that which the messengers have related in the present world is true.

Khālid intended that all the people would believe in the messages of the messengers so that mercy would apply to all. He had the honor to be a prophet before Muḥammad, and therefore he knew that God sent Muḥammad as a mercy to all the creatures. Khālid himself was not a messenger, hence he wished to attain a good deal of the mercy which existed in Muḥammad's mission. Khālid was not ordered to inform people, but he desired to achieve this in the Isthmus, so that he would be the most knowledgeable person regarding mankind. (But) Khālid's people did not carry out his order.⁴ Muḥammad did not describe Khālid's people as getting lost (dā'a), but as a people who destroyed their prophet, because they did not fulfill his wish.

Did God give him a reward for his desire? There is no doubt and no controversy that Khālid deserved to be rewarded for his desire; however, there is doubt and controversy regarding the reward which is demanded; does the reward for a

² For this prophet, who lived one generation before Muḥammad, see ch. 2, Pellat, E I2.

⁴ According to al-Kāshānī (pp. 534f), Khālid saved his people from a fire that could have destroyed them. He went into a cave in order to extinguish the source of the fire. He asked his people on entering to call him after three days, so that he would not die after leaving the cave. But becoming impatient, they called him after two days, and this caused his death.

realized desire equal the reward for an unrealized (214) desire? In many instances the Law supports this equation. For example, one who comes to pray with a congregation, but the congregation does not attend, deserves a reward as if one attended the prayer. In like manner, one who wishes to do good deeds as rich people do, although one is poor, deserves their reward. However, does the equation apply to their intentions or to their acts, for the rich people combine intention and act? The Prophet did not determine either giving reward for both, or for one of the two. On the face of it (al-ẓāhir), intention and act are not equal. For this reason, Khālid ibn Sinān demanded (to carry out) the act of transmission of messages,⁵ so that the position of joining the two activities (intention and act) would prove true for him and he would achieve the two rewards. And God knows best.

⁵ As Muḥammad did.

27 The bezel of the wisdom of uniqueness¹ exists in the essence of Muḥammad

(214) His wisdom is unique, because he is the most perfect existent in mankind. For this reason, creation begins and ends with him.² He was a prophet when Ādam was between water and clay.³ Also in his essential structure he is the Seal of the Prophets (khātām al-nabiyyīn).

The first of the uneven numbers is three,⁴ and that which becomes greater than this first derives from it. He was the greatest proof of his Lord, for he was given all the words, that is, the things named by Ādam.⁵ In his triplicity, he resembled this proof, which was a proof of himself. Since his essence was in keeping with the first uneven number, because his structure was based on three parts, he said in the chapter of love, which is the root of existents: “Three things have been made beloved to me in your world.” (He said this) because of the triplicity in him, then he mentioned “women and perfume,” and “the delight he was given in the prayer.”⁶ First he mentioned women and then prayer, because, (215) in the root of the appearance of her entity, the woman is a part of the man.

The human being’s knowledge of himself (soul) precedes his knowledge of his Lord, because his knowledge of his Lord results from his knowledge of himself. For this reason, Muḥammad said: “Whoever knows himself (soul) knows his Lord.”⁷ If you wish, you may hold the impossibility of knowing (God) and the inability to reach this knowledge, and if you wish, you may hold the provability of this knowledge. According to the first (interpretation of the tradition) you cannot know yourself (soul), hence, you cannot know your Lord; and according 1 Muḥammad is unique because he was the first human being in which God’s Essence was reified and because all God’s self-manifestations exist in him. Chittick, “Chapter Headings,” p. 37; idem, “Summary,” p. 40.

2 No doubt Ibn al-‘Arabī here speaks of Muḥammad as possessing the walāya which, in our author’s view, will not end. Thus, Ibn al-‘Arabī contradicts himself. Affīfī (Vol. II, p. 322) tries to solve this self-contradiction by saying that Ibn al-‘Arabī intends to say that existence began with Muḥammad and the mission (risāla) ended with him.

3 Bukhārī, LXXVIII:119.

to the second, you can know yourself (soul), hence, you can know your Lord. Muḥammad was the clearest proof of his Lord, for every part of the cosmos is a proof of its root, which is God, so understand!

Women were made beloved to Muḥammad and he yearned for them, because this (behavior) pertains to the yearning of the whole for its part. Through this (behavior) Muḥammad made clear what God had ingrained in him, as God said regarding the essential human structure: "I breathed my spirit into him" (Qur'ān 15:29, trans. AH, and 38:72). Then God described Himself as most longing to meet humans and He said to those who longed for Him: "O Dāwūd, I am most longing for them,"⁸ meaning for those who long for Him. This is a unique meeting, for He said in the tradition concerning the Antichrist (al-Dajjāl): "None of you will see his Lord, until he dies."⁹ One necessarily longs for someone whose description is such. The Real longs for those who are near to Him, although He sees them; however, he wishes them to see Him, but their state precludes this (possibility). His statement resembles ("We shall test you) until We know" (Qur'ān 47:31), even though He knew (them).

He (God) longs for this unique trait (to meet humans), which takes place only after death, and through this trait He causes them to be cured of their longing for Him.¹⁰ As God said in the tradition of hesitation, which is relevant to this issue: "I do not hesitate in whatever I do as much as I hesitate in causing the death of my believing servant, who hates death as much as I hate to injure him; however, he necessarily will meet Me."¹¹ He informed him of good tidings, and did not say to him that death is necessary, so that He would not grieve him by mentioning of death. (216) Since humans do not meet the Real until after they die, as the Prophet said: "None of you will see his Lord, until he dies," God said: "He necessarily will meet Me." The Real's longing for the existence of this relationship (is expressed in the following poem):

The beloved yearns to see me/and I yearn for him very much

Souls are impassioned (but) the human rejects the decree (of death)/I complain, moaning, and so does He

Since the Real has made it clear that He breathed His spirit into humans, He longs only for Himself. Do you not see that the Real created him in His image,¹² because he stems from His spirit? Since his structure is composed of the four elements in his body, which are called the humors, there comes into being out of His breath a burning, despite the moisture in his body,¹³ and as a result of which, the spirit of the human being became fire, because of his structure. For this reason, God only spoke to Moses only in the form of fire and placed his need in it.¹⁴ Had his structure not been natural,¹⁵ his spirit would have been of light. He called this act blowing, alluding to its derivation from the Merciful's breath, because by this breath, which is blowing, his essence appears, and because of the predisposition of the one blown into, the burning is fire, not light. The breath of the Merciful, through which human is human, is hidden in (the part of his structure).

⁸ I do not know the source of this saying.

⁹ Muslim, LII:95 (169).

From Ādam, God produced a figure in his image and called it woman, who appeared in his image, so that he yearned for her as a thing yearns for itself, and she yearned for him as a thing yearns for its source. Thus, women were made beloved to man, because God loved whomever He created in His image. Then He caused the angels that were made of light to prostrate themselves before Ādam, notwithstanding their great value and position and their high natural structure.¹⁶ Because (God and humans share the same form), an affinity (munāsaba) binds them together, for form causes the greatest, the most exalted and perfect affinity.¹⁷ Form (causes the creation of) pair; that is, it doubles the existence of the Real, just as through her existence, the woman doubles the man, thus producing a pair. Thus, a triad appears, (that is), the Real, the man, and the woman.

The man yearns for His Lord, who is his source, just as the woman yearns for him. His Lord made women beloved (217) to man, just as God loves whomever is made in His image. One feels love only for the entity which is the source of one's being, that is, the Real.¹⁸ For this reason, he (the Prophet) said: "Women have been made beloved to me" (ḥubbiba), and not "I loved" from himself, because his love was connected to his Lord, in whose image he was created, even in his love for his wife, for he loved her through God's love for him, assimilating the divine love. Since a man loves a woman, he seeks union with her, which is the most profound union possible. And in the form of the elemental structure (of humans), there is no stronger union than sexual intercourse. For this reason, passion permeates all parts of the human. This permeation explains the command to perform major ablution, which encompasses all the human parts, just as a man is absorbed in a woman when passion takes place. (Another reason for major ablution) is God's jealousy of His servant lest he be delighted in other than Him, so He ¹³ Notwithstanding the word bi-mā (through which or by which), this is the only correct translation of the phrase bi-mā fī jasadihi min al-ruṭūba, because fire cannot derive from humidity or through it. Possibly something is incorrect in the text.

¹⁴ See ch. 25.

¹⁵ Read law-lā (Affīfī, I, p. 216, n. 4), which seems logical.

¹⁶ Qur'ān 2:34.

¹⁷ In al-Ghazālī, affinity is one of the causes of love between the Divine and the human being. Both thinkers use in this context the same terms and tradition. Abrahamov, Divine Love, pp. 56–58.

¹⁸ The notion that God is beloved because He gives humans existence occurs in the Futūḥāt as one of the causes of love. Very probably Ibn al-ʿArabī follows parts of al-Ghazālī's theory of love. Abrahamov, "Ibn al-ʿArabī on Divine Love," pp. 14f.

purifies him with major ablution in order to cause him to turn to God in the entity (woman) in which he is absorbed, for the woman reflects God.

When man witnesses the Real in a woman, it is a witness of passivity, and if he witnesses Him in himself, from the point of view of the appearance of the woman from him, it is a witness of activity.¹⁹ However, when he witnesses the Real in himself without considering the form that comes from Him, his witness is of God's passivity without any mediator (such as a divine name). His witness of the Real in the woman is the most complete and perfect, because he witnesses the Real with respect to His being both passive and active,²⁰ and with respect to Himself, He is uniquely passive.

For this reason, the Prophet loved women, because of the perfect witness of God in them, for the Real is never witnessed without materials,²¹ because in His Essence, He does not need the creatures. If witness of God's Essence is impossible, and witness of Him occurs only through material, then the witness of the Real in women is the greatest and the most perfect witness. The strongest union is sexual intercourse, which resembles God's turning to the one whom He created in His image in order to make him his vicegerent, so that He might see Himself (218) in him.

God made him, shaped his form, and blew His spirit into him, which is His breath, thus, externally his form attests to creation and internally to the truth (reality). For this reason, God describes the spirit as directing this (human) structure, because through it He "directs everything from the heaven" (Qur'ān 32:5), which is the height "to the earth" (ibid.), which is the lowest level, because it (the earth) is the lowest of all the elements.

He called them (the women) nisā', a plural form which has no singular form deriving from the plural. Because of this Muḥammad said: "Three things have been made beloved to me in your world, women . . ." He did not say "woman," taking into account the fact that they were brought into existence after Ādam, for the word *nus'a*²² means postponement, (as) God said: "The month postponed (al-nasī') is only an increase of unbelief" (Qur'ān 9:37). Selling by postponement (nasī') means delay of payment. For this reason, he mentioned "women." He loved them only because of their being the (lowest) degree and of their being a substrate of passivity. Muḥammad was related to women as the Real is to nature. The Real reveals in nature the forms of the world through His will, which turns to 19 According to Ibn al-ʿArabī's logic, one can also see in man the two aspects of passivity and activity. Because God created man, he symbolizes the active aspect, and because man is a servant, he represents passivity.

20 That is because from one point of view the woman is passive, as she was created from the man, but from another she is active, because God created her. Alternatively, in the course of sexual relations, man is considered active and woman passive.

21 One can learn of God only through His connections to the world, because in Himself He is ineffable.

22 Ibn al-ʿArabī derives the word nisā' (women) from the root n.s.ʿ; however, the origin of nisā' is n.s.w. As we know, such changes do not bother our author.

the things (al-tawajjuh al-irādī),²³ and divine command, which amounts to sexual intercourse in the world of the elemental forms, to aspiration (himma) in the world of the luminous spirits and to the arrangement of premises (muqaddimāt) in the world of ideas in order to arrive at conclusions.²⁴ Each of these aspects (is symbolized) by the first and singular sexual union.

Whoever loves women by this definition, (his) love is divine. And whoever loves them in particular because of natural desire lacks the knowledge of this desire. Thus, (his love) is form without spirit, and even though that form essentially possesses spirit, it is not attested (as existent) for one who approaches his wife, or any other woman, only for the sake of pleasure, while he himself does not know to whom he approaches.²⁵ Thus, he does not know from himself (to whom he approaches), just as another person does not know this, unless he names with his own tongue (his aim), so that one can know it. Someone said:

“People rightly said of me that I am a lover/however, they do not know whom I love.”

(219) Likewise, this person loved pleasure and loved the substrate in which it resides, that is, the woman; however, he missed the spirit of the issue. If he knew this, he would know the object of his delight and whoever delights in him, and (as a result) he would be the perfect individual.

Just as the rank of the woman is lower than the man’s, as God said, “The rank of men is higher than that of women” (Qur’ān 2:228), so the rank of the human who was created in God’s image is lower than that of He who produced him in His image, notwithstanding his being in His image. Because of His rank which distinguishes God from the human, He does not need the cosmos and He is the true Agent, while the human is a second-rank agent. The human does not have the priority of the Real. The (fixed) entities (ʿyān) are distinguished by a hierarchy, and God gives each that which it deserves and each gnostic his due.²⁶ For this reason, Muḥammad’s love for women derived from divine love, (because) God “gave everything its (form of) creation (khalqahu)” (Qur’ān 20:50), which is the same as what everything deserves (ḥaqq). God gave him only what he deserved in keeping with the essence to which he was entitled. The Prophet gave precedence to women (in this tradition), because they are the substrate of passivity, just as nature precedes that which derives its existence from it through a form. Actually, nature is the Breath of the Merciful, for the forms of the higher and lower world are revealed in nature, because the blowing (of God’s Breath) permeates the hylic substance (al-jawhar al-hayūlānī), particularly in the world of bodies. As for the permeation of God’s Breath through the existence of the luminous spirits, this is another kind of permeation.

Also, in this tradition, Muḥammad advanced the feminine form above the masculine one, because he was concerned for women’s well-being. Hence, he said ²³ The text has al-idārī, which is clearly a misprint.

²⁴ Cf. above, pp. 116f of the Arabic text.

²⁵ He does not know the real aim of his love.

²⁶ For this notion, see ch. 10 above.

thalāth (three in the feminine gender) and not thalātha in the masculine, although he mentioned perfume, which is masculine. The Arabs used the masculine gender over the feminine and said (for example), “the Fāṭimas and Zayd went out” (kharajū – third-person masculine plural) and not kharajna (third-person feminine plural). Thus, they made the masculine gender, though Zayd was only one person (Zayd), overcome the feminine, though the Fāṭimas were a group (Fāṭimas). Muḥammad was an Arab (and so he adopted the linguistic norms of the Arabs). However, he took into consideration (220) the notion of God’s intention to make women beloved to him, (although) he did not choose this love. God taught him what he did not know and bestowed on him abundant grace (faḍl aẓīm).²⁷ He made the feminine gender overcome the masculine by saying thalāth (three in feminine gender) without the addition of hā’ (which makes the word masculine).²⁸ How cognizant was the Messenger of the realities (ḥaqā’iq) and how great his attention to what each thing deserves.

Also, the Prophet placed the third and final beloved thing in the feminine gender (ṣalāt, prayer), just like the first beloved thing, and inserted between them a masculine word (ṭīb, perfume). He began with women and ended with prayer, both being feminine, while the word between them, perfume, is identical to man’s status in existence, for man is placed between God’s Essence (dhāt – feminine), from which he stemmed, and woman, who stemmed from him. Also, he is between two feminine forms, the dhāt whose gender is feminine in language and woman which is feminine in its real (natural) meaning. In like manner, women are in reality (nature) feminine, while prayer is not really a feminine entity (except in language). Perfume, masculine in gender, is inserted between them as Ādam was between God’s Essence, from which he was brought into existence, and Ḥawā’, whose existence stemmed from him. If you wish, you can say (regarding God) that both His attribute (sifa) (of creation) and (the attribute) of ability (qudra) (to create) are also feminine in gender. Whichever system of thought you wish (to follow), you will find the prevalence of the feminine gender even among the sages who adhered to the theory of causality (aṣḥāb al-‘illa) and made the Real the cause (‘illa) of the existence of the world. ‘Illa itself is feminine. The reason for placing perfume after women is because of the smells of generation in women, for the best perfume is embracing the beloved, as they said in the famous proverb.²⁹

Since Muḥammad was originally created as a servant, he never aspired to leadership, but was always prostrating and standing before God in a passive way, until God produced from him what He produced. He gave him the rank of action in the domain of breaths and good perfumes. Thus, He made perfume beloved to him, and for this reason placed perfume after women. He took into account the Real’s degrees in His saying: “He is Elevated in degrees, Possessor of the Throne” (Qur’ān

²⁷ That God possesses great or infinite grace is frequently mentioned in the Qur’ān, for example 2:105, 3:74, 174, 57:21, 29, 62:4.

²⁹ I have not found this proverb.

40:15), because He is established on the Throne through His name, the Merciful. Thus, Divine Mercy reaches everything encompassed by the Throne, as attested in His saying, “My Mercy encompasses everything” (Qur’ān 7:156). (221) The Throne embraces all things and the One established on it is the Merciful. Through His Reality Mercy permeates the world, as we have frequently explained in this book and in the Meccan Revelation (sic! Al-Futūḥ al-makkī).³⁰ God placed the perfume in the conjugal union referring to ‘Ā’isha’s innocence and said: “Corrupt women are for corrupt men, and corrupt men are for corrupt women; good women are for good men, and good men are for good women. The good are innocent of what has been said against them” (Qur’ān 24:26).³¹ God made their odors good (sweet-smelling), because speech derives from breath, which is the essence of the odor. Thus, breath proceeds from (the mouth) as good or bad (sweet or disgusting), according to the way it is expressed in speech. With respect to its being originally divine, breath is all sweet-smelling and good; however, with respect to praise and condemnation, it is good and evil. On the badness of garlic, Muḥammad said: “It is a bush whose odor I detest,”³² and he did not say, “I detest it,” because one does not detest the substance (‘ayn) of a thing, but rather that which stems from it. Abhorrence of odors is based on custom, natural antipathy (‘adam mulā’amat ṭab’),³³ an aim (to be achieved), law, and lack of the perfection of (the human body) which one seeks. There are no other causes of disgust but those we have mentioned.

Now, since the matter is divided into evil and good, as we have said, God caused Muḥammad to love good, not evil. He described the angels as those who suffer bad odors, because rottenness resides in the elemental structure (of humans), for the human is created of “dried clay formed from dark mud” (Qur’ān 15:26, AH); that is, his odors (always) change.³⁴ Thus, the angels are disgusted by humans, because of their nature. Similarly, the dung beetle is harmed by the odor of the rose. Whereas (for us) its smell is good, for the dung beetle it is not so. Whoever possesses such a temperament (characterized metaphorically by bad odor) in essence and form, when he hears the truth it hurts him, (however) he rejoices in falsehood, as God said: “Those who believe in falsehood and disbelieve in God” (Qur’ān 29:52). He described them through loss (khusrān) and said: “Those are losers” (khāsirūn, ibid.), those who “lost their souls” (themselves, Qur’ān 6:12 and passim), for whoever does not perceive the difference between good (222) and evil has no perception.

God made His Messenger love only the good in everything, and everything is good. Can one imagine or not that there exists in the world a temperament (of an entity) which finds only good and not evil in everything? We said that no such entity exists, for we do not find such a phenomenon (seeing only good) in the source from which the world stemmed, that is, the Real; we find Him abhorring and loving, and the evil is that which is abhorred and the good is that which is loved. The world was created in God's image, and the human was created in two images (the Real and the world), hence, no human temperament perceives only one of the two aspects (good and evil). Thus, any human temperament can perceive the difference between the good and the evil, and to know by experience that a thing is evil and without experience (that is, by reason) that it is good, so that his (rational) perception of the good in a thing diverts him from (seeing) its evilness. This is conceivable. However, the removal of evilness from the world, that is, from being, is inconceivable. God's Mercy applies to both the good and the evil. With respect to itself, the evil is good and vice versa. Regarding a certain human temperament, a good thing may be evil from a certain standpoint and vice versa.

As for the third (part of the tradition) through which unevenness (the odd number) was completed, it is prayer. He (Muḥammad) said: "I was given delight in prayer," for prayer bears witness, because it is a secret conversation between God and his servant, as God said: "If you remember Me, I will remember you" (Qur'ān 2:152). Prayer is worship which is divided between God and His servant; half belongs to God and half to His servant, as it is related in the sound tradition about God, who said: "I have divided the prayer into two parts; half belongs to Me and half to My servant, and My servant will receive what he asks for."³⁵ The servant says: "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful" (Qur'ān 1:1), and God says: "My servant remembers Me." The servant says: "Praise be to God, the Lord of the created beings" (ibid., 2). God says: "My servant praises Me." The servant says: "The Compassionate, the Merciful" (ibid., 3). God says: "My servant extols Me." The servant says: "The King on the Day of Judgment" (ibid., 4). God says: "My servant exalts Me (and) entrusts Me with (his affairs)." Thus, the whole of this half (of sūrat al-fātiḥa) belongs exclusively to God.³⁶

Then the servant says: "It is You we worship; it is you (223) we ask for help" (ibid., 5). God says: "This is between Me and My servant, and My servant will receive what he asks for." Thus, God produces participation (between Him and His servant) in this verse. The servant says: "Guide us to the straight way (ibid., 6), the way of those on whom You bestow favors, those who bring upon themselves no anger and who do not deviate from the right way" (ibid., 7). God says: "These (last three verses)³⁷ belong to My servant, and he will receive what he asks for." These (last three verses) are particularized to God's servant, just as the first (three verses) are particularized to Him. From this (division of the verses), we know the obligation to recite: "Praise be to God, the Lord of the creatures" (ibid., 1 or 2). Whoever does not recite it does not perform the prayer which is divided between God and His servant.

³⁷ The text has hā'ulā'i (sic!) instead of hādhihi.

Since prayer is a secret conversation, it is remembrance, and whoever remembers the Real sits with (jālasa) Him, and the Real sits with him, for in the divine tradition God truly said: “I am the companion (jalīs – I sit with) of him who remembers Me.”³⁸ Now, whoever has the ability to see and sits with the one whom he remembers sees his companion. This is witness and seeing. If he is incapable of seeing, he does not see his companion. As a result, one who prays knows his rank (in prayer), whether he sees the Real with this seeing or not. If he does not see Him, he should worship Him through belief as if he sees Him, imagines Him in his *qibla*³⁹ and performs his secret conversation with him, listening to God’s response.

If he is an imām (a prayer leader) for his own people and for the angels who pray with him – for everyone who prays is no doubt an imām – for the angels pray behind one who prays alone, as stated in a tradition,⁴⁰ he attains the level of the messengers in their prayer, that is, to be (one of) God’s vicegerents. When he says: “God hears the one who praises Him,” he is informing himself and those behind him that God has heard him, and then the angels and those who are present say: “Our Lord, praise belongs to You.” That is because God says through the tongue of His servant: “God hears the one who praises Him.”

Thus, consider the lofty rank of the prayer and the place to which it brings its performer. Whoever does not attain the degree of seeing in prayer will not reach its aim and will find no delight in it, for he does not see the One with whom he converses secretly. If he does not hear what the Real transmits to him in prayer, he does not belong to those who listen (to God). And whoever is not present in prayer with God, (224) neither hearing and nor seeing Him, is not praying at all and is not one of those who listen and witness. So long as prayer continues, there is no other kind of worship which can prevent one from carrying out other obligations.

The invocation of God is the strongest part in prayer, because prayer includes both words and acts – we have mentioned the description of the perfect human in performing the prayer in the Meccan Revelations (al-futūḥāt al-makkiyya) – for God says: “The prayer prevents from carrying out outrageous and evil deeds” (Qur’ān 29:45). This is because the Law forbids one who performs the prayer to engage in any other acts so long as the prayer lasts. “The remembrance of God is greater” (ibid.), that is, in prayer, viz., God’s remembrance of His servant when He responds to his request. The servant’s praise of God is greater than his remembrance of Him, because majesty belongs to God.⁴¹ For this reason, God said: “God knows what you do” (ibid.), and He said: “or whoever listens and is a witness” (Qur’ān 50:37). He listens to God’s remembrance of him in prayer.

Moreover, since existence derives from rational movement which transforms the cosmos from nonexistence into existence, prayer comprises the three kinds of movement: vertical movement, which corresponds to standing in prayer; horizontal movement, which corresponds to bowing in prayer; and downward movement, ³⁸ Muslim, XVIII:2.

³⁹ This is the direction to the Ka’ba in Mecca toward which the Muslim prays.

⁴⁰ Bukhārī, IX:16 (659).

⁴¹ Qur’ān 45:37.

which corresponds to prostration. The movement of the human is vertical, that of the animal is horizontal, and that of plants is downward, while the inanimate thing has no essential movement, for when a stone moves, another thing causes it to move.

As for his saying, “my delight was made to be in prayer,” he does not ascribe this making to himself, for God’s self-manifestation to the one who prays derives from God and not from the one who performs the prayer. That is because had he not mentioned this description of himself (as being delighted), God would have ordered him to pray without His being manifested to him. Since he received this delight as a favor, the vision of God was also a favor. He said: “my delight (qurraṭ ‘aynī) was made to be in prayer,” and (this delight) is only the vision of the beloved (225), through which the eye of the lover becomes settled (taqarru bihā ‘ayn al-muḥibb), from the word istiqrār (come to rest), for the eye comes to rest when it sees the beloved and does not look at some other thing, whether sensual or not.⁴² For this reason, when praying one is forbidden to turn around in prayer, because this turning around is something the Devil steals from the servant’s prayer, thus preventing him from seeing his beloved. Moreover, if (God) had been indeed the Beloved of the one who turns around, he would have turned in his prayer only toward the qibla. Every human knows himself, (that is), whether he is in this state or another in this specific worship, for “truly, man is a clear witness against himself, despite all the excuses he may put forward” (Qur’ān 75:14–15). One knows to distinguish between falsehood and truth in himself, because he knows his state, for it derives from his feeling (dhawq) of himself.

In addition, prayer has another part, for God commanded us to pray to Him and informed us that He prays for us. Thus, prayer is from us and from Him. If it is God who prays, He prays only through His name the Last (al-Ākhir), because He comes after the creation of the servant. It is the Real which the servant creates in his heart, whether through rational consideration or through following others (taqlīd). This is a god of belief (al-ilāh al-mu’taqad). This god takes different forms in keeping with the predisposition which resides in a certain substrate (that is, place, society, etc.), as al-Junayd, when asked about gnosis and the gnostic, said: “the color of the water is like the color of the vessel in which it resides.”⁴³ This is an answer which hits the target, speaking of the matter as it really is. Thus, this is God who prays for us. When we pray, we bear the name the Last, for in this station we, as we have mentioned, are in the position of those who have this name, thus, in His eyes we are in keeping with our position, and He looks at us only in the form which we have brought, because the one who prays falls behind the one who arrives first in the race.⁴⁴

God’s saying, “Each knows his prayer and exaltation” (Qur’ān 24:41) means his degree of being late in worshipping his Lord and his exaltation of God’s ⁴² Affifi, I, p. 225, n. 1.

⁴³ Abrahamov, Ibn al-‘Arabī and the Sufis, pp. 76f.

⁴⁴ Since prayer is also one of God’s self-manifestations, it is this self-manifestation which comes first from the divine perspective and the one who prays falls behind; that is, he performs what God has already established. One of the meanings of the verb ṣallā is “to be the second in the race.”

transcendence which derives from his predisposition. Everything without exception exalts the praise of its Lord, the most forbearing (226), the most forgiving.⁴⁵ For this reason, one cannot understand⁴⁶ in detail, one by one, the exaltation of the world. Another understanding of the verse “everything without exception exalts the praise of its Lord” (biḥamdihi, Qur’ān 17:44) is possible; the pronoun hi in biḥamdihi may refer to the praise spoken of each thing, just as we say concerning the human’s belief, one praises the god of his belief and connects himself to him. (In like manner), the act one performs returns to oneself, thus one praises only oneself, for whoever praises the act undoubtedly praises only the agent of the act, because the perfection or imperfection of the act returns to its agent. Similarly, the god of belief is the product (maṣnūʿ) of one’s thought; it is one’s production (ṣanʿ). One’s praise of that which one believes amounts to one’s praise of oneself. For this reason, one dispraises the beliefs of others, and if one were just, one would not be able to do this. However, this believer, who worships his specific object, is no doubt ignorant of this (the truth), because he opposes the beliefs of others in their gods. That is because had he known al-Junayd’s saying, “the color of the water is the color of its vessel,” he would have approved of the belief of everyone and known God in every form and every belief. Such a person supposes (ẓānn), but does not know (ʿālim). For this reason, God said (in a tradition): “I am as my servant supposes Me to be” (anā ʿinda ẓann ʿabdī bī);⁴⁷ that is, I manifest myself to him only in the form of his belief; if he wishes, he will make (my self-manifestation) unlimited, and if he wishes, he will make it limited, for the God of beliefs is limited, and (hence) He is the God whom His servant holds in his heart, because the unlimited God cannot be comprised by anything, for He is the essence of things and of Himself. One cannot say that either God comprises Himself, or not, so understand! “God speaks the truth and guides to the right way” (Qur’ān 33:4).

⁴⁵ This is a paraphrase of Qur’ān 17:44.

⁴⁶ lā yufqahu occurs on the basis of the preceding Qur’ānic verse, which reads “you do not understand their praise” (lā tafqahūna tasbiḥahum).

دراسة وتحقيق

الدكتور محمد سعود المعيني

بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم

والصلاة والسلام على سيد الأنبياء والمرسلين ، ومن
دعاً بدعوته الى يوم الدين .

أما بعد : فلاشك أن الشريعة الإسلامية عالجت كل
أمور الحياة ، ورسمت للبشرية طريقاً واضحاً ، وأحاطت
النظم بسور متين من الأخلاق والقيم ، يحفظ ديمومة سير
المجتمع ، ويصونه من التصدع والأنهيار ، فرسمت
الحدود الكاملة للنظرية الأخلاقية ، بوحى من النظرة
الشمولية ، التي تتناول الحقيقة الإلهية وصفاتها ،
والكون ، نشأته وحركته ، وما يجري له من تصريف
وتمسيق ، وردّها الى الحقيقة الأزلية الأولى ، الله الخالق
المبدع المكون القادر ، كما تتناول الإنسان ، نشأته
وموته وأعماله ، ثم ربطها جميعاً بمبدأ التوحيد ، فكل
ما عدا الله مخلوق وفق برنامج مرسوم ، ولأجل غاية
أسمى وأعظم .

وهذه النظرية لحقيقة الألوهية ، وحقيقة الكون ،
وحقيقة الحياة ، وحقيقة الإنسان ، تولد شعوراً وسلوكاً
في شأن الحياة والموت ، والسعي ، والصحة ، والمرض ،
والرزق ، وغير ذلك . كما تحل الألغاز التي شغلت عقل
الإنسان ، بما ينسجم وطبيعة العلاقة بين الخالق
والمخلوق ، مع توازن تام ، وتفاعل صحيح .

06 MAY 1991

فالإنسان يعمل للعالم بقدر ، ويعمل للآخرة بقدر ،
ويحدد علاقاته مع الآخرين بقدر ، كما يحدد علاقته مع
خالقه بقدر .

وينتج عن ذلك تهذيب الضمير ، واتزان السلوك ،
وتنظيم الحياة الإنسانية ككل . فيحس الفرد بتذوق
الحياة ، لأن قيمة الحياة الإنسانية ، ترتفع وتسمو كلما
أصبحت في فلك طاعة الله ومرضاته ، ولا عجب إذا برزت
مبادئ حب الخير والتسامح ونكران الذات .

ومن هنا تبرز القيمة الأخلاقية للفرد والمجتمع ، على
شكل مبادئ سامية ، تعصم الفرد من الضلال والتهيه ،
والأمة من التمزق والضياع .

فالفرد جزء من الجماعة ، والجماعة جزء من الحياة ،
والحياة جزء من الكون ، والكون مسخر للأحياء ، والكل
من خلق الله وفي طاعته .

وانطلاقاً من هذه الأهمية العظمى ، رأيت أن أقدم
هذا الكتاب في الأخلاق ، وآمل أن تجمع الأشباه والنظائر ،
وينتقى منها ما يعصم الأمة من الزيغ والزلل ، وبين أيدينا
ثروة هائلة ، يقف الإنسان أمامها باجلال وإكبار .

والذي دفعني لذلك ، ملاحظتي الميدانية لسلوك
شبابنا ، حيث بدأت تتأثر باتجاه الحضارة المادي ،
والتعامل مع الحياة بمقاييس مادية ، والأبتعاد عن القيم
الأخلاقية التي اتصفت بها أمتنا .

وبما أن الحياة المادية تسير بجناح واحد ، فهي
معرضة للتصدع والأنهيار . فالتعامل المادي البحت يجعل
من الإنسان ذنباً أنانياً لا تعرف خيره من شره ، وإذا
تحكمت مثل هذه العلاقات بين الأفراد والمجتمعات ، كانت
عرضة للتلاشي والضياع . وقد حدثنا التاريخ عن
أمم تلاشت بتلاشي قيمها ومآثرها .

وما دامت الأمم بأخلاقها وأعرافها ، تكتسب العراقة
والبقاء والشموخ أرى واجباً على المربين والمفكرين ، أن
يتحسسوا عظم المسؤولية قبل غيرهم ، وأن يقدموا ما
يضمن سلامة التفاعل مع الحياة وفق حسابات دقيقة ،
تجنب المسيرة مطبات الطريق ، وأحوال الكوارث .

وقد إخترت هذا الكتاب للامام الغزالي لمكانته وسعة
أفقه ، وسلامة معتقده ، وعذوبة أسلوبه ، فهو يسترسل
في حديثه الشيق ، يخاطب عقل الإنسان ومشاعره
وضميره ، ويجري منه مجرى الدم في العروق ، حيث غاص
في أعماق النفس ، وعالجها بعلاج كتاب الله وسنة
نبيه ، وخلاصة ما توصلت إليه عقول السلف الصالح ،
مبتعداً عن التعقيد والتنفير .

وقد حاولت جهدي خدمة النص ، والوقوف على
عبارة الغزالي نفسها ، لأن كتاب إحياء علوم الدين
مطبوع ، وقد قرأه الناس على مر العصور ، وربما وجد
البعض بعض الشيء ، فنسبه للمؤلف ، وهو تصنيف ،
أو سهو من الناسخ ، وغير ذلك . والذي يقرأ كتاب
الأخلاق عند الغزالي ، للدكتور زكي مبارك ص ١٠٤ -

١١٥ ، يجد العجب ، فقد نسب إليه الأخطاء اللغوية ، وعدم سلامة النص ، واضطراب التعبير ، حيث وجد العبارة مقطوعة ، أو سقطت منها بعض الكلمات ، وهذا يعود للنسخ ، لا للتأليف . وبعد تحقيق النص ، استقامت عبارته ، وتلاشت الأخطاء تماماً .

كما تعقبت الحديث النبوي الشريف ، الذي استشهد به مع بيان ما قيل فيه ، وما ورد من حديث ضعيف ، أو موضوع ، لا ذنب للمؤلف فيه ، حيث نقل عن السلف ، ما أورده في كتبهم ، ولما تكتمل دراسات الحديث بعد ، والذين تعقبوه وجدوا مصادرهم ميسرة ، واليوم نجد مصادرنا ، وللذين من بعدنا مصادرهم ، وهكذا سنة الحياة ، تفاعل دائم ، وإنتاج مستمر .

كما رأيت أن أضع ملخصاً متواضعاً في الفكر الأخلاقي عند الغزالي ، لعل القاري يسترشد بها ، أو تعينه على فهم نصوص الكتاب .

هذا وارجو أن أكون بجهدي المتواضع ، قد قدمت خدمة للتراث والجيل ، وارجو الله المزيد ، وما توفيقي الا بالله .

الباب الأول الفصل الأول ترجمة الإمام الغزالي

إسمه ومولده :

هو أبو حامد زين محمد بن محمد بن محمد بن أحمد الغزالي^(١) الطوسي^(٢) ولد بمدينة طوس من أعمال خراسان سنة ٤٥٠ هـ^(٣) ، من والد فقير صالح ، كان يعمل بغزل الصوف وبيعه في دكان بطوس .

صفة والده :

يحكى ' أن أباه كان فقيراً صالحاً ، لا يأكل إلا من كسب يده ، ويطوف على الفقهاء ويجالسهم ، ويخدمهم ما أمكنه ، وكان يستمع لأقوال علماء المتصوفة في حلقاتهم ، فيتأثر تأثراً كبيراً ، ويبكي ويتوسل الى الله تعالى ، أن يرزقه

(١) نسبة الى مهنة أبيه ، وهي غزل الصوف ، لذا تقرأ بتشديد الزاي ، ويرى أنه ولد في قرية الغزالية من قرى طوس ، وعلى هذا فالزاي تنطق غير مشددة ، وعلق ابن خلكان على رواية عدم التشديد بأنها خلاف المشهور ، ونسبها الى ابن السمعاني . والذي شاع هو تخفيف الزاي في لقيه . وفيات الأعيان ٨١/١ ، الوافي بالوفيات ٢٧٧/١ ، اللباب ١٧٠/٢ .

(٢) نسبة الى طوس ، ثاني مدينة في خراسان ، بعد نيسابور ، وكانت تتألف من بلدين يقال لأحدهما الطابران . وللأخرى : نوقان ، ولهما أكثر من ألف قرية ، وبطوس يوجد قبر الإمام علي بن موسى الرضا ، وقبر هارون الرشيد ، وفي سنة ٦١٧ هـ دمر المغول مدينة طوس ، فلم تنهض ، وقامت بجوانبها بعض المدن كالمشهد . معجم البلدان ٥٩٠/٣ ، الوفيات ٨١/١ .

ولداً صالحاً مثلهم ، ويجعله فقيهاً واعظاً^(١) .

أما أحمد ، فكان ذلك الصوفي الواعظ ، الذي تجمع الناس حوله ، وازدحموا .

ألا أن والدهما لبي' نداء ربه ، ولم يدرك ما وصل إليه ولده .

نشأته :

لما دنت ساعة وفاة والده ، أوصى به ، وبأخيه أحمد ، إلى صديق له من المتصوفة ، وزوده بما يدخره من مال ، لينفقه على 'تعليمهما ، ولم يكن هذا الصديق المتصوف ، مجرد وصي عليهما ، بل كان معلماً لهما أيضاً . فأول معلم للغزالي ، كان صوفياً .

ولكن المال الذي خلفه والدهما كان قليلاً ، سرعان ما نفذ ، إضافة إلى كون الصديق المتصوف من الفقراء ، فأشار عليهما بالألتحاق بمدرسة تنفق على طلابها ، فأنصرف محمد وأحمد إلى تحصيل العلم بكل جد ونشاط^(٢) .

(١) طبقات الشافعية للسبكي ١٠٢/٤ .

(٢) انظر شفاء الغليل ص ١٥ .

فكان هذا الرجل سبب سعادتهما وعلو درجتهما ، وكان الغزالي يحكي ذلك ، كما كان يقول : طلبنا العلم لغير الله ، فأبى أن يكون إلا لله^(١) .

تلقيه العلوم :

لقد كان تأثير الصوفي عليهما واضحاً ، حيث أنصرف أحمد إلى التصوف في ريعان شبابه ، فآثر الزهد والتقشف والخلوة والاعتكاف ، وقد دخل بغداد وعقد حلقة للوعظ في أحد مساجدها ، فتوافد عليه الطلبة من كل مكان ، وازدحموا حوله .

أما محمد فقد واصل دراسة الفقه في طوس ، ثم سافر إلى جرجان لتلقي العلوم ، وهو دون العشرين من عمره ، ثم رجع إلى طوس ، وفي الطريق داهمه بعض اللصوص ، وسرقوا منه بعض كتبه ، فعز عليه أن يتركها وينجو بنفسه ، فخاطر بحياته ، وتوسل اليهم أن يردوها إليه . ومنذ هذه الحادثة ، أصبح الغزالي يحفظ كل ما يقع تحت يديه من علوم ومعارف ، حتى لا يكون بحاجة إليها في حال فقده إياها^(٢) .

فدرس عليه الفقه واصوله والجدل والمنطق والفلسفة فتعمق في دراسة الفلسفة ، ولم يجد فيها ما يشفي الغليل ، فانتقدها ، واتجه للتصوف (١) ، حيث وجد فيه مرتعاً للنفس وطمأنينة للقلب ، وطريقاً توصل الإنسان الى أسامي الدرجات .

زيارته للوزير نظام الملك :

إقامته على التدريس :

أقام الغزالي على التدريس والوعظ ، فعلا جاحه ، واشتهر إسمه ، فضربت به الأمثال ، وشدت اليه الرحال ، لما عرف بشرف النفس والترفع عن الرذائل .

فانتفع بعلمه الكثير ، ومصنفاته ما تزال رافداً عذباً ، يرتوي منها عشاق الفضيلة .

(١) انظر دراسات في الفكر الفلسفي الاسلامي ص ١٣٣ .

وفي سنة ٤٨٨ هـ خرج من بغداد بناءً على نصيحة أطبائه ، حيث أصيب بداء الكنظ (١) ، فأشاروا عليه بالسفر والتجوال ، فاستجاب لطلبهم ، واستتاب أخاه في التدريس ، وخرج الى الشام والقدس والخليل ومكة والمدينة ، ولم يعمل في بغداد سوى أربع سنوات (٢) .

ثم عاد الى بغداد بعد أداء فريضة الحج ، وعقد بها مجلس الوعظ ، تكلم عن لسان أهل الحقيقة ، وحدث بكتاب إحياء علوم الدين .

ثم قصد نيسابور فدرس بنظاميتها ، ثم عاد الى بلده طوس ، فأقام فيها ، وابتنى ' رباطاً للصوفية ، واتخذ داراً حسنة ، وغرس فيها بستاناً ، وأقبل على تلاوة القرآن ، وحفظ صحيح الحديث ، والزهد والعبادة .

وفاته :

توفي رحمه الله بطوس سنة ٥٠٥ هـ . ودفن فيها (٣) .

الفصل الثاني

آثاره ومصنفاته :

بدأ الإمام الغزالي التأليف في فروع الفقه وأصوله ،
ومسائل الخلاف والجدل منذ صباه ، ثم شملت أكثر
فروع المعرفة ، التي كانت معروفة آنذاك .

ويتميز أسلوب الغزالي بالجزالة والوضوح والرقّة ،
مع إثارة الوجدان ، كما اشتهر بحسن التقسيم
والتبويب ، مما يجعل الأجزاء متناسقة مترابطة ، تُشكل
وحدة شاملة ، وقد يطغى أسلوبه الجدلي أحياناً ، حينما
يرد على بعض الأفكار .

١٢ - فضائل القرآن ، منه نسخة خطية في (دار الكتب المصرية) .

وهذا جزء مما كتب الغزالي ، حيث ذكر أن له (٢٢٨) كتاباً عدا المشكوك في نسبتها إليه ، ولعل القسم منها قد ضاع ، والقسم الآخر في مكاتب خاصة ، لم تظهر فهرستها لحد الآن (١) .

(١) انظر كتاب الغزالي ص ٢٨ - ٣٩ .

نسخ كتاب آداب الصحبة

- ١ - نسخة مكتبة الدراسات العليا بكلية الآداب - بغداد برقم ١٢٢٥ ، وهي نسخة قديمة من المئة السابعة للهجرة ، خطها جميل ، مذهبة ، مقروءة ومصححة ، عدد صفحاتها ١١٨ صفحة ، ولا تحمل اسماً للناسخ ، ولا تاريخ النسخ ، وقد رمزت لها بالحرف (ب) .
٢ - نسخة المكتبة المركزية بجامعة البصرة ، ضمن مجموع رقم ٣٣٤ ، وهي نسخة قديمة أيضاً ، ولا تحمل تاريخاً للنسخ ، ولا اسماً لناسخها ، خطها واضح يعود للمئة السادسة للهجرة تقريباً ، وقد رمزت لها بالحرف (ج) .
٣ - إحياء علوم الدين - الكتاب جزء من كتاب الأحياء ، يقع بين ص ١٥٧ و ٢٢١ ، وقد جعلتها هي الأصل ، لأن كتاب إحياء علوم الدين قد نال عناية في طبعه ، وقد أخذت طبعة دار المعرفة للطباعة والنشر ، لأنها تتضمن كتاب المغني عن حمل الأسفار ، للحافظ زين الدين العراقي .
وعلى الرغم من العناية في طباعة الكتاب ، فقد وجدت الكثير من الأخطاء والسقطات ، التي تؤثر على المعنى .

الفصل الثالث

عملي في التحقيق

حينما بدأت بتحقيق كتاب أدب الصحبة للغزالي ، وهو جزء من كتاب إحياء علوم الدين المطبوع ، كنت شاكاً في قيمة عملي العلمية والتراثية ، وبعد الانتهاء من تحقيقه ، خرجت جازماً بضرورة تحقيق الكتب المطبوعة لا سيما المصادر الرئيسية ، التي تُقرأ باطمئنان ويُنقل عنها بلا تحفظ . فقد وجدت من التصحيف ، وسقطات العبارات ، والخلاف بين مخطوطة وأخرى ، ما يتأثر به المعنى . وقد ينسب الى المؤلف ، خطأ ، أو عدم دقة فيما كتب .

وعلمي في تحقيق الكتاب كالاتي :

١ - قابلت النسخ الثلاث مع بعضها ، واخترت اللفظ

المناسب للمعنى ، والذي ظننت أنه نص المؤلف .
وأثبت الأخرى بالهامش ، إذ ربما لم أوفق في
إختياري ، ولباحث آخر أن يختار الذي يراه .

٢ - تفسير المفردات التي تحتاج الى تفسير لغوي ، أو
إصطلاحي ، مع التعليق على بعض فقرات الكتاب ،
إذا إقتضت الضرورة .

٣ - ترجمة الأعلام الواردة في الكتاب ، مع ذكر أرقام
الآيات القرآنية .

٤ - قسمت الموضوع الى عناوين وسطية ، محصورة بين
قوسين بلا أرقام ، لئلا يختلط بكلام المؤلف . وإذا
توقف فهم العبارة على كلمة ، أضفتها بين قوسين .

٥ - خرجت الأحاديث الواردة في الكتاب ، والمسندة اليه
صلى الله عليه وسلم ، وتعقبت ما قيل فيها من
صحة ، أو ضعف ، أو وضع ، وأكملت نص الحديث
في الهامش ، إذا توقف عليه فهم المعنى ، مع التنبيه
على إختلاف الألفاظ في الحديث ، بين المساند ،
ونص الكتاب .

وقد اكتفيت بذكر أرقام صفحات البخاري
ومسلم ، اذا كان الحديث متفقاً عليه ، أما التي لم
ترد في الصحيحين ، فقد تتبعته في المساند الأخرى ،
وذكرت ما قيل فيها من قبل علماء الحديث ، ليكون
القارئ على بينة من أمره ، وهو يقرأ نصاً
للغزالي .

ومن خلال دراستي للحديث الوارد في الكتاب ،
وجدت الكثير من الأحاديث الضعيفة ، والأحاديث
الموضوعة ، التي لا يُعتمد عليها .

ولعل الامام الغزالي ، نقل عن كتب السلف ،
فهو متبع وليس بمبتدع ، ولما تتكامل دراسات
الحديث ونقده في عصره ، فهو معذور فيما كتب
ونقل .

ولقد قام الامام الحافظ زين الدين العراقي
المتوفى سنة ٨٠٦هـ بتخريج أحاديث الاحياء ، وبين
الضعيف منها ، والذي لا أصل له ، كما تيسر له في
عصره ، وقد أضفت الى ذلك ما تيسر لي من
دراسات الحديث ، ليكون الجهد متكاملًا ، وقد
ابتغيت من وراء هذا العناء ، أن يكون هذا الكتاب ،
صالحاً معتمداً عليه ، في رسم نظرية متكاملة في
الأخلاق والسلوك ، من غير خوف أو وجل .

٦ - التنبيه على ما جاء في الكتاب ، وفق منظور
الصوفية ، والذي لم يطلب من عموم الناس ، ولا
يتوقف عليه صلاح الحال والعقيدة ، حيث المتصوفة
خاصة المجتمع ، ولهم طريقهم الخاص ، ولا يصح أن
يعمم هذا الطريق للناس كافة ، بل يجب الاقتصار
على حد أدنى يحقق صلاح المجتمع في الدين
والدنيا ، على إختلاف طبقاته وأصنافه وظروفه .

٧ - قمت بدراسة مناسبة للفكر الأخلاقي عند الغزالي ،
لتكون أساساً لما كتب في الأمور التفصيلية ، وقد
استخرجت رأي الغزالي من كتبه ذاتها ، وقد
وجدتها ضرورية ، لأن الغزالي قد بني الأخلاق على
أساس نظري وعملي ، كما إتصف بالواقعية
المفيدة ، فهو بحق جدير أن تنسب إليه نظرية أخلاقية .

الباب الثاني الفكر الأخلاقي عند الغزالي

الفصل الأول

المباحث التي تمس الفكر الأخلاقي

أسس السلوك :

كل عمل إرادي يسمى سلوكاً ، كالصدق ، والكذب ،
والكرم ، والبخل ، وغيرها من الأعمال .

ولسلوك الانسان ، أسس نفسية يصدر عنها ،
كالغريزة ، والسعادة . وتعرف هذه الأسس بمظاهرها .
فكل سلوك لا بد له من أساس يصدر عنه .

وأخلاق الانسان لا توجد بالصدفة ، ولكنها توجد ،
وتترقى ، وتصلح ، أو تنحط وتفسد ، وفق قوانين ثابتة ،
ومعرفة هذه القوانين تساعد على إصلاح الأخلاق ،
وتقويمها ، بقدر ما تسمح به الظروف البيئية
والحضارية .

إن الناس يميلون الى الشرف والرفعة والكمال ،
وسائر الفضائل دائماً ، ولكن هذا الميل يختلف قوة
وضعفاً ، بحسب طبيعة المجتمع وإعدادة وأنظمتة وزمنه .

والتربية الصحيحة ، هي التي تعزز هذا الميل
وتنميه ، وتصل بالانسان ، الى أقصى ما يمكن الوصول
إليه ، من السمو والكمال .

PRELUDE

Introduction

Alḥamdu lillāh. Indeed, all glory and praise is due to Allāh. We glorify and praise Him, and we ask Him for help and forgiveness. In Allāh we seek refuge from the evils of ourselves and from our wrong doings. He whom Allāh guides shall not be misguided, and he whom He misguides shall never be guided.

I bear witness that there is no true god except Allāh, alone without any partners, and I bear witness that Muḥammad (ﷺ) is His 'Abd¹ and Messenger.

﴿يَا أَيُّهَا الَّذِينَ آمَنُوا اتَّقُوا اللَّهَ حَقَّ تُقَاتِهِ وَلَا تَمُوتُنَّ إِلَّا وَأَنتُمْ

مُسْلِمُونَ﴾ آل عمران ١٠٢

«Believers! Fear and worship Allāh as He deserves, and do not die except as Muslims.»²

﴿يَا أَيُّهَا النَّاسُ اتَّقُوا رَبَّكُمُ الَّذِي خَلَقَكُمْ مِنْ نَفْسٍ وَاحِدَةٍ وَخَلَقَ مِنْهَا زَوْجَهَا وَبَثَّ مِنْهُمَا رِجَالًا كَثِيرًا وَنِسَاءً ۚ وَاتَّقُوا اللَّهَ الَّذِي تَسَاءَلُونَ بِهِ وَالْأَرْحَامَ ۚ إِنَّ اللَّهَ كَانَ عَلَيْكُمْ رَقِيبًا﴾ النساء ١

«People! Revere your Lord who has created you from one soul, and created from it its mate, and from these two spread forth multitudes of men and women; and fear Allāh through whom you demand [your mutual rights], and [revere the ties of] the wombs. Indeed, Allāh is ever-watchful over you.»³

1 'Abd: Devoted servant and worshipper.

2 Āl 'Imrān 3:102.

3 An-Nisā' 4:1.

«يَا أَيُّهَا الَّذِينَ ءَامَنُوا اتَّقُوا اللَّهَ وَقُولُوا قَوْلًا سَدِيدًا ۖ يُصْلَحْ
لَكُمْ أَعْمَالَكُمْ وَيَغْفِرْ لَكُمْ ذُنُوبَكُمْ ۗ وَمَنْ يُطِيعِ اللَّهَ وَرَسُولَهُ فَقَدْ
فَازَ فَوْزًا عَظِيمًا ۝» الأحزاب ٧٠-٧١

«Believers! Revere Allāh, and [always] speak the truth. He will then direct you to do righteous deeds and will forgive your sins. And whoever obeys Allāh and His Messenger has indeed achieved a great victory.» ¹

Verily, the best words are those of Allāh (ﷻ); the best guidance is that of Muḥammad (ﷺ); the worst matters [in creed or worship] are those innovated [by people], for every such innovated matter is a bid'ah ², and every bid'ah is an act of misguidance that deserves the Fire. ³

Our Da'wah and Objectives

Our goal in this and our other works is to propagate the True Da'wah ⁴ that derives from the Book of Allāh (ﷻ) and the Sunnah ⁵ of His Messenger (ﷺ). Propagating this Da'wah is a duty that every Muslim should cherish. Allāh (ﷻ) says:

«وَلْتَكُنْ مِنْكُمْ أُمَّةٌ يَدْعُونَ إِلَى الْخَيْرِ وَيَأْمُرُونَ بِالْمَعْرُوفِ وَيَنْهَوْنَ
عَنِ الْمُنْكَرِ ۗ وَأُولَٰئِكَ هُمُ الْمُفْلِحُونَ ۝» آل عمران ١٠٤

«Let there arise from you a group of people inviting

² Bid'ah: Innovation in the creed or in acts of worship.

³ These opening paragraphs are a translation of Khuṭbat ul-Ḥājah (the Sermon of Need) with which the Messenger (ﷺ) used to start his speeches and which he was keen to teach to his companions.

⁴ Da'wah: Call and mission.

⁵ Sunnah: Way, guidance, teachings, etc.

to all that is good (Islām), enjoining what is right (according to Islām), and forbidding what is wrong (according to Islām). These are the ones who will achieve success.»¹

This Da'wah may be summarized in two words: taṣfiyah (cleansing and purification) and tarbiyah (cultivation and education). Allāh (ﷻ) refers to this in the following:

﴿هُوَ الَّذِي بَعَثَ فِي الْأُمِّيِّينَ رَسُولًا مِنْهُمْ يَتْلُوا عَلَيْهِمْ آيَاتِهِ وَيُزَكِّيهِمْ وَيُعَلِّمُهُمُ الْكِتَابَ وَالْحِكْمَةَ وَإِنْ كَانُوا مِنْ قَبْلُ لَفِي ضَلَالٍ مُبِينٍ﴾ الجمعة ٢

«He it is who has sent unto the unlettered people a Messenger from among themselves to convey unto them His messages, to purify them, and to teach them the Book and the Wisdom - whereas before that they had been, most obviously, in clear misguidance.»²

Propagating the True Da'wah must then be pursued through purifying Islām from unfounded beliefs and practices, and working patiently to assist the Muslims abide by the true and purified religion. This must be done at various levels as follows:

1. We must uphold the sublime Qur'ān and the Prophet's authentic Sunnah, and comprehend them in accordance with the understanding and practice of the righteous *Salaf*³. This is Allāh's (ﷻ) command, as in the following:

﴿وَمَنْ يُشَاقِقِ الرَّسُولَ مِنْ بَعْدِ مَا تَبَيَّنَ لَهُ الْهُدَىٰ وَيَتَّبِعْ

³ The ṣaḥābah (the Prophet's companions; singular ṣaḥābī) and their true followers.

غَيْرَ سَبِيلِ الْمُؤْمِنِينَ نُوَلِّهِ مَا تَوَلَّىٰ وَنُصْلِهِ جَهَنَّمَ ۖ وَسَاءَتْ

مَصِيرًا ﴿النساء ١١٥﴾

«If anyone contends with the Messenger after the Guidance has been plainly conveyed to him, and follows a path other than that of the believers, We shall leave him in the path he has chosen, and land him in Hell: What an evil abode!»¹

And He (ﷺ) says:

﴿فَإِنْ آمَنُوا بِمِثْلِ مَا آمَنْتُمْ بِهِ فَقَدْ أَهْتَدُوا﴾ البقرة ١٣٧

«So if they believe as you believe², they are indeed on the right path.»³

2. We must enlighten and educate the Muslims, urging them to comply with the true *Dīn*⁴, act according to its teachings, and adorn themselves with its virtues and ethics. This will ensure Allāh's acceptance, through which they will realize happiness and glory, as indicated in the following:

﴿وَالْعَصْرِ ۖ إِنَّ الْإِنْسَانَ لَفِي خُسْرٍ ۖ إِلَّا الَّذِينَ ءَامَنُوا وَعَمِلُوا

الصَّالِحَاتِ وَتَوَاصَوْا بِالْحَقِّ وَتَوَاصَوْا بِالصَّبْرِ﴾ العصر ١-٣

«By the passing time, man is indeed in loss, except those who believe, do good deeds, enjoin upon one another the keeping to truth, and enjoin upon one another patience in adversity.»⁵

1 An-Nisā 4:115.

2 The address here is to the companions of the Messenger (ﷺ).

3 Al-Baqarah 2:137.

4 Dīn : Religion.

5 Al-'Aṣr 103:1-3.

3. We must caution the Muslims and exhort them to absolve their lives of any thoughts alien to the pure and essential tenets of Islām, such as shirk (polytheism), bid'ahs, or philosophy. This is a duty that Allāh (ﷻ) enjoins on us by saying:

«وَتَعَاوَنُوا عَلَى الْبِرِّ وَالتَّقْوَىٰ وَلَا تَعَاوَنُوا عَلَى الْإِثْمِ وَالْعُدْوَانِ»

المائدة ٢

«Help one another in righteousness and piety; and do not help one another in sinning and transgression.»¹

4. We must help cleanse the Sunnah of weak and fabricated narrations. The weak reports and unfounded beliefs have marred the clarity of Islām, preventing the Muslims' advancement. This duty is of such absolute vitality that the Messenger (ﷺ) praised those who perform it by saying:

«This knowledge will be carried by the trustworthy ones of every generation - they will expel from it the alterations made by those going beyond bounds, the false claims of the liars, and the false interpretations of the ignorant.»²

5. Guided by the *Islām*ic principles³, we must strive to revive the unobstructed *Islām*ic thought, and oppose stubborn adherence to *mathhabs*⁴ and prejudiced loyalty to parties. Neglecting this in the past has caused rust to dwell on the hearts and minds of Muslims,

³ These principles are described in point "1" above.

⁴ Mathhab: Way or approach. It mostly refers to one of the four *Islām*ic schools of legislation and jurisprudence that were based on the research and understanding of the Four Imāms (scholars): Abū Ḥanīfah an-Nu'mān Bin Thābit, Mālik Bin Anas, Aḥmad Bin Ḥanbal, and Muhammad Bin Idrīs ash-Shāfi' - May Allāh (ﷻ) bestow His mercy on them all.

diverting them from the pure original sources of Islām, and causing them to deviate from the honest Islāmic brotherhood called to by Allāh (ﷻ):

﴿وَأَعْتَصِمُوا بِحَبْلِ اللَّهِ جَمِيعًا وَلَا تَفَرَّقُوا﴾ آل عمران ١٠٣

«And hold fast all together, by the rope of Allāh, and be not divided among yourselves.»¹

And by His Messenger (ﷺ):

«Be, worshippers of Allāh, one brethren.»²

6. We must help provide realistic Islāmic solutions to contemporary problems, and strive to resume a true Islāmic way of life and establish a true Islāmic society governed by Allāh's law. Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿وَأَنْ أَحْكَمَ بَيْنَهُمْ بِمَا أَنْزَلَ اللَّهُ وَلَا تَتَّبِعْ أَهْوَاءَهُمْ﴾ المائدة ٤٩

«Hence, judge between them in accordance with what Allāh has revealed, and do not follow their errant views.»³

We call upon all the Muslims to support us in carrying out this noble trust. This will surely elevate and honor them and spread the eternal message of Islām all over the earth, as is Allāh's true promise:

﴿هُوَ الَّذِي أَرْسَلَ رَسُولَهُ بِالْهُدَىٰ وَدِينِ الْحَقِّ لِيُظْهِرَهُ عَلَى الدِّينِ كُلِّهِ وَلَوْ كَرِهَ الْمُشْرِكُونَ﴾ الص ٩

«He it is who has sent His Messenger with Guidance and the Religion of Truth, in order to make it

3 Al-Mā'idah 5:49.

prevail over all [false] religion, however hateful this may be to the mushriks (those who ascribe divinity to other than Allāh).»¹

General Approach in This Work

A large number of Islāmic writings in recent times lack the correctness and preciseness that are expected in a true Islāmic approach. They suffer from two major problems:

1. Unconcern about the importance of relying only on authentic evidence, particularly in quoting *ḥadīths*². Thus some conclusions that they reach, and some principles that they establish are, in the least, of doubtful validity.
2. Replacing the glorious thought and sound understanding of the early righteous pioneers and scholars of Islām (the Salaf ﷺ) with inferior opinions and speculations of later scholars.

These problems have led to the following serious consequences:

- ▶ A deformation in some of the fundamental beliefs for the majority of Muslims, including many who are regarded as scholars.
- ▶ Practicing Islām in a way that conflicts with the teachings of the Prophet Muḥammad (ﷺ).

Through the ages, only few true scholars ('ulamā') have directed their efforts to correcting these problems through reviving the authentic Sunnah and fighting bid'ahs. Their efforts have always been greatly countered and fiercely rejected by their contemporaries. But there is no way to stop the truth from spreading, and Allāh's Light will surely be complete and prevalent. These 'ulamā' (may Allāh bless them and reward their efforts) have produced marvelous writings that have rectified the Islāmic beliefs and practices.

² Ḥadīth: Reports of the Prophet's sayings, actions, and approvals. Our convention is to use ḥadīth (plural ḥadīths) with lower case ḥ to indicate single report(s), and Ḥadīth with upper case Ḥ to indicate the subject of Ḥadīth specialty.

Very little of these great writings have been translated to English, or have been resorted to in English writings on Islām. Thus a good deal of the existing Islāmic literature in English suffers from the two problems cited earlier. It also suffers from additional problems, mainly:

3. Many writers have had a shallow Islāmic education. They had to self-educate themselves to meet the requirements of da'wah in the West. But their education has not been, in general, adequate enough to qualify them to write on Islām.
4. Some non-Muslim scholars and orientalists have volunteered to write on Islām. Despite their wide academic knowledge, their writings on Islām are usually charged with obvious fallacies and prejudiced misinformation.

These problems have caused a further deviation from the truth in many of today's English writings and talks on Islām.

This publication is, therefore, a humble response to our realization of a great responsibility: the responsibility to help bring forth, before the general English speaking public, writings that refine the Islāmic concepts from the above problems and present Islām pure and simple, as close as possible to the way that it was understood and practiced by its early good pioneers - the Salaf.

Translating and Transliterating Arabic

Attempt has been made to minimize the use of Arabic terms. This is a frequently neglected service to the English speaking reader. Transliterated Arabic terms are used in the following two situations only:

- a) When no English expression is found that can reflect the same meaning as the original term.
- b) When it is judged that an Arabic term is of such importance that it is essential to familiarize the readers with it.

In such cases, the Arabic terms are defined at their first occurrence, between brackets or in a footnote. They are then include in the INDEX OF ARABIC TERMS, usually appearing at the end of the book.

Except for proper nouns, transliterated Arabic terms are italicized. In general, the rules of English pronunciation can be applied. The following table includes additional symbols employed in this book to help pronounce the Arabic terms.

Symbol	Stands for	English Equivalent Sounds
ā, Ā	Alif (long vowel a)	Mostly: Ma n, sa d. At times: Fa th er, ha rd , go d .
ū, Ū	Wāw (long vowel u)	Ro ot, so up, fl u te.
ī, Ī	Yā' (long vowel i)	Se ed, lea n, pie ce, rece i ve.
'	Hamzah	The first consonant vocal sound uttered when saying: a t, i t or o h.
Th, th	Thā'	Th ree, mo th .
H, h	Hā'	No equivalent. Produced in the lower throat, below "h". Resembles the sound produced after swallowing.
Kh, kh	Khā'	No equivalent. Produced in the back of the mouth and top of the throat.
Th , th	Thāl	Th ere, mo th er.

Symbol	Stands for	English Equivalent Sounds
Ṣ, ṣ	Ṣād	A deeper “s” sound. Somewhat close to the “sc” in “mus sc le”.
Ḍ, ḍ	Ḍād	Sounds deeper than a “d”. Produced by touching the tongue to the mouth’s roof.
Ṭ, ṭ	Ṭah	Similar but deeper than a “t”.
Ẓ, ẓ	Ẓah	A deeper thāl , produced by touching the tip of the tongue to the back of the front teeth.
‘	Āyn	Produced in the bottom of the throat, underneath “ḥ”.
Gh, gh	Ghayn	A gurgling sound produced in the back of the mouth, just above the khā’ . Similar to the “R” in some french accents.
Q, q	Qāf	Somewhat similar to the “c” in “c o ffee”.

Translating and Referencing Qur’ān and Ḥadīth

The Qur’ān contains Allāh’s exact words. These words cannot be exactly translated into other languages because of possible misinterpretations and limited human understanding. It is best to translate the meanings as understood by the Muslim scholars. This is what is attempted here. When an *āyah*¹ is cited, the Arabic text is quoted first, followed, between double angle quotation marks (⟨⟩), by the English meaning in boldface. The meaning is extracted from books of tafsīr (Qur'ānic commentaries and interpretations) and from accessible translations.

1 Āyah: A Qur’ānic phrase approximately equal to one sentence, but sometimes longer or shorter than that. Its plural is āyāt.

The location of a Qur'ānic citation is specified in a footnote. It provides the name of the sūrah (Qur'ānic chapter) followed by its number and the number(s) of the āyah(s) cited.

In general, the Arabic text of a cited ḥadīth is not provided. This is based on a general agreement among the 'ulamā' permitting relating ḥadīths by meaning. The meaning of a ḥadīth is included, in boldface, between single angle quotation marks (↯).

A footnote normally specifies the location of a cited ḥadīth in the Ḥadīth compilations. The footnote indicates as well its degree of authenticity and the names of scholars who made such judgement. If a ḥadīth is narrated by al-Bukhārī or Muslim, its authenticity is taken for granted.

Notable Utterances

Out of love, appreciation, gratitude or other noble feelings, a Muslim is encouraged to utter certain phrases at the mention of Allāh, His messengers, the angels, the ṣaḥābah, or other righteous Muslims. We present these phrases in condensed Arabic calligraphy as follows:

Phrase	Mentioned with	Transliteration	Meaning
	Allāh's Name	Subhānahū wa ta'ālā.	He is exalted above weakness and indignity.
	Allāh's Name	'Azza wa-jall.	May He be hollowed and glorified.
	Allāh's Name	Jalla jalāluh.	May His glory be hollowed.

Phrase	Mentioned with	Transliteration	Meaning
	Muḥammad and other prophets	Ṣalla 'Llāhu 'alayhi wa sallam ¹ .	May Allāh's peace and praise be on him.
	Prophets and angels	' Alayh is-Salām .	Peace be on him.
	A male companion	Raḍiya 'Llāhu 'anhu .	May Allāh be pleased with him.
	A female companion	Raḍiya 'Llāhu 'anhā .	May Allāh be pleased with her.
	Two companion	Raḍiya 'Llāhu 'anhumā .	May Allāh be pleased with them.
	More than two companions	Raḍiya 'Llāhu 'anhum .	May Allāh be pleased with them.
	A past scholar or righteous Muslim.	Raḥimahu 'Llāh .	May Allāh have mercy on him.

When coming across any of these symbols, the reader is advised to utter the complete phrase in order to obtain the reward of saying the appropriate thikr (remembrance) or du'ā (invocation).

1 Uttering this is sometimes described as, “saying ṣalāh upon the Messenger”.

PREFACE

Al-Barzakh

Death is the ultimate reality that no human being can escape. It forces everyone to realize the worthlessness of this worldly life and the necessity to prepare for the permanent abode in the next one. It awes people and challenges all of their false claims and deviant beliefs. It puts an end to their hopes for prosperity in this life. It transfers them to an intermediate stage of living totally different from the life in this world. Once there, they have no way of returning to this life. Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿حَتَّىٰ إِذَا جَاءَ أَحَدَهُمُ الْمَوْتُ قَالَ رَبِّ ارْجِعُونِ ۚ لَعَلِّي
أَعْمَلُ صَالِحًا فِيمَا تَرَكْتُ كَلَّا إِنَّهَا كَلِمَةٌ هُوَ قَائِلُهَا وَمِن
وَرَاءِهَا بَرْزَخٌ إِلَىٰ يَوْمٍ يُبْعَثُونَ ۚ﴾ المؤمنون ٩٩-١٠٠

«Until, when death comes to one of them (those who join partners with Allāh), he says, “My Lord! Send me back. Perhaps I may do good in that which I have left behind!” No! It is but a word that he speaks, and behind them is a barzakh (barrier) until the day when they are raised up.»¹

This Book

The purpose of this book is to cover the details of this intermediate life in al-Barzakh. The discussion is only based on authentic texts from Allāh’s Book and His Messenger’s Sunnah. It totally avoids unfounded presumptions and speculations that people have accumulated in various cultures and societies.

1 Al-Mu’minūn 23:99-100.

In addition to the subjects usually discussed when dealing with the study of al-Barzakh, we include in this book material covering subjects that, we believe, are highly relevant. Among these is “Communication with Al-barzakh (Chapter 10)” and “Things That Benefit the Dead (Chapter 11)”. Other material, which is believed to be relevant but not to the same high degree, is included in the other parts of this series (The Inevitable Journey).

Whereas we make no claim to encompassing all authentic texts related to this subject, we have made a serious attempt to cover all authentic incidents and help form as complete a picture of that stage of life as possible.

Our hope is to provide with this an important reference that will help people gain a clear understanding of that inevitable stage of life and, therefore, help them prepare themselves for it.

We have attempted to present the material in a highly structured and organized manner, introducing tables as much as possible, in order to enable using the book as a classroom or study-circle reference.

References

The idea of this book started with a rough translation of the booklet “Al-Qabr, ‘Athābuhū wa-Nā’imuh (The Grave, Its Tortures and Pleasures)” by Ḥusayn al-‘Awāyshah. However, that book was found to lack in providing sufficient commentary on the cited texts. Its titles were found to be unstructured, presenting the material in a somewhat unorganized and detached manner.

When it was found that, in addition to the above, it was not possible to reach an acceptable agreement with the Arabic publisher of that booklet, it was decided to give up that book and rewrite a more complete manual on the subject of al-Barzakh. The fruit of that is in your hands.

In addition to the above-mentioned reference, we have used a number of other references, many of which are cited in the back of the book. The most important of those are “Aḥkām ul-Janā’izi wa-Bida’uhā (The Regulations of Funerals, and Innovations Thereof)” and “Al-Āyāt ul-Bayyināt, Fī ‘Adami Samā’ il-Amwāt (The Clear Signs Concerning the Inability of the Dead to Hear)”, both by Muḥammad Nāṣir ud-Dīn il-Albānī.

Acknowledgements

All praise and thanks are offered to our Lord (ﷻ) who facilitated completing this work. May He further reward all the Muslims who helped and supported this effort in various ways. In particular, may Allāh (ﷻ) reward ‘Imrān Ḥusayn (from Guyana) for initiating the work on the subject of this book. May Allāh (ﷻ) also reward ‘Abdullāh al-Jibālī who typed all of the Arabic text and designed the cover.

We ask Allāh (ﷻ) to make this humble effort helpful and fruitful to the Muslims, forgive our shortcomings, purify our work from hypocrisy and conceit, and accept it from us.

Our Lord, forgive us and all of the believers, and bestow Your peace and praise upon our Prophet Muḥammad (ﷺ).

CHAPTER 1

THE APPROACH OF DEATH

Loving to Meet Allāh

A true believer's greatest wish and ultimate hope is to meet his Lord (ﷻ) and be able to see Him in the hereafter. 'Ubādah Bin aṣ-Ṣamit (رضي الله عنه) reported that the Prophet (ﷺ) said:

﴿Whoever loves to meet Allāh, Allāh loves to meet him; and whoever hates to meet Allāh, Allāh hates to meet him.﴾

On hearing this, 'Ā'ishah (رضي الله عنها) exclaimed, "But we do hate death!" The Prophet (ﷺ) responded:

﴿This is not what it means! When death comes to a believer, he is given the tidings of Allāh's acceptance and bounties. Nothing is then dearer to him than what is ahead: he loves to meet Allāh; and Allāh loves to meet him. But when death comes to a disbeliever, he is given the tidings of Allāh's torture and punishment. Nothing is then more hateful to him than what is ahead: he hates to meet Allāh; and Allāh hates to meet him.﴾¹

Similar to this is Abū Hurayrah's ḥadīth (presented in full in Chapter 2) that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

﴿Verily, when death descends upon a believer, and he witnesses things (implying his forthcoming rewards),

1 Al-Bukhārī and Muslim.

he wishes that his soul would depart (quickly), and Allāh loves to meet him ...

And when death descends upon an enemy of Allāh, and he witnesses things (implying his imminent punishment), he wishes that his soul would never depart, and Allāh hates to meet him.> ¹

Allāh Hesitates to Take a Believer's Soul

Allāh (ﷻ) loves the believers in proportion to their obedience to Him and His Messenger (ﷺ). When Allāh loves a person, he becomes so supportive to him and so protective that He would prevent any harm from reaching him, and He would even hesitate to inflict death on him – except that it is an avoidable thing that He (ﷻ) had decreed for all human beings. Abū Hurayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said that Allāh (ﷻ) said:

«Whoever harms a walī ² of Mine, I declare war against him.

My 'abd' ³ does not draw closer to Me with anything dearer to Me than the religious duties I have mandated upon him.

And My 'abd' continues to draw closer to Me with voluntary acts (of worship) until I love him; when I love him, I become his ears with which he hears, his eyes with which he sees, his hand with which he strikes and his foot with which he walks. Would he then ask me for anything, I surely grant it to him; and would he seek refuge in Me, I surely shelter him.

1 Recorded by al-Bazzār; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥah no. 2628).

2 Walī: Ally.

3 'Abd': A slave or worshipper.

I do not hesitate in anything I have to do as I hesitate in taking the life of my believing 'abd: he hates death and I hate to hurt him.> ¹

Satan's Presence at the Time of Death

Shayṭān ² works hard to entice people to commit evil actions. He is intent to be present when a person does any action that he may be able to influence by introducing into it any possible amount of sinning. The moment of death is a final chance that Shayṭān wants to try, hoping to make the dying person end his life with evil, impiety, or disobedience. Jābir Bin 'Abdillāh (ؓ) reported that the Prophet (ﷺ) said:

«Verily the Shayṭān attends with you in all your actions. He attends when you eat; if any morsel of food drops, wipe the dirt off it, and eat it instead of leaving it for the Shayṭān. After finishing, lick your fingers, because you do not know where in the food the blessing lies.> ³

The Disbeliever's Wish to Return to Life

As indicated in the ḥadīths of 'Ubādah and Abū Hurayrah (ؓ) (p. 1 above), when the reality of death comes to a believer, he welcomes it and longs to meet his Lord (ﷻ). A disbeliever, on the other hand, fears such a meeting and hates it. Allāh (ﷻ) says:

«حَتَّىٰ إِذَا جَاءَ أَحَدَهُمُ الْمَوْتُ قَالَ رَبِّ ارْجِعُونِ ۚ لَعَلِّي أَعْمَلُ صَالِحًا فِيمَا تَرَكْتُ كَلَّا إِنَّهَا كَلِمَةٌ هُوَ قَائِلُهَا وَمِنْ

³ Muslim.

وَرَأَيْهِمْ بَرَزَ إِلَى يَوْمٍ يُبْعَثُونَ ﴿١٠٠﴾ الْمُؤْمِنُونَ ٩٩-١٠٠

Agonies of Death

Death arrives with pains and agonies of which no human being is spared – not even the prophets. ‘Ā’ishah (رضي الله عنها) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Lā ilāha illallāh»². Verily death comes with agonies.»³

Too Late for the Disbelievers to Declare Faith

A disbeliever’s declaration of faith at the time of Death will be rejected. Ibn ‘Abbās (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«When Allāh (ﷻ) drowned Pharaoh, he said, “(Now) I believe that there is no (true) god except Him in Whom the children of Israel believe.” Jibrīl said, “O Muḥammad, would you have seen me as I took black dirt from the sea and stuffed it into his mouth, fearing that the Mercy might reach him.”»⁴

3 Al-Bukhārī and Aḥmad.

The First Step into the Hereafter

Death is the first step into the hereafter, and the grave is the first of the hereafter's domiciles. Hānī, 'Uthmān Bin 'Affān's (رضي الله عنه) servant, said that whenever 'Uthmān stood over a grave, he would cry until he soaked his beard. He was told, "You remember Jannah and the Fire without weeping, but you weep when you remember the grave!" He replied, "Indeed, I heard Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) say:

«The grave is the first of the hereafter's domiciles; if one passes through it safely, what follows will be easier; and if one does not pass through it safely, what follows will be more horrible.»

And I heard Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) say:

«I have never seen a dreadful view but the grave is even more dreadful.» ¹

¹ Recorded by at-Tirmithī; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ut-Targhībī wat-Tarhīb).

CHAPTER 2

TEXTS DESCRIBING AL-BARZAKH

In this chapter, we present a number of long ḥadīths, each describing various happenings in al-Barzakh. The incidents mentioned in these (as well as other ḥadīths) are summarized and segmented in the next four chapters to cover the four stages of the life of al-Barzakh.

1. Al-Barā's Ḥadīth

Al-Barā' Bin 'Āzib (رضي الله عنه) reported that they (the companions) went out with Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) to the funeral of a man from al-Anṣār ¹. They reached the location of the grave before it was dug. The Messenger (ﷺ) sat down facing the Qiblah ²; and they sat around him quietly, as if afraid to disturb birds standing on their heads. He held in his hand a stick with which he was moving the earth. He looked toward the sky, then toward the earth, raising and lowering his eyes three times. He said to them (two or three times), «Seek refuge in Allāh (ﷻ) from the punishment of the grave.» Then he said (three times):

«O Allāh, I seek refuge in You from the punishment of the grave.»

«Verily, when a believing 'abd ³ is at the point of departure from the worldly life, and is about to enter the next life ¹, angels descend from heaven. Their faces are white (and bright) like the sun. They carry with them a shroud from the clothes of Jannah, and embalmment from the fragrance of Jannah. They sit away from him at the limit of his eyesight. The angel of death then arrives, sits by his head, and says, "O good and peaceful soul, depart to Allāh's forgiveness and pleasure." On hearing this, the soul leaves the body (as easily) as water drops flow from the spout of a water skin; and he (the Angel of Death) takes it.

When the soul leaves his body, all angels between the heavens and the earth, and all angels in the heavens, pronounce ṣalāh on him ². All gates of the heavens open for him; the guardians of every gate implore Allāh that this soul ascends in their direction.

When the Angel of Death takes the soul, they (the other angels) do not leave it in his hand for as little as the blinking of an eye. They take it and place it in their shroud and embalmment. To this apply Allāh's (ﷻ) words:

﴿تَوَفَّتْهُ رُسُلُنَا وَهُمْ لَا يُفَرِّطُونَ﴾ الأنعام ٦١

«...Our messengers (the angels) take his soul, and they never neglect their duty.» ³

There emanates then from the soul the best smelling scent of musk that ever existed on the surface of the earth.

The angels then ascend with it. As they pass by gatherings of angels, they ask them, "What is this good soul?" They (the angels holding it) reply, "He is so and so, son of so and so,” using the best names with which he had been addressed in the first life. When they reach the lowest heaven, they ask for permission to enter; and the gates open for them. The most elite (angels) of each heaven escort him to the next one, until he reaches the seventh heaven. Allāh (ﷻ) then says, “Write My servant’s records in ‘Illiyūn’¹,

1 i.e., he is close to death.

2 i.e. they ask that he be forgiven.

﴿وَمَا أَدْرَاكَ مَا عَلِيُّنَ﴾ المطففين ١٩

«And what will make you know what ‘Illiyūn’ is? An inscribed register, witnessed by those nearest (to Allāh – among the angels).»²

Thus, his records are inscribed in ‘Illiyūn’; and the angels are told, “Take him back to the earth, because I promised them that from it I create them, into it I return them, and from it I resurrect them once again.”³

He is then returned to the earth; and his soul is returned to his body, so that he hears the thumping of his companions’ shoes as they walk away from his grave.

Two angels of severe reprimand then come to him, and shake him. They make him sit up, and ask him, “Who is you Lord?” He replies, “My Lord is Allāh.” They ask him, “What is your Dīn (religion)?” He replies, “My Dīn is Islām.” They ask him, “Who is that man who was sent to you?” He replies, “He is Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ).” They ask him, “What did you do?” He replies, “I read Allāh’s Book, believed in it, and obeyed it.” They shake him again, asking,

1 A place most high; the highest register.

2 Al-Muʿaffifin 83:19-21.

3 Tāhā 20:55.

“Who is your Lord? What is your Dīn? Who is your Prophet?” And this is the last fitnah (trial) to which a believer is subjected. In this regard, Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿يُثَبِّتُ اللَّهُ الَّذِينَ ءَامَنُوا بِالْقَوْلِ الثَّابِتِ فِي الْحَيَاةِ الدُّنْيَا
وَفِي الْآخِرَةِ﴾ إبراهيم ٢٧

«Allāh keeps the believers firm with firm words in the first life, and in the last one.»¹

He repeats, “My Lord is Allāh, my Dīn is Islām, and my Prophet is Muḥammad (ﷺ).” A caller then calls from the heavens, “My servant has spoken the truth; so provide him with furnishings from Jannah; clothe him from Jannah; and open for him a door to Jannah.” Thus he receives provision and perfume from it; and his grave is spread to the extent of his eyesight.

Before him appears a man with a pleasant face, nice garments, and a good smell. He says to him, “I am to give you glad tidings that will please you: tidings of Allāh’s acceptance, and gardens with everlasting bliss. This is the day that you have been promised.” He responds, “Glad tidings from Allāh be to you too. Who are you? Your face is one that brings goodness.” He says, “I am your good deeds. By Allāh, I only knew you quick in obeying Allāh, and slow in disobeying Him. May Allāh reward you with good.”

A door is opened for him to Jannah and another one to the Fire; and he is told, “This (the Fire) would have been your dwelling had you disobeyed Allāh. But Allāh has substituted it for you with this (Jannah).” When he sees what is awaiting him in

Jannah (of pleasures), he says, "O my Lord, speed up the arrival of the Hour (of Resurrection), so that I may rejoin my family and property." He is told, "Calm down."

And verily when a disbelieving (or disobedient) 'abd is at the point of departure from the worldly life, and is about to enter the hereafter, strong hulking angels with dark faces descend to him from the heavens. They bring with them tough fabrics from the Fire. They sit away from him at the limit of his eyesight. The Angel of Death (مَلَكُ الْمَوْتِ) arrives, sits by his head, and says, "O malicious soul, depart to a wrath and anger from Allāh." (On hearing this) it becomes terrified, and clings to the body; but he extracts it (by force), like a skewer is pulled from wet wool, causing the veins and nerves to burst.

Every angel between the heavens and the earth, and every angel in the heavens, curses him. The gates of the heavens are shut; the guardians of every gate implore Allāh that this soul does not ascend in their direction.

When the Angel of Death takes the soul, they (the other angels) do not leave it in his hand for as little as the blinking of an eye. They put it in the fabric that they have (from the Fire); and from it emanates the most repugnant odor of a decaying cadaver that ever existed on the surface of the earth.

The angels then ascend with it. As they pass by gatherings of angels, they ask them, "What is this malicious soul?" The angels holding it respond, "He is so and so, son of so and so," using the worst names with which he had been addressed in the first life. When they reach the lowest heaven, they ask for permission to enter; but the gates are not opened for him. (Here the Messenger (ﷺ) recited:)

«لَا تُفْتَحُ لَهُمْ أَبْوَابُ السَّمَاءِ وَلَا يَدْخُلُونَ الْجَنَّةَ حَتَّى يَلِجَ الْجَمَلُ فِي سَمِّ الْخِيَاطِ» الأعراف ٤٠

«For them (the disbelievers), the gates of heaven will not be opened; and they will not enter Jannah until the camel goes through the eye of the needle.» ¹

Allāh (ﷻ) then says, “Write his record in Sijjīn ² in the lowest earth.” And they are told, “Take him back to the earth, because I promised them that from it I create them, into it I return them, and from it I resurrect them once again. ³” His soul is then cast down from the heavens without regard; and it falls into his body. (Here Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) recited:)

«وَمَنْ يُشْرِكْ بِاللَّهِ فَكَأَنَّمَا خَرَّ مِنَ السَّمَاءِ فَتَخْطَفُهُ الطَّيْرُ أَوْ تَهْوِي بِهِ الرِّيحُ فِي مَكَانٍ سَحِيقٍ» الحج ٣١

«As for the one who joins partners with Allāh, it is as if he plunges down from the skies – whereupon birds snatch him off, or the wind casts him away to a remote place (from Allāh’s mercy).» ⁴

His soul is restored to his body, so that he hears the thumping of his companions’ shoes as they walk away from his grave.

Two angels of severe reprimand come to him and shake him. They make him sit up, and ask him, “Who is your Lord?” He replies, “Alas, alas, I do not know!” They ask him, “What is your Dīn?” He replies, “Alas, alas, I do not know!” They ask him,

⁴ Al-Hajj 22:31

“Who is that man who was sent to you?” He cannot recall his name, and he is told, “(His name is) Muḥammad!” He says, “Alas, alas, I do not know. I just heard the people say that.” He is then told, “You did not know; and you did not recite (the Qur’ān)!” A caller calls from the heaven, “He lies! So spread for him furnishings from the Fire; and open for him a door to the Fire.” Thus its heat and fierce hot wind reach him; and his grave is tightened around him, causing his ribs to break.

Before him appears a man with ugly face, repulsive clothes, and a foul smell; he says, “I am to give you evil tidings that will displease you. This is the day that you have been promised.” He responds, “Evil tidings from Allāh be to you too! Who are you? Your face is one that brings evil.” He says, “I am your malicious deeds. By Allāh, I only knew you slow in obeying Allāh, and quick in disobeying Him. May Allāh repay you with evil.”

A blind, deaf, and dumb person is appointed for him. He carries in his hand a sledgehammer that, if it hits a mountain, would turn it to dust. He hits him (with it) once; and he becomes dust. Allāh then restores him as he was; and the person hits him again; he sounds a shriek that is heard by everything except men and *jinn*s.

A door is opened for him to the Fire; and he is given the furnishings from the Fire. He then says, “O my Lord! Do not establish the Hour.”¹

2. Abū Hurayrah's First Ḥadīth

Abū Hurayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

‘Indeed, a dying person is witnessed by angels. If he were righteous, he (the Angel of Death) says, “Depart, O good soul that inhabited a good body; depart in a praised state; and receive glad tidings of happiness, sweet aromas, and a Lord who is not angry.” He continues to say this until it leaves the body. It is then taken up to the (first) heaven, where permission is sought for it to be admitted. It is said, “Who is this?” He (an angel) replies, “So and so.” It is then said, “Welcome, good soul that inhabited a good body; enter in a praised state; and receive glad tidings of happiness, sweet aromas, and a Lord who is not angry.” This repeats (in every heaven), until it finally reaches the (seventh) heaven above which is Allāh (ﷻ).

As for an evil man, he (the Angel of Death) says, “Depart, O malicious soul that inhabited a malicious body; depart in a condemned state; and receive evil tidings of boiling fluids and dirty wound discharges (to drink), and other types of suffering of similar nature – all paired together.” This continues to be said until it leaves the body. It is then taken up to the (first) heaven, where permission is sought for it to be admitted. It is said, “Who is this?” He (an angel) replies, “So and so.” It is then said, “Unwelcome, malicious soul that inhabited a malicious body; return in a condemned state, because the gates to the heavens will not open for you.” Thus it is sent down from the heaven, and it enters the grave.

The pious person sits in his grave without fear or terror. He is asked, “What did you do?” He replies, “I adhered to Islām.” He is then asked, “Who is that man?” He replies: “Muhammad, Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ). He brought to us clear signs from Allāh; and we believed him.” He is then asked, “Did you see Allāh?” He replies, “It is not possible for anyone to see Allāh (in the first life).”

An opening is made (from his grave) to the Fire, so that he sees its various sections crushing each other. He is told, “Look at that from which Allāh (ﷻ) has saved you.” Another opening is then made (from his grave) in the direction of Jannah; and he views its grandeur and the things (bounties) in it. He is then told, “This will be your position. You lived with certitude (about Allāh’s promises); upon it you died; and upon it you will be raised – when Allāh (ﷻ) wills.”

The evil person is made to sit in his grave in a state of fear and terror. He is asked, “What did you do?” He replies, “I do not know.” He is asked, “Who is that man?” He replies, “I heard the people say things; and I said the same.”

An opening then appears (from his grave) in the direction of Jannah; and he views its grandeur and the things (bounties) in it. He is told, “Look at that from which Allāh (ﷻ) has deprived you.” Another opening appears (from his grave) to the Fire; and he observes its various sections crushing each other. He is told, “This will be your abode; in doubt you lived; upon it you died; and upon it you will be raised – when Allāh wills.”¹

3. ‘Ā’ishah’s Ḥadīth

‘Ā’ishah (رضي الله عنها) narrated that a Jewish woman came to her door begging for food and saying, “Feed me; may Allāh protect you from the fitnah

1 Recorded by Ibn Mājah; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ul-Jāmi’ no. 1968).

(tribulation) of the *Dajjāl*¹ and the fitnah of the grave's torture." 'Ā'ishah (ﷺ) deliberately delayed the woman until Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) arrived. Then she said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, what does this Jewish woman mean?' He said: <What did she say?> She replied, "She said, 'Feed me; may Allāh protect you from the fitnah of the Dajjāl and that of the grave's torture.'" Immediately Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) stood up, raised and extended his hands, and asked Allāh to shelter him from the fitnah of the Dajjāl and that of the grave's torture. Then he (ﷺ) said:

«As for the fitnah of the Dajjāl, there never was a prophet but has warned his people from him. However, I will tell you a thing (about the Dajjāl) from which no other prophet warned his nation: He is one-eyed; and Allāh is not one-eyed. Between his eyes is written the word "kāfir", which every believer will be able to read.

And as for the tribulation of the grave: with me will people be tested, and about me will they be asked.

A righteous person is made to sit in his grave, without having any fear or terror. He is asked, "What did you use to say about Islām?" He is also asked, "Who is that man who was among you?" He replies, "He is Muḥammad, the Messenger of Allāh, who came with clear signs from Allāh; and we believed in him."

An opening then appears (from his grave) to the Fire; he observes its various sections crushing each other. He is told, "Look at that from which Allāh (ﷻ) has saved you." Another opening then appears (from his grave) to Jannah. He observes its grandeur and the things (bounties) in it. He is told, "This will be your place in it." And he is told, "You lived with certitude (about Allāh); upon that you died; and upon it you will be raised – when Allāh wills.”

As for an evil person, he is made to sit in his grave in a state of fear and terror. He is asked, “What did you use to say?” He replies, “I heard the people say things; so I said as they said.”

An opening then appears (from his grave) to Jannah. He observes its grandeur and the things (bounties) in it. He is told, “Look at that from which Allāh has deprived you.” Another opening appears (from his grave) to the Fire. He observes its various sections crushing each other. He is told, “This will be your abode in it. You lived in doubt (about Allāh); upon that you died; and upon it will you be raised – when Allāh wills.” He is then tortured.¹

4. Abū Hurayrah’s Second Ḥadīth

Abū Hurayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«When a believer dies, the angels of mercy come to him with a piece of white silk. They say, “Depart (from the body) to Allāh’s (granted) happiness.” It departs with the most beautiful scent of musk. They even pass it from one angel to the next, smelling it.

When they arrive at the gate of the (lowest) heaven, they are asked, “What is this beautiful scent coming from the earth?” They continue their ascent; and as they arrive at each one of the heavens, the same thing is said to them.

They (the angels) take it to (the location of) the souls of the believers. They (the other souls) are happier in meeting it than are those to whom a beloved one returns after a long absence. They ask it, “What happened to such and such (a disbeliever)?” Some of them interrupt, “Leave him until he rests, because he was in the grief of the world.” However, he says, “He died; did he not come to you?” They (the angels) then say, “He was taken to a bottomless pit (of Fire).”

As for a disbeliever, the angels of punishment come to him with coarse fabric and say, “Depart (from the body) to Allāh’s wrath.” It departs, smelling like the worst of decayed corpses. It is then taken to the gate of the earth.¹

5. Abū Hurayrah’s Third Ḥadīth

Abū Hurayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«When a (believing) dead person is buried, two black and blue angels come to him. One of them is called Munkar, and the other Nakīr. They ask him, “What did you use to say about this man (Muḥammad)?” He says, as he used to say, “He is Allāh’s ‘abd and Messenger; I testify that there is no deity (worthy of being worshipped) but Allāh, and that Muḥammad is His ‘abd and Messenger.” They say, “We expected you to say this.” His grave is then expanded for him to seventy cubits by seventy; it is illuminated for him; and he is told, “Go to sleep.” He says, “Let me return to my people to inform them (about my good condition).” But they tell him, “Sleep as does a newlywed person, whom no one awakens except the member of his family who is dearest to him.” (He sleeps like that) until Allāh raises him from his resting place.

¹ Recorded by Ibn Ḥibbān and Ibn Mājah; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ut-Targhibi wat-Tarhīb).

As for a hypocrite, he replies (to their questioning), “I heard the people say things; and I said the same; but I do not know.” They say, “We expected you to say this.” The earth is then told, “Contract on him.” And it contracts on him until his ribs break. Thus, his punishment continues therein, until Allāh raises him from his abode.> ¹

6. Abū Hurayrah’s Fourth Ḥadīth

Abū Hurayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

‘Verily, when death descends upon a believer, and he witnesses things (implying his forthcoming rewards), he wishes that his soul would depart (quickly), and Allāh loves to meet him.

His soul is taken up to the heaven. The souls of the believers come to him and inquire from him about their acquaintances of the dwellers of the earth. They are pleased when he says, “I left such and such in the dunyā (the first life).” And when he says, “Such and such had died,” they say (disappointedly), “But he was not brought to us.” ²

A believer is made to sit in his grave, and is asked, “Who is your lord?” He replies, “My lord is Allāh.” He is asked, “Who is your prophet?” He replies, “My prophet is Muḥammad (ﷺ).” He is asked, “What is your religion?” He says, “My religion is Islām.” A door is then opened from his grave (to Jannah), and he is told, “Look at you

1 Recorded by at-Tirmithī; verified to be ḥasan by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ul-Jāmi‘ no. 724).

2 The souls of the believers meet all other believers’ souls upon their death. They are concerned about those whom they have not met yet, and would rather know that they are still in the dunyā, and still have a chance of dying as believers, than to know that they had died as disbelievers.

(future) abode.” He is then left in the grave, and (the time passes) as if it is but a nap.

And when death descends upon an enemy of Allāh, and he witnesses things (implying his imminent punishment), he wishes that his soul would never depart, and Allāh hates to meet him.

When he is made to sit in his grave, he is asked, “Who is your lord?” He replies, “I do not know.” He is told, “May you never know!” A door is then opened from his grave to Hell, and he is hit a blow that can be heard by every creature except the human beings and the *jinn*s. And he is told, “Go to sleep like a bitten person.” And his grave is made tight on him.>

Abū Hurayrah was asked, “What is a bitten person?” He replied, “One who is bitten by creatures and snakes.”¹

7. Anas’s First Ḥadīth

Anas (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Verily, when a believer is placed in his grave, an angel comes to him and asks him, “What did you worship?” If Allāh guides him, he replies, “I worshipped Allāh.” Then he asks him, “What did you say about this man (Muḥammad)?” He answers, “He is Allāh’s ‘abd and Messenger.”

He is not questioned about anything else after this. He is taken to a house in the Fire, and is told, “This would have been your house in the Fire; but Allāh protected you and had mercy upon you; thus He substituted it for you with a house in Jannah.”

He says, "Allow me to go give this good news to my family." But he is told, "Be tranquil."

When a disbeliever is put into his grave, an angel comes to him, rebukes him, and asks him, "What did you worship?" He replies, "I do not know." He is told, "You did not know; nor did you recite (Qur'ān)!" He is then asked, "What did you say about this man?" He replies, "I said what the people said." He (the angel) then hits him with an iron hammer between his ears; and he emits a shriek which is heard by all creatures except the human beings and *jinn*s.¹

8. Anas's Second Hadīth

Anas (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Verily, after a 'abd is placed in his grave, and his companions walk away from him, so that he can hear the echo of their footsteps, two angels come to him. They make him sit, and ask him, "What did you saying about this man (Muḥammad)?"

A believer replies, "I bear witness that he is Allāh's 'abd and Messenger." He is then told, "Look at your place in the Fire; Allāh has substituted it for you with a place in Jannah." Thus he views both of them. His grave is then expanded for him to seventy cubits; and it is filled with greenery until the Day of Resurrection.

As for a disbeliever or a hypocrite, he replies, "I do not know. I said what the people said." He is then told, "You did not know; nor did you recite (Qur'ān)!" He is then hit one blow between his ears with an iron hammer; and he emits a shriek which is heard by all creatures near him except *jinn*s and human beings. His grave contracts on him until his ribs break.›¹

1 Recorded by Abū Dāwūd; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ul-Jāmi' no. 1930).

CHAPTER 3

THE MOMENT OF DEATH

Introduction

In this chapter, we present the incidents that take place from the time that one is on the verge of death, until one's soul starts its trip to the heavens. The incidents are segmented to make it easy for the reader to follow.

With the approach of death, a believer is pleased because the material barrier is about to dissolve, and he is therefore about to meet his Lord. His soul departs with ease, emitting beautiful odors that delight the angels. A disbeliever, on the other hand, is terrified to realize that his great punishment is eminent. His soul is extracted from his body by force, emitting the most loathsome odors.

It is important to note that most of the available texts compare the situation of a believer to that of a disbeliever, without making reference to a sinful believer. Because of this we assume that, in this comparison, a "believer" is one whose good deeds outweigh his sins, so that he will not be punished in the grave or on the Day of Judgement.

As for the believers who have been so sinful as to deserve punishment before they enter Jannah, they may be punished in their graves, and possibly after resurrection as well. Their punishment has not been fully detailed in the Sunnah. Yet, some of its forms have been described by the Prophet (ﷺ). This is covered in Chapter 8 titled, "The Sinful in al-Barzakh".

The following table compares what happens, in each case or situation, to a believer and a disbeliever. The references are numbered after the long hadiths cited in Chapter 2. Other references, marked with a "*", are presented later in this chapter under the section titled, "Related Texts".

CHAPTER 4

TRIP TO THE HEAVENS AND BACK

Introduction

After departing from the bodies, the souls are taken up on a trip to the heavens. The believers' souls are warmly welcomed, and are admitted into all of the heavens. They meet the souls of other believers and receive their Lord's praise before returning into the bodies. The disbelievers' souls are condemned, and are not allowed to enter the heavens. They receive their Lord's blame before falling into the bodies. These incidents are detailed in the following table.

The numbered references refer to the ḥadīths in Chapter 2. The "*" references are cited toward the end of this chapter.

SQUEEZE OF THE GRAVE

No human being will be spared the squeeze of the grave. However, the following ḥadīth indicates that it is not at the same degree of severity for all people; some of the believers are released from its grip quicker than others. Ibn ‘Abbās (رضي الله عنه) said that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«If anyone were to escape from the squeeze of the grave, it would be Sa’d Bin Mu‘āth; however, he was squeezed once and then released.»¹

THE ANGELS’ SUPPLICATION FOR THE BELIEVERS

Abū Hurayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«When the soul of a believer departs from the body, it is taken by two angels who rise with it (here he (ﷺ) described the sweetness of its fragrance). The inhabitants of the heaven say, “A good soul is coming from the direction of the earth; may Allāh’s blessings be upon you and upon the body that you had inhabited.” He is then taken to his Lord, Who says, “Take it to complete its appointed time (before resurrection).”

But when the soul of a disbeliever departs from the body (here he (ﷺ) described its foul odor), the inhabitants of the heaven say, “An evil soul is coming from the direction of the earth.” Then it is said, “Take it to complete its appointed time.»²

THE FINAL TEST

Introduction

The soul returns to the body after the burial, just in time for the “Final Test”. Two very stern angels conduct the test. They ask the soul questions that test the person’s level of belief and adherence to the Prophet (ﷺ). With firm words, a believer provides the correct answers, whereas a disbeliever stutters and provides wrong answers. These incidents are detailed in this chapter.

The numbered references in the following table refer to the ḥadīths in Chapter 2. The “*” references are cited later in this chapter.

QUESTIONING TIME

‘Uthmān (رضي الله عنه) narrated that after Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) buried a person, he (ﷺ) would stand by the grave and say:

«Ask Allāh to grant to your brother forgiveness and firmness (of words), because he is being questioned at this moment.»¹

As death approached him, ‘Amr Bin al-‘Āṣ (رضي الله عنه) said to his companions:

“After you bury me, stand around my grave for as long as it takes to slaughter a camel and distribute its meat; I will thus be comforted by your presence while I am considering how to respond to my Lord’s Messengers (the two angels).”²

ALLĀH GRANTS FIRMNESS OF WORDS TO THE BELIEVERS

Al-Barā’ Bin ‘Āzib (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«When the believer is placed in the grave, he is made to sit, and is approached (by the two angels); he then testifies that there is no deity (worthy of being worshipped) but Allāh, and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh. This is why Allāh says:

يُشَبِّتُ اللَّهُ الَّذِينَ ءَامَنُوا بِالْقَوْلِ الثَّابِتِ فِي الْحَيَاةِ الدُّنْيَا
وَفِي الْآخِرَةِ ﴿إِبْرَاهِيمَ ٢٧﴾

PRESERVING THE FACULTY OF REASON

‘Abdullāh Bin ‘Umar (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) mentioned the questioners (the two angels) of the grave. ‘Umar asked, “Is our reason preserved with us then, O Messenger of Allāh?” He (ﷺ) said, «Yes, as is your present state.» ‘Umar (رضي الله عنه) then said:

“I would then throw a stone into his (the angel's) mouth ³.” ⁴

CHAPTER 6

AFTER THE TEST

Introduction

The test confirms what the person had already realized from the moment of his death. A believer is immediately rewarded with an opening that appears from his grave to Jannah. His good deeds materialize next to him in the form of a pleasant looking man. On the other hand, a disbeliever is severely punished, and an opening appears from his grave to Hell. His evil deeds materialize in the form of a repulsive man. These incidents are detailed in this chapter.

The numbered references in the following table refer to the ḥadīths in Chapter 2. The “*” references are cited later in this chapter.

Where the Souls Really Are

It is important to note that some texts indicate that the believers’ souls turn into birds in Jannah. Other texts indicate that the souls are sometimes attached to the bodies that are in the grave. There is no contradiction between the two situations, because this is a matter of ghayb that cannot be subjected to the reasoning deriving from our worldly experience. A good example to facilitate understanding this is the dreams that take place during our sleep, where our souls seem to make trips to worlds beyond human perception.

Ibn ul-Qayyim has a very detailed discussion regarding this and related issues in his book ar-Rūḥ (the Soul). We quote from it the following:

“The soul’s attachment to the body has five different stages:

- a) Its attachment to it while it is still an embryo in the mother’s womb.

- b) Its attachment to it after it emerges to the surface of the earth.
- c) Its attachment to it during sleep. In that case, it is attached to it in one respect, and detached in another respect.
- d) Its attachment to it in al-Barzakh. Even though it departs and becomes detached from it, its detachment is not complete so as to have absolutely no connection with it.
- e) Its attachment to it on the Day of Reckoning, which is the most complete and inseparable attachment ...”

Tabulated Events

Event	A Believer	A Disbeliever	Ref.
Furnishings and clothing:	He is given furnishings and clothes from Jannah .	He is given furnishings from the Fire.	1
Openings from the grave to future abodes:	Two openings appear in it: One to Jannah ; and he views its grandeur and bounties. The other to the Fire; and he sees its various sections crushing each other.		1,2,3
Seeing, from his grave, the place that he evaded:	Pointing to the Fire, the angels tell him, “This could have been your place, had you disobeyed Allāh; but Allāh has saved you from it.”	Pointing to Jannah , the angels tell him, “Look at that from which Allāh has deprived you.”	1,2,3, 7,8

Event	A Believer	A Disbeliever	Ref.
Seeing, from his grave, his final destination:	He sees his future place in Jannah , tastes its provision and perfume, and is told, "Allāh has granted you this place in it."	He sees his future place in the Fire, tastes its heat and fierce hot wind, and is told, "This will be your abode in it."	1,2,3, 6,7,8
Between doubt and certitude:	He is told, "You lived with certitude; upon it you died; and upon it you will be raised – when Allāh wills."	He is told, "In doubt you lived; upon it you died; and upon it you will be raised – when Allāh wills."	2,3
Extent of the grave:	It is spread to the extent of his eyesight – seventy cubits by seventy.	The earth is told, "Contract on him." And it contracts until his ribs break.	1,5,6, 8
Light in the grave:	It is illuminated for him because of the Prophet's supplication.	Darkness engulfs him.	5,*
Greenery in the grave:	It is filled with greenery until the Day of Resurrection.	(Not applicable.)	8

Event	A Believer	A Disbeliever	Ref.
Companion in the grave:	His good deeds take the form of a good looking, nicely dressed, and pleasantly smelling person.	His bad deeds take the form of an ugly looking, hideously dressed, and foully smelling person.	1
Tidings carried by the companion:	“I am to give you glad tidings of Allāh’s acceptance, and gardens with everlasting bliss. This is the day that you have been promised.”	“I am to give you evil tidings. This is the day that you have been promised.”	1
Response of the dead person to the companion:	“Glad tidings from Allāh be to you too. Who are you? Your face is one that brings goodness.”	“Evil tidings from Allāh be to you too! Who are you? Your face is one that brings evil.”	1
Explanation by the companion:	“I am your good deeds. By Allāh, I only knew you quick in obeying Allāh, and slow in disobeying Him. May He reward you with good.”	“I am your malicious deeds. By Allāh, I only knew you slow in obeying Allāh, and quick in disobeying Him. May He repay you with evil.”	1

Executor in the grave:	(Not applicable.)	A blind, deaf, and dumb person is appointed for him. He has an iron hammer that can turn mountains to dust.	1
Beating in the grave:	(Not applicable.)	He is hit between his ears, once and again, each time turning to dust, and getting restored as he was.	1,7,8
Uncanny shrieks of agony:	(Not applicable.)	His shrieks are heard by everything (even animals) except the human beings and the jinns .	1,7,8, *
Wish of the dead regarding resurrection, when they see what awaits them:	"My Lord, speed up the Resurrection, so that I may rejoin my family and property."	"My Lord! Do not establish the Hour."	1,5,7

Event	A Believer	A Disbeliever	Ref.
Wish to return:	“Allow me to go give this good news to my family.”	(Not applicable.)	5,7
Response of the two angels to the wish:	“Calm down; sleep as does a newlywed person, whom no one awakens except the member of his family who is dearest to him.”	(Not applicable.)	1,5,7
The rest of the abode in al-Barzakh :	He sleeps until Allāh raises him from his resting place.	He sleeps like a bitten person, and his punishment goes on.	5,6
Where the soul stays until the Day of Resurrection:	His soul is turned into a bird that eats from the trees of Jannah .	(No information.)	*
Showing him his future abode morning and evening:	He is shown his place in Jannah , and is told, “This will be your place when Allāh raises you on the Day of Resurrection.”		*

CONTINUAL EXPOSITION TO THE FUTURE POSITION

Allāh (ﷻ) says:

«النَّارُ يُعْرَضُونَ عَلَيْهَا غُدُوًّا وَعَشِيًّا وَيَوْمَ تَقُومُ السَّاعَةُ أَدْخِلُوا

«The Fire; they (the people of Pharaoh) are exposed to it morning and evening; and on the Day when the Hour will be established (it will be said to the angels): “Let Pharaoh’s people into the severest torment.”»¹

Ibn ‘Umar (رضي الله عنه) said that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«When one of you dies, he is shown his (future) position morning and evening. If he is from the people of Jannah, (he is shown his place) in Jannah, and if he is from the people of the Fire, (he is shown his place) in the Fire; and each is told, “This will be your place when Allāh raises you on the Day of Resurrection.”»²

Zayd Bin Thābit (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Verily, those people (the dead) are being afflicted in the grave. Were it not that you may tend to stop burying each other, I would have asked Allāh (ﷻ) to let you hear the torture of the grave as I do.»¹

DARKNESS IN THE GRAVE

Abū Hurayrah and Anas (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Indeed, these graves engulf their dwellers with darkness; and verily Allāh illuminates them (for the believers) because of my ṣalāh (supplication) for them.»²

EATING FROM THE TREES OF JANNAH

Ka'b Bin Mālik narrated that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

CHAPTER 7

THE PROPHETS AND THE MARTYRS

Introduction

The prophets, the martyrs, and the most righteous believers have a special well-earned status in the hereafter. This applies to al-Barzakh as well. The prophets' bodies are preserved from decay, and they live a special type of life in which they continuously pray to their Lord (ﷻ). The martyrs' souls are with the other believers' souls in Jannah, but their souls are within green birds, and they are closer to Allāh, being immediately under the Throne.

Preservation of the Prophets' Bodies

The earth does not consume the bodies of the Prophets. Aws Bin Aws (رضي الله عنه) narrated that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Indeed, among the best of all of your days is the day of Jumu'ah (Friday). On such a day, Ādam was created, he died, on it the blow (of the Ṣūr or trumpet of the Doom's Hour) will be sounded, and on it is the great shock (when all those on earth will die following the blow of the Ṣūr); so say in plenty your ṣalāh upon me on Friday, for indeed your ṣalāh will be presented to me. Indeed, Allāh has prohibited the earth from eating up the bodies of prophets.»¹

1 Recorded by Aḥmad, Abū Dāwūd and others; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ul-Jāmi' no. 2212).

The Prophets' Life in Their Graves

The Prophets live and pray in their graves. However, their life is not the life of this world, but is a life from al-Barzakh. What distinguishes it from the life of the other believers is that the latter sleep in their graves, whereas the prophets are granted the ability and merit to continue to pray even after death. Anas Bin Mālīk (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

‘The prophets are alive in their graves; and they are praying (therein).’¹

Anas (رضي الله عنه) also reported that the Messenger (ﷺ) said:

‘On the night of *Isrā’*², I passed by Mūsā, who was standing in prayer in his grave.’³

Some scholars, such as al-Manāwī, believe that this ḥadīth refers to the original linguistic meaning of the prayer, “It means that he was making du‘ā, praising Allāh, and mentioning Him.”⁴ Others, such as al-Qurṭubī, believe that it refers to the actual shar‘ī (legislated) prayer.

Note that there is no conflict between this ḥadīth and that (cited below) in which the Prophet (ﷺ) says that he also saw Mūsā (عليه السلام) on that night in the Sixth Heaven. The latter one refers to Mūsā's soul, whereas the first one refers to his body joined by the soul in a ghaybī manner.⁵

Conveying the Ṣalāh

Allāh (ﷻ) appoints an angel at the grave of Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) to inform him, by name, of each one who says the ṣalāh upon him. Abū Bakr (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

1 Recorded by Abū Y'alā, al-Bazzār and others; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ul-Jāmi' no. 2790).

2 Isrā': The Prophet's (ﷺ) miraculous night trip from Makkah to Jerusalem.

3 Muslim and others.

4 Fayd ul-Qadīr 5:519.

5 Al-Āyāt ul-Bayyināt 41.

«Say the ṣalāh upon me frequently, because Allāh has appointed for me an angel who stays by my grave. Whenever one of my Ummah (Nation or followers) says the ṣalāh upon me, that angel says to me, “O Muḥammad, such and such person said the ṣalāh upon you at this moment.”» ¹

Also, Abū Mas‘ūd al-Anṣārī (ؓ) reported that the Messenger (ﷺ) also said:

«Say the ṣalāh upon me plentifully on al-Jumu‘ah (Friday), for no one says the ṣalāh upon me on Friday but his ṣalāh is presented to me.» ²

The Night Journey

Mālik Bin Ṣa‘ṣa‘ah narrated that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) described to the ṣaḥābah his Night Journey (al-Isrā’ and al-Mi‘rāj) as follows:

«While I was lying at al-Ḥatīm ³, someone suddenly came to me and cut my body open from here to here ⁴ and took out my heart. A gold washbowl full of Īmān (faith) was then brought to me. My heart was washed with Zamzam’s water and filled with Īmān; it was then returned to its original place.

Before me was brought an animal smaller than a mule and larger than a donkey, white in color, called al-Burāq. (It travels so fast that) it places its footstep at the end of its eyesight. I was carried on it, and Jibrīl led me till he reached the lowest heaven.

When he requested admission, he was asked, "Who is it?" He said, "Jibrīl." He was asked, "Who accompanies you?" He replied, "Muḥammad." He was asked, "Has he been summoned?" He said, "Yes." It was then said, "He is welcome; what an excellent visit his is!" The gate was opened. When I entered, I saw Ādam (ﷺ). Jibrīl said, "This is your father, Ādam; so give him salām (greeting with peace)." I gave him salām. He returned my salām and said, "Welcome, righteous Prophet and righteous son."

Jibrīl then ascended with me until we reached the second heaven. He requested admission, and was asked, "Who is it?" He said, "Jibrīl." He was asked, "Who accompanies you?" He replied, "Muḥammad." He was asked, "Has he been summoned?" He said, "Yes." It was then said, "He is welcome; what an excellent visit his is!" The gate was opened. When I entered, I saw Yaḥyā (John) and ʿĪsā (Jesus), who are cousins. Jibrīl said, "These are Yaḥyā and ʿĪsā; give them salām." I gave them salām. They returned my salām and said, "Welcome, righteous brother and righteous prophet."

Jibrīl then ascended with me to the third heaven. He requested admission, and was asked, "Who is it?" He said, "Jibrīl." He was asked, "Who accompanies you?" He replied, "Muḥammad." He was asked, "Has he been summoned?" He said, "Yes." It was then said, "He is welcome; what an excellent visit his is!" The gate was opened. When I entered I saw Yūsuf. Jibrīl said, "This is Yūsuf; give him salām." I gave him salām. He returned my salām and said, "Welcome, righteous brother and righteous prophet."

Jibrīl then ascended with me to the fourth heaven. He requested admission, and was asked,

“Who is it?” He said, “Jibrīl.” He was asked, “Who accompanies you?” He replied, “Muḥammad.” He was asked, “Has he been summoned?” He said, “Yes.” It was then said, “He is welcome; what an excellent visit his is!” The gate was opened. When I entered, I saw Idrīs. Jibrīl said, “This is Idrīs; give him salām.” I gave him salām. He returned my salām and said, “Welcome, righteous brother and righteous prophet.”

Jibrīl then ascended with me to the fifth heaven. He requested admission, and was asked, “Who is it?” He said, “Jibrīl.” He was asked, “Who accompanies you?” He replied, “Muḥammad.” He was asked, “Has he been summoned?” He said, “Yes.” It was then said, “He is welcome; what an excellent visit his is!” When I entered I saw Hārūn (Aaron). Jibrīl said, “This is Hārūn; give him salām.” I gave him salām. He returned my salām and said, “Welcome, righteous brother and righteous prophet.”

Jibrīl then ascended with me to the sixth heaven. He requested admission, and was asked, “Who is it?” He said, “Jibrīl.” He was asked, “Who accompanies you?” He replied, “Muḥammad.” He was asked, “Has he been summoned?” He said, “Yes.” It was then said, “He is welcome; what an excellent visit his is!” When I entered I saw Mūsā (Moses). Jibrīl said, “This is Mūsā; give him salām.” I gave him salām. He returned my salām and said, “Welcome, righteous brother and righteous prophet.” After I passed on, he began crying; he was asked, “What makes you cry?” He said, “I am crying because a young man, sent after me (with the Message from Allāh), has followers who will enter Jannah in greater numbers than my followers.”

Jibrīl then ascended with me to the seventh heaven. He requested admission, and was asked, “Who is it?” He said, “Jibrīl.” He was asked, “Who accompanies you?" He replied, "Muḥammad." He was asked, "Has he been summoned?" He said, "Yes." It was then said, "He is welcome; what an excellent visit his is!" When I entered I saw Ibrāhīm. Jibrīl said, "This is your father Ibrāhīm; give him salām." I gave him salām. He responded to my salām and said, "Welcome, righteous son and righteous prophet."

I was then shown *Sidrat ul-Muntahā*¹. And behold! Its fruits were like the jars of Hajar², and its leaves were as big as elephants' ears. Jibrīl said, "This is Sidrat ul-Muntahā." There ran four rivers, two were concealed and two were visible. I asked, "What are these rivers, O Jibrīl?" He replied, "As for the two concealed ones, they are two rivers in Jannah; and as for the two visible ones, they are the Nile and the Euphrates."

Then I was shown *al-Bayt ul-Ma'mūr*³. I said, "What is this, O Jibrīl?" He replied, "This is al-Bayt ul-Ma'mūr: seventy thousand angels enter into it every day; and once they leave, they never enter it again."

I was then offered a flask of wine, a flask of milk, and a flask of honey. I took the one that contained milk. Jibrīl remarked: "This is the *fiṭrah*⁴ upon which you and your followers are."

Fifty ṣalāhs (prayers) were then made obligatory for me each day. On my way back I passed by Mūsā, who asked me, "What have you been commanded?" I replied, "I have been commanded to perform fifty prayers each day." Mūsā said, "Your Ummah (followers) cannot accomplish fifty prayers each day."

1 Sidrat ul-Muntahā: The Lotus Tree at the Farthest Limit, beyond which no one is allowed to pass.

2 Hajar: A village near al-Madīnah where huge clay jars used to be made.

3 Al-Bayt ul-Ma'mūr: The Much-Frequented House in the heavens.

4 Fiṭrah: The pure nature according to which Allāh created the people.

By Allāh, I have dealt with the people before you; and I tried my utmost with the Children of Isrāʼīl. Go back to your Lord, and ask him to reduce the burden for your Ummah.”

I returned; and Allāh reduced the required number of prayers by ten. Again, I came to Mūsā, who repeated his earlier advise to me.

I returned; and Allāh reduced the number by ten. I came to Mūsā, who repeated his earlier advise.

I returned; and Allāh reduced the number by ten. I came to Mūsā, who repeated his earlier advise.

I returned; and Allāh reduced the number by ten, thus commanding me to perform ten prayers each day. And Mūsā repeated his earlier advise.

I returned, and was commanded to perform five prayers each day. When I came back to Mūsā, He said, “What have you been commanded?” I replied, “I have been commanded to perform five prayers each day.” He said, “Your Ummah cannot accomplish five prayers each day. I have dealt with the people before you; and I tried my utmost with the Children of Isrāʼīl. Go back to your Lord, and ask him to reduce the burden for your Ummah.” I said, I have requested so much from my Lord that I now feel shy (to ask anymore of Him). I will just accept this and submit to Him. As I left, I heard a caller address me by saying, “You have submitted to My command, and have reduced the burden for My worshippers.”¹

The Martyred

The companions of the Prophet (ﷺ) who were martyred in the battle of Uḥud are anxious to inform their brothers about what Allāh (ﷻ) has granted the martyrs. Ibn ‘Abbās (رضي الله عنه) narrated that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«When your brothers were killed in the battle of Uḥud, Allāh (ﷻ) cast their souls into green birds that frequent the rivers of Jannah, eat of its fruits, and rest in lamps of gold hanging in the shadow of the ‘Arsh’¹. When they found this pleasant food, drink, and repose, they said, “Who will inform our brothers, on our behalf, that we are alive in Jannah, and that we receive sustenance – so that they do not forsake jihād (fighting in Allāh’s way) or turn back during the fighting?” Allāh (ﷻ) said, “I will inform them for you.”²»

CHAPTER 8

THE SINFUL IN AL-BARZAKH

Samurah's Hadīth

Samurah Bin Jundub (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) would often inquire from his companions, «Did anyone of you see a dream this night?» So dreams would be narrated to him by those whom Allāh wills them to do. One morning he (ﷺ) told them:

«Last night two men came to me (in a dream ¹) and said, "Come with us." I went with them to a sacred land.

1) We came upon a man lying flat on his back (on the ground). Another man was standing over his head with a boulder in his hand. He would hurl the boulder upon the (first) man's head, causing it to split open. The boulder would then roll away, and he would go and retrieve it. By the time he returned to him, his head is restored as it was before, and he would hit him again (with the boulder). I said to them, "May Allāh be exalted! Who are these two?" They said, "Come on, come on!"

2) We proceeded until we came upon a man sitting, and another man standing over him with an iron hook. He would approach him from one side, and rip open (with the hook) his face from the corner of the mouth to the back of the head, from the nose to the back of the head, and from the eye to the back of the head. He would then move to the other side and do what he did on the first side. As soon as he finished with that side, the first side would be restored to what it was before, and he would move to it and do as he did the first time. I said, "May Allāh be exalted! Who are these two?" They said, "Come one, come on!"

3) We proceeded until we came upon a hole that resembled a baking pit, narrow at the top and wide at the bottom. Babbling and voices were issuing from it. We looked in and saw naked men and women. Underneath the pit was a raging fire; whenever it flared up, they screamed and rose with it until they almost fell out of the pit. As it subsided, they returned (to the bottom). I said, "Who are these?" They said, "Come on; come on!"

4) We proceeded until we reached a river of blood, with a man swimming in its center. On the bank of the river there was a man who had piled around him many rocks. The man in the river would swim for a while, and then approach the one who had gathered the rocks around him, trying to exit (from the river). He would open his mouth, and he (the one standing on the bank) would throw a rock into it, causing him to return to his original position (in the middle of the river). He would then resume swimming; and every time he made an effort to get out (of the river), he would throw a rock into his mouth, forcing him to fall back to the center. I said, "Who are these two?" They said, "Come on, come on!"

5) We proceeded until we came upon a garden dense with plantation, with all sorts of spring flowers, and with a very large tree in its center. Near the stem of the tree, there stood a very tall man – so tall that I could barely see his head in the sky. Around him was the greatest number of children that I have ever seen. I said, "Who is this, and who are these?" They said, "Come on, come on!"

6) Near the tree, I saw a man with the most hateful appearance in any man. Before him was a fire, which he was kindling and trotting around. I said to them, "Who is this?" They said, "Come on; come on!"

7) As for the tree, never before had I seen a tree greater or more beautiful than this one. They instructed me, "Climb it." We ascended, until we came upon a city that I have never seen one more beautiful. It was built with gold and silver bricks. We arrived at the gate of the city and requested admission. It was opened, and we entered into it. We were met by old and young men with one half of their faces the most beautiful to behold, and the other half the ugliest to behold. They (my two companions) said to them, "Go and plunge into that river." A river was flowing across, whose water was milk-white in color. They plunged into it and returned to us. Their ugliness disappeared; and they became most handsome.

8) They took me further up, and let me into a town better and more beautiful than the first one.

I said, "Since the beginning of this night, you have taken me to different places, and I have been seeing amazing things! What is all this that I saw?" They said, "We will now tell you:

1) As for the first man whom you saw his head getting smashed with a boulder: he is a man whom Allāh taught the Qur'ān, but he slept and neglected it during the night, and did not implement it during the day. He turned away from the Qur'ān, and slept through the prescribed prayers. He will continue to be tortured in this way until the Day of Resurrection.

2) As for the man whom you saw with his mouth, nose, and eyes being ripped to the back of his head: he is a liar who leaves his house in the morning to spread lies which are carried from him in all directions. He will continue to be tortured in this way until the Day of Resurrection.

3) As for the naked men and women who were in the pit: they are men and women who indulge in zinā (adultery).

4) As for the man whom you saw swimming in the river and being fed with rocks: he is the one who eats ribā ¹.

5) As for the tall man that you saw in the garden, he is Ibrāhīm (عليه السلام). The children about him are all those children who have died according to fiṭrah ².

(Here, some of the companions interjected, 'O Messenger of Allāh! The children of the disbelievers too?' He (عليه السلام) said, 'The children of the disbelievers as well!')

6) As for the man with extremely ugly appearance who was by the fire, kindling it and running around it: he is Mālik, the Guardian of Jahannam (Hell).

- 1 Eating ribā means to take usury or deal with any prohibited transactions. Unfortunately, many such transactions in our time are given deceiving names like "interest" or "benefit". But there is no interest or benefit in them; and the names do not change their reality of being major sins and pure harm.
- 2 Fiṭrah is the pure and clean nature according to which all people are born before they are influenced by their societies and upbringing.

7) As for the first town, it is the dwelling place of the common believers. The people who were half handsome and half ugly: they are people who mixed good with evil deeds, and Allāh forgave them.”

8) And as for this town, it is the dwelling place of the shuhadā' (martyrs).

They added, “I am Jibrīl, and this is Mikā'il. This is the Garden of 'Adn (Eden); and that over there is your residence. Now raise your head.” I raised my eyes and saw, above me, a castle that resembled a white cloud. They said (again), “That is your dwelling.” I said to them, “May Allāh bless you; allow me to enter my dwelling.” They said, “Not yet! There is a portion of your life which you have not yet completed; when you complete it, you will surely enter your dwelling.” > ¹

Sins Punishable in the Grave

In the following table, we summarize the sins that were specifically mentioned in authentic texts as being punishable in al-Barzakh. In the column of references, “S” refers to the above ḥadīth of Samurah (رضي الله عنه), and “*” refers to the additional ḥadīths appearing later in this chapter.

It is important to note that these texts provide examples of sins that are punished in the grave. However, there could be other punishable sins that we have not been informed about.

1 This is a combined narration of two different reports recorded by al-Bukhārī from Samurah.

Sinful Person	Punishment in al-Barzakh	Ref.
A kāfir .	Being the worst sin, his punishment is the most sever, as detailed in earlier chapters.	Earlier chaps.
One who rejects the Qur'ān after knowing it, and sleeps through the prescribed prayers.	He lies on his back on the ground. A man smashes his head, once and again, with a boulder.	S
A liar who spreads lies which are carried from him in all directions.	His mouth, nose, and eyes are continuously ripped, with a sharp hook, to the back of his head.	S
Men and women who indulge in zinā (adultery).	They are put, naked, into a hole that resembles a baking pit, narrow at the top and wide at the bottom. Underneath the pit is a raging fire; whenever it flares up, they scream and rise with it until they almost fall out of the pit. As it subsided, they return (to the bottom).	S
One who take ribā (usury).	He swims in a river of blood, on whose bank stands a man with a pile of rock. Every time he tries to exit from the river, the man throws a rock into his mouth, causing him to fall back to the center of the river.	S
One who does not clean himself from traces of urine.	This is the most common reason of punishment; but it is not specified what form of punishment he receives.	*

Sinful Person	Punishment in al-Barzakh	Ref.
One whose relatives wail or weep over him (expressing dissatisfaction with Allāh's decree).	He receives punishment (unspecified), or his punishment is increased. This applies to a disbeliever, as well as a believer who had encouraged his relatives to do so.	*
One whose relatives are excessive in praising him.	Allāh appoints two angels who hit him in the neck saying, "Were you like that?"	*
One who spreads namīmah (slander) among the people.	This is one of the great sin punished in al-Barzakh . Its punishment is not specified.	*

CONTAMINATION WITH URINE

Ibn 'Abbās (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

<The most prevalent punishment of the grave is because of urine.> ¹

WAILING OF A DISBELIEVER'S RELATIVES

'Ā'ishah (رضي الله عنها) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

<Indeed Allāh increases the punishment of a disbeliever because of the weeping of some members of his family over him.> ²

1 Recorded by al-Hākim; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ul-Jāmi' no. 3971).

2 Recorded by an-An-Nasā'ī; verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ul-Jāmi' no. 3971).

WAILING OF A DEAD PERSON'S RELATIVES

Any dead person is also liable to the punishment of the grave because of the lamentation over him. He would be excused, however, if he had urged his family during his life not to do so after his death. ‘Abdullāh Bin ‘Umar (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

‘The dead (person) is punished in his grave because of the wailing over him.’¹

EXCESSIVENESS IN PRAISING THE DEAD PERSON

Abū Mūsā (رضي الله عنه) narrated that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

‘Whenever a person dies, and one of his mourners stands up and cries, “O you whom we used to rely on! O you who used to rescue us! ...,” and so on, two angels are appointed to hit him in the neck saying, “Were you truly as they say?”’²

SLANDERING

Ibn ‘Abbās (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) passed by two graves and said:

‘Verily, these two (dead people) are being tortured. Their punishment is for matters that are not important (to many people). But they are very serious indeed. As for the first, he used to walk about spreading slander; and as for the other, he did not cover himself from his urine.’³

SAVIORS FROM THE PUNISHMENT

From the previous chapters, it is apparent that the best protection against punishment in the grave is to carry the true belief in Allāh and avoid the major sins. In this chapter, we additionally present specific things that protect from the punishment of the grave.

Martyrdom on the Battlefield

Al-Miqdām Bin Ma'd Yakrib narrated that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«A shahīd (martyr) is favored by Allāh with seven qualities:

- (a) He is forgiven as soon as his blood gushes forth;
- (b) he is shown his position in Jannah;
- (c) he is adorned with the adornments of Īmān;
- (d) he is married to seventy two wives of al-Ḥūr ul-ʿĪn (fair females with wide lovely eyes);
- (e) he is protected from the torment of the grave, and is saved from the Great Fear (on the Day of Judgement);
- (f) on his head is placed the crown of dignity, each of whose jewels is better than the world and all what is in it;
- (g) and he is allowed to intercede for seventy of his relatives.»¹

¹ Recorded by at-Tirmithī, Ibn Mājah, and Ahmad; verified to be authentic by a Albānī (Ṣaḥīḥ ul-Jāmiʿ no. 5182).

One of the companions of the Prophet (ﷺ) reported that a man said, “O Messenger of Allāh, why are all the believers tested in their graves except a martyr?” He (ﷺ) said:

«The flashing of swords over his head was a sufficient fitnah (test) for him.»¹

Standing Guard in the Way of Allāh

Salmān (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Standing guard (on the battle ground) for one day and night is better than fasting the days and praying the nights of an entire month. And if he (the guard) dies, his (good) deeds that he used to do continue to accumulate for him (until the Day of Judgement); he is provided with his provisions (from Jannah); and he is saved from al-Fattān ².»³

Fuḍālah Bin ‘Ubayd and ‘Uqbah Bin ‘Āmir (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Every dead person’s deeds are sealed (at the time of death), except for the one who stands guard in the way of Allāh: his (good) deeds continue to increase until the Day of Resurrection; and he is protected from the trial of the grave.»⁴

Death Caused by Abdomen Diseases

‘Abdullāh Bin Yasār reported that he was sitting with Sulaymān Bin Şard and Khālid Bin ‘Arfaṭah (رضي الله عنه). They mentioned that a man died of an abdominal disease; and they expressed desire to witness his funeral; one of them said to the other, “Did Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) not say:

«Whoever is killed by a disease in his abdomen will not be punished in the grave?»”

The other one replied, “Yes. You spoke the truth.” ¹

Reciting Sūrat ul-Mulk

‘Abdullāh Bin Mas‘ūd (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Sūrat Tabārak is the protector from the torment of the grave.» ²

Dying on Friday

‘Abdullāh Bin ‘Amr (رضي الله عنه) said that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«For any Muslim who dies on the day or night of Jumu‘ah (Friday), Allāh protects him from the trial of the grave.» ³

CHAPTER 10

COMMUNICATION WITH *AL-BARZAKH*¹

The Dead's Ability to Hear?

Do the dead hear what takes place in this world? This question is not subject to human opinions or speculations. It is a matter of ghayb that is encompassed by Allāh's knowledge, and may only be established through a clear evidence from Allāh's book and His Messenger's (ﷺ) Sunnah.

The true understanding in this regard is that the dead cannot, in general, hear what takes place on the earth. There are, however, exceptions to this general rule that are established in the Book and the Sunnah. We have to accept these exceptional cases and believe in them, without generalizing them beyond their boundaries.

In this chapter, we will establish this understanding by presenting the proper evidence and, in some cases, refuting the wrong evidence used by some people to the contrary.

Comparison with the Deaf

Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿إِنَّكَ لَا تَسْمَعُ الْمَوْتَى وَلَا تَسْمَعُ الصُّمَّ الدُّعَاءَ إِذَا وَلَّوْا مُدْبِرِينَ﴾

النمل ٨٠

1 This chapter draws heavily on "al-Āyāt ul-Bayyināt" by al-Ālūsī and al-Albānī.

«So, verily (O Muḥammad), you cannot make the dead hear you, nor can you make the deaf hear the call while they turn their backs to you.»¹

In this āyah, Allāh (ﷻ) compares the dead disbelievers to the deaf people. This obviously indicates that they share with them the characteristic of being unable to hear. Ibn Jarīr aṭ-Ṭabarī (رحمته) supports this understanding in his Tafsīr (Qur'ānic commentary) by saying:

‘This is a parable meaning, ‘You cannot make these disbelievers understand, because Allāh has sealed their hearing and has taken away their ability to understand the revealed lessons that are recited to them – just as you cannot make the dead understand by giving them hearing, because Allāh has taken away their hearing faculty.’

He is further saying, ‘You cannot make the deaf hear after they turn their backs to you, because they have been deprived of the hearing faculty. Similarly, for those whom Allāh has deprived of the ability to hear and understand the āyāt of His Book, you cannot help them in hearing and understanding.’ ”²

Aṭ-Ṭabarī then reported that Qatādah (رحمته) said:

“Allāh gives this parable for a kāfir (disbeliever). Just as the dead cannot hear the calls, so the kāfirs cannot hear. Thus He tells, ‘If a deaf person turns his back to you and you call him, he would not hear you. Similarly, a kāfir would not hear, nor would he benefit from what he hears.’ ”³

1 An-Naml 27:80 and ar-Rūm 30:52.

2 Tafsīr aṭ-Ṭabarī 21:36.

3 Al-Albānī verifies that this report has an authentic isnād (chain of narrators) (al-Āyāt ul-Bayyināt p. 30 of the introduction).

This is also the understanding of ‘Ā’ishah (ؓ), as is documented in the books of *Sunnah*¹. It is also the understanding of ‘Umar and others among the ṣaḥābah.

Those Who Are Worshipped Beside Allāh

Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿ذَٰلِكُمُ اللَّهُ رَبُّكُمْ لَهُ الْمُلْكُ ۚ وَالَّذِينَ تَدْعُونَ مِن دُونِهِ مَا يَمْلِكُونَ
مِن قِطْمِيرٍ ۚ إِن تَدْعُوهُمْ لَا يَسْمَعُوا دُعَاءَكُمْ وَلَوْ سَمِعُوا مَا اسْتَجَابُوا
لَكُمْ ۚ وَيَوْمَ الْقِيَامَةِ يَكْفُرُونَ بَشِرِكِكُمْ ۖ وَلَا يُنَبِّئُكَ مِثْلُ خَبِيرٍ ۚ﴾

فاطر ١٣-١٤

«Such is Allāh your lord; to Him belongs the dominion. And those, whom you invoke instead of Him, own not even a qīṭmūr (date pit’s covering membrane). If you call upon them, they do not hear your call; and were they to hear, they could not grant your requests. And on the Day of Resurrection, they will disown your taking them as partners. And none can inform you better than one who is well acquainted with things.»²

The disbelievers used to worship a number of people who were righteous and noble during their lifetimes. After their death, Satan inspired their followers to commemorate them with statues. These statues eventually turned into idols that were worshipped instead of Allāh (ﷻ).

The above āyah clearly denies that those whom the disbelievers invoked instead of Allāh could hear them. The āyah does not refer to the idols themselves, but to the persons whom they were supposed to represent. This clear from the statement, «On the Day of Resurrection, they will disown your taking them as partners.» It is not the idols, which are irrational objects, that will be resurrected, but rather the actual people that they represented. There are many āyāt in the Qur'ān indicating that when Allāh resurrects the people, those who had been worshiped will turn against those who had worshiped them. However, there is nothing to indicate that the irrational objects will be resurrected as well.

1 Check al-Āyāt ul-Bayyināt pp. 7, 10, 14, etc.

2 Fāṭir 35:13-14.

Therefore, this āyah indicates that the righteous people, as well as those who are of lesser virtue, cannot hear after their death.

The Ditch of Badr

THE COMBINED REPORT

Ibn 'Umar, Abū Ṭalḥah, and Anas (رضي الله عنه) reported that, after the battle of Badr, the Prophet (ﷺ) commanded his followers to cast twenty four of the most disdainful among the dead of the Quraysh into a very filthy ditch in Badr. Then, as was his practice after victory, he spent three nights in the neighborhood of the battleground. On the third day, he had his animal prepared for departure, and then went and stood with his companions at the verge of the ditch. He called out the dead men with their names and the names of their parent saying:

«O such and such, son of such and such! O such and such, son of such and such! ... Don't you wish that you had obeyed Allāh and His Messenger? Indeed, we have found our Lord's promises to us true; have you found you Lord's promises true?»

Whereupon 'Umar (رضي الله عنه) (and others) exclaimed, "Are you addressing them after having been dead for three nights, and when these bodies have no souls in them? Can they hear? Allāh (ﷻ) says:

(إِنَّكَ لَا تَسْمَعُ الْمَوْتَىٰ)

«Verily, you cannot make the dead hear you.»

He (ﷺ) replied:

«By Him in whose hand is Muḥammad's soul, They can hear me NOW; and you cannot hear what I am saying better than they can! But they cannot respond.»¹

THE UNDERSTANDING OF THE SALAF

When this incident was mentioned to 'Ā'ishah (رضي الله عنها), she said, "The Prophet (ﷺ) only meant that they now realized that what he told them was the truth." Then she recited the āyah:

﴿إِنَّكَ لَا تَسْمَعُ الْمَوْتَىٰ وَلَا تَسْمَعُ الْأَدْعَاءَ إِذَا وَلَّوْا مُدْبِرِينَ ۚ﴾

«So, verily you cannot make the dead hear you, nor can you make the deaf hear the call while they turn their backs to you.»²

Commenting on the above ḥadīth, Qatādah (رضي الله عنه) said:

"Allāh (ﷻ) gave them life in order to hear the Prophet's (ﷺ) words, as a reproach and scorn, and to make them feel the remorse and regret for what they did."³

Ibn 'Aṭīyyah⁴ said:

"It appears that the incident of Badr constitutes a miracle for Muḥammad (ﷺ), whereupon Allāh (ﷻ)

4 He is a knowledgeable scholar of Ḥadīth and Islāmic legislation from Grenada, al-Andalus (Spain). He has a well-known book of tafsīr called "Al-Muḥarrar ul-Wajīz fī Tafsīr il-Kitāb il-'Azīz". He died on 542 H.

give them back the perception to be able to hear him. Had Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) not told us of this, we would have interpreted his addressing them to carry the meaning of reproach for the living disbelievers, as well as a reassurance for the hearts of the believers.”¹

Ibn Hajar al-‘Aṣqalānī (رحمته الله) said:

“Ibn ut-Tīn said, ‘There is no conflict between of Ibn ‘Umar’s ḥadīth (of the Ditch) and the āyah. There is no doubt that the dead cannot hear. But Allāh may enable that which does not normally hear to hear ...’”²

THE PROPHET’S APPROVAL

It is important to point out that the Prophet (ﷺ) approved of the understanding of ‘Umar and others among the ṣaḥābah that the dead cannot hear. We should assume that these companions have previously gained this understanding from the Prophet (ﷺ) – otherwise, they would not have hastened to object to his action of addressing the dead. And even if we assume that they were hasty in objecting without knowledge, it would then be the Prophet’s (ﷺ) obligation to clarify to them their misconception. However, he did not do any of that, but only indicated that those specific dead people were able to hear him at that specific time. Thus it is obvious that he (ﷺ) approved of their general understanding in regard to this issue.

And ‘Ā’ishah’s (رضي الله عنها) above statement (p. 73) shows that she had a similar understanding to that of ‘Umar and the other companions.

WRONG CONCLUSION

This is important to emphasize, especially when we realize that some scholars misinterpret this incident of the Ditch. They use the Prophet’s (ﷺ) statement, ‘You cannot hear me better than they can,’ as a proof that the dead always hear what goes on around them.

1 Al-Qurṭubī’s Tafsīr 13:232.

2 Fath ul-Bārī 3:182.

They often neglect the fact that he (ﷺ) has approved of their understanding and did not object to it. Thus, they turn the exceptional case, which was a miracle granted to the Prophet (ﷺ) in that situation, into a general case conflicting with the clear texts of the Qur'ān!

A SUNNAH OF THE PROPHETS

It is interesting to indicate that addressing the disbeliever after they have been destroyed by Allāh (ﷻ) is an old practice of the prophets. For instance, Allāh (ﷻ) says in regard to the people of Ṣāliḥ:

﴿فَأَخَذَتْهُمْ الرِّجْفَةُ فَأَصْبَحُوا فِي دَارِهِمْ جِثِيمِينَ ۝ فَتَوَلَّى عَنْهُمْ وَقَالَ يَلْقَوْمٍ لَقَدْ أَبْلَغْتُكُمْ رَسُولَهُ رَبِّي وَنَصَحْتُ لَكُمْ وَلَكِنْ لَا تُحِبُّونَ النَّصِيحِينَ ۝﴾ الأعراف ٧٨-٧٩

«So the earthquake seized them, and they became in their homes (corpses) fallen prone. He (Ṣāliḥ) turned away from them and said, “O my people! I have certainly conveyed to you the message of my Lord and advised you; but you do not like advisers.»¹

Ibn Kathīr commented on this by saying:

“This is a rebuke from Ṣāliḥ (عليه السلام) to his people after Allāh had destroyed them because of their disobeying him, rebelling against Allāh, rejecting the truth, and turning away from the guidance. Ṣāliḥ said this to them, after their destruction, rebuking and reprimanding them; and they heard him, as has been reported in the two Ṣaḥīḥs (Al-Bukhārī and Muslim) ...”

He then cited the ḥadīth of the Ditch. Note that the Qur'ānic text does not express that they heard Ṣāliḥ. But Ibn Kathīr assumed this based on the similar situation of the Ditch.

The Roaming Angels

Ibn Mas'ūd (رضي الله عنه) reported that the Prophet (ﷺ):

«Allāh has angels that roam over the earth, delivering to me the salām from my Ummah.»¹

Similar ḥadīths have been cited earlier (p. 50). They clearly indicate that the Prophet (ﷺ) cannot independently hear the salām of the Muslims, but needs angels to deliver it to him. This implies that he cannot hear other things as well. Also, the text of this ḥadīth is general and makes no distinction based on distance.

Thus, if Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) cannot hear after his death what goes on the earth, this should apply more appropriately to those who are lesser than him.

Hearing the Footsteps of His Companions

An important evidence used by those who believe that the dead hear what goes on the earth is the Prophet's (ﷺ) description in the long ḥadīth of al-Barā' Bin 'Āzib (fully cited in Chapter 2):

«He hears the thumping of his companions' shoes as they walk away from his grave.»

However, this clearly applies to the time when the dead person is put into his grave and the angels come to question him. It cannot be generalized to other cases. This is the only way to reconcile between the general meaning of the above āyah (as understood by 'Umar, 'Ā'ishah, and other companions) and this ḥadīth.

1 Recorded by Abū Dāwūd and others. Verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (al-Āyāt ul-Bayyināt p. 43).

CHAPTER 11

THINGS THAT BENEFIT THE DEAD

Introduction

This worldly life is a life of tests and trials. A person's performance in it determines his fate in the hereafter. His actions are recorded, and are the basis for his judgement in the next life.

Allāh (ﷻ) informs us that a disbeliever's punishment is a result of his actions:

﴿ذَٰلِكَ بِمَا قَدَّمْتَ أَيْدِيكُمْ وَأَنَّ اللَّهَ لَيْسَ بِظَلَّامٍ لِّلْعَبِيدِ﴾

آل عمران ١٨٢

«This (punishment) is because of that which your hands have previously done. Certainly, Allāh is never unjust to His slaves.»¹

Allāh (ﷻ) also informs us that a believer's rewards result from his actions:

﴿وَتِلْكَ الْجَنَّةُ الَّتِي أُورِثْتُمُوهَا بِمَا كُنْتُمْ تَعْمَلُونَ﴾ الزخرف ٧٢

«This is Jannah which you have been made to inherit because of the deeds that you used to do.»²

Thus, the deeds that a person can do in this life to benefit him on the Day of judgement end by his death. Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿وَلَيْسَتِ التَّوْبَةُ لِلَّذِينَ يَعْمَلُونَ السَّيِّئَاتِ حَتَّىٰ إِذَا حَضَرَ أَحَدَهُمْ

1 Āl 'Imrān 3:182, al-Anfāl 8:51, and al-Hajj 22:10.

2 Az-Zukhruf 43:72.

أَلَمَوْتُ قَالَ إِنِّي تُبْتُ أَلَّنَّ وَلَا الَّذِينَ يَمُوتُونَ وَهُمْ كَفَّارٌ ﴿١٨﴾

النساء ١٨

«And of no effect is the repentance of those who continue to do evil deeds until death faces one of them and he says, “Now I repent;” nor of those who die while they are disbelievers.»¹

And Ibn ‘Umar (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Allāh accepts a person’s repentance as long as he does not reach the gurgling stage (when his soul departs).»²

Therefore, one cannot expect any changes in his records after departing from this world.

Furthermore, one cannot expect other people to do for him, after his death, good deeds that will benefit him in the hereafter. Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿وَأَنْ لَّيْسَ لِلْإِنْسَانِ إِلَّا مَا سَعَىٰ﴾ النجم ٣٩

«And that the human being can have nothing but what he has earned (good or bad).»³

Commenting on this āyah, Ibn Kathīr (رحمته الله) said:

“Imām ash-Shāfi‘ī concluded from this āyah that reciting Qur’ān does not benefit the dead, because it is not from their doing and earning. For this reason, Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) did not recommend it to his Ummah, encourage them to do it, or guide them to it with a text or a hint. Nor was such a thing reported from any of the ṣaḥābah (رضي الله عنهم). Had this been any good, they would have preceded us in doing it. Matters of worship must be limited to the texts, and are not liable to modifications based on analogies and opinions.”¹

It is in general true that one cannot benefit from other people's deeds after his death. But this has important exceptions detailed in this chapter.

List of Beneficial Acts

The following list summarizes the beneficial acts, covered in this chapter, that benefit a person after his death.

#	Beneficial Act
1	Janāzah prayer for the deceased
2	Deeds of renewed benefit
3	Charitable deeds from a child
4	Fulfilling the deceased's vows
5	Payment of the deceased's debts
6	Supplications of the Muslims
7	Guarding in Allāh's way
8	Reviving the Sunnah

Janāzah Prayer

When the Muslims pray janāzah for their deceased brother, they are granted intercession for him. The more the number of Muslims who join in the prayer, the more beneficial it is for the deceased.

This means that Allāh takes their testimony and supplication regarding the deceased's apparent actions as a sufficient reason for forgiveness. Since those Muslims who associated with him did not find any major problem to prevent them from supplicating for him, Allāh the most generous accepts that and agrees to forgive many of his hidden sins that they did not know. Anas and 'Ā'ishah (رضي الله عنهما) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Whenever a (Muslim) person dies, and a group of Muslims numbering one hundred pray janāzah for him, all interceding on his behalf, their intercession is granted (by Allāh), and he is forgiven.»¹

Ibn 'Abbās (رضي الله عنهما) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Whenever a Muslim man dies, and forty men stand for his janāzah prayer, all of them not joining anything with Allāh in worship, Allāh grants them intercession for him.»²

Maymūnah (رضي الله عنها) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Whenever a (Muslim) person dies, and a group of (Muslim) people pray janāzah for him, they are granted intercession for him.»³

Mālik Bin Hubayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Whenever a Muslim dies, and three lines of Muslims pray janāzah for him, he is granted forgiveness.»⁴

Shams ul-Ḥaqq Ābādī said in his commentary on Sunan Abī Dāwūd:

“These ḥadīths indicate that it is recommended to gather a large number of people for the janāzah prayer. It should be attempted to reach these numbers (mentioned in the ḥadīths), because that could lead to success (in the forgiveness of the deceased). This has been restricted by two conditions:

- 1) They should attempt to intercede for him, which means that they should be sincere in supplication and in seeking forgiveness for him.
- 2) They should all be Muslims, none among them joining partners with Allāh, as in the earlier ḥadīth of Ibn ‘Abbās.”¹

Deeds of Renewed Benefit

Any good deed that a Muslim starts during his lifetime, and that is of renewed benefit and ongoing use for the Muslims, will continue to benefit him and augment his record of good deeds, even after his departure – as long as its benefits continue to reach others. Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿وَنَكْتُبُ مَا قَدَّمُوا وَآثَرَهُمْ﴾ يس ١٢

«We record that (deeds) which they have put forward, and their traces (that which they have left behind).»² sources), and did not declare direct hearing of this report (Aḥkām ul-Janā'iz 128). Yet, the Prophet’s (ﷺ) practice of forming three lines for janāzah prayer provides a further supporting evidence for this ḥadīth.

1 ‘Awn ul-Ma‘būd 8:452.

2 Yā-Sīn 36:12.

Abū Hurayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«When a human being dies, all of his deeds are terminated except for three types: an ongoing ṣadaqah, a knowledge (of Islām) from which others benefit, and a righteous child who makes Du'ā' for him.»¹

Abū Qatādah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«The best that a man can leave behind after his death are three things: a righteous child who makes Du'ā' for him, an ongoing ṣadaqah whose rewards continue to reach him, and a knowledge that continues to be implemented after him.»²

Abū Qatādah (رضي الله عنه) also reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Among the good deeds that continue to benefit a believer after death are: a knowledge that he taught and disseminated, a righteous child who lived after him, a Qur'ān book that he left as inheritance, a masjid (mosque) that he built, a house that he built for the wayfarers, a stream that he ran, or a charity that he gave from his wealth during his healthy lifetime so that it would reach him (in rewards) after death.»³

Commenting on this, al-Munthirī (رحمته الله) said:

“Some scholars say that the deeds of a human being end with his death. However, since he had caused these things (which are mentioned in the above ḥadīths), such as the earning of a child, disseminating the knowledge among those who take it from him, compiling a book that remains after him, or establishing a ṣadaqah, the rewards of these things continue to reach him as long as they continue to exist.”¹

The reason that one continues to receive rewards for these deeds, even though they are done by other people, is that he had initiated them during his life or contributed to them to a certain degree, whether little or large. Since Allāh does not neglect an atom’s weight of deeds, He records these contribution for a person even after his death. Abū al-Wafā’ Bin ‘Aqīl said:

“The best explanation for this in my view is that a human being, by his efforts and good conduct, had earned friends, produced children, married spouses, done good, and was amiable to the people. Because of this, they invoke mercy for him and do good on his behalf. All of this is then a result of his own earning.”²

And Rashīd Ridā (رحمہ اللہ) said:

“Among the deeds that benefit a person, even though they are done by others, are those that count like his own because he caused them, such as his children’s supplication for him, or their performing ḥajj, giving ṣadaqah, or fasting on his behalf – all of which having been established with authentic ḥadīths.”³

Charitable Deeds from a Child

ONE'S CHILD IS FROM HIS EARNING

The above ḥadīths indicate that a righteous child benefits his deceased parents with duʿāʾ. It is further demonstrated here that he can benefit them by spending ṣadaqah, as well as doing other charitable deeds, on their behalf.

ʿĀʾishah (رضي الله عنها) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Indeed, the best that one eats is that which he earns.
And his child is from his earning.»¹

The reason for this is that a parent benefits himself by rearing his child according to the teachings of Islām, and exerting a consistent effort to raise him as a righteous person. As the child grows into adulthood and does righteous deeds, his parents deserve a merit in that they helped him accomplish that; and his good actions are therefore, at least in part, from his parents' earning.

ṢADAQAH FROM A CHILD

ʿĀʾishah (رضي الله عنها) reported that a man asked Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ), "My mother had a sudden death, and did not have chance to bequeath anything. Had she been able to do, I think that she would have given ṣadaqah. Would she or I get any rewards if I give ṣadaqah on her behalf?" He (ﷺ) replied, «Yes! So give ṣadaqah on her behalf.»²

Ibn ʿAbbās (رضي الله عنه) reported that Saʿd Bin ʿUbadah's mother died during his absence on a trip. He came to the Prophet (ﷺ) and asked him, "O Allāh's Messenger! My mother has passed away during my absence. Would it be of benefit to her if I give ṣadaqah on her behalf?" He (ﷺ) replied, «Yes!» He said, "Be my witness then that I give my fruitful garden as ṣadaqah on her behalf."³

1 Recorded by Aḥmad, Abū Dāwūd, and others. Verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Aḥkām ul-Janāʾiz 217).

2 Al-Bukhārī, Muslim, and others.

3 Al-Bukhārī, Aḥmad, and others.

Abū Hurayrah (رضي الله عنه) reported that a man asked the Prophet (ﷺ), “My father has died, leaving behind a wealth; but he did not bequeath anything. Would it help him if I give ṣadaqah on his behalf?” He (ﷺ) replied, «Yes!»¹

‘Abdullāh Bin ‘Amr (رضي الله عنه) reported that al-‘Āṣ Bin Wā’il as-Sahmī (his grandfather) bequeathed that one hundred slaves be freed on his behalf. His son Hishām freed fifty; and ‘Amr wanted to free the other fifty, but decided to ask Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) first. He came to the Prophet (ﷺ) and said, “O Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ)! My father has bequeathed that one hundred slaves be freed on his behalf. Hishām has freed fifty, and fifty are left. Should I free them for him?” He replied:

«Had he been a Muslim, your freeing slaves, giving ṣadaqah, or performing hajj on his behalf would all have reached (in rewards) and benefited him.»²

Commenting on these ḥadīths, ash-Shawkānī said:

“This indicates that the rewards for a ṣadaqah from a child reach the parents after their death – even if they had not bequeathed it. These ḥadīths restrict the general meaning of Allāh’s (ﷻ) saying:

﴿وَأَنْ لَّيْسَ لِلْإِنْسَانِ إِلَّا مَا سَعَى﴾ النجم ٣٩

«And that the human being can have nothing but what he has earned.»³

But there is no indication in these ḥadīths that the ṣadaqah, except from one’s own child, helps. Since it is established that a person’s child is his own earning, it is not possible to claim that the meaning (of these ḥadīths) needs to be restricted.

1 Muslim, Aḥmad, and others.

2 Recorded by Aḥmad, Abū Dāwūd, and al-Bayhaqī. Verified to be ḥasan by al-Albānī (Aḥkām ul-Janā’iz 218).

3 An-Najm 53:39.

As for the ṣadaqah from other than one's child, it is apparent from general Qur'ānic texts that it does not help the deceased. This should then be maintained unless an additional evidence can be brought to restrict it.”¹

CHARITABLE DEEDS FROM A NON-CHILD

Some scholars, such as an-Nawawī, hold the opinion that all charitable deeds on behalf of a deceased person benefit him, whether done by his children or other people. This is refuted by ash-Shawkānī's above strong argument. Similarly, al-Albānī says in this regard:

“Some scholars have treated a non-child as a child (in this matter). This analogy is invalid for various reasons:

1. It conflicts with general Qur'ānic texts that make a person's good deeds a condition for entering Jannah. There is no doubt that a parent benefits himself by raising his child and nurturing him. Thus, unlike other people, he deserves a reward for this.
2. The difference between the two cases inhibits such an analogy. As in 'Ā'ishah's ḥadīth, Allāh has made a child part of his parents' earnings – but not of other people's earnings. Al-'Izz Bin 'Abd us-Salām said:

‘If one does an act of obedience and dedicates its reward to a living or dead person, the reward will not reach that person. And if he starts an act of worship intending it on behalf of a dead person, it would not be as intended – except for things excluded in Islām such as ṣadaqah, fasting, and hajj.’¹

3. Had this analogy been possible, it would have implied that it is recommended to dedicate rewards to the dead. In such a case, the Salaf would have done this, because they surely used to have more concern than us about doing good. But they did not do it. Ibn Taymiyyah said:

‘It was not the practice of the Salaf, when they performed a voluntary prayer, fasting, hajj, or Qur’ānic recitation, to dedicate the rewards of that to the dead Muslims. Thus, one should not abandon the way of the Salaf, because it is better and more complete.’² ”³

CLAIMS FOR IJMĀ'

It should be noted that there are claims for ijmā' (consensus) that a dead person benefits from the good deeds, including Qur’ānic recitation, done on his behalf by other people⁴. Whereas these claims have been demonstrated to be invalid in the above discussion, they further fall under the following two consideration:

² Al-Ikhtiyārāt ul-‘Ilmiyyah 54. Note that Ibn Taymiyyah has another opinion contradicting this one, which was advocated by his student Ibn ul-Qayyim in ar-Rūḥ. That opinion conflicts with Ibn Taymiyyah’s known position of rejecting qiyās (analogy) in matters of worship; and it was refuted in a strong and sound manner by Muḥammad Rashīd Riḍā in Tafsīr ul-Manār 8:254-270. Many people of bid‘ah have used this second opinion of Ibn Taymiyyah as an evidence against the followers of Sunnah. By doing this, they have neglected a very important fact, which is that the people of Sunnah do not imitate any one specific man without evidence; and they do not blindly imitate any particular scholar, regardless of how much love they hold for him (Aḥkām ul-Janā‘iz 221-222).

³ Summarized from Aḥkām ul-Janā‘iz 220-222.

⁴ Such as an-Nawawī, Ibn Qudāmāh (in al-Mughnī 2:569), and others.

- “1. It has been demonstrated by staunch scholars, such as Ibn Ḥazm (in Uṣūl ul-Aḥkām), ash-Shawkānī (in Irshād ul-Fuḥūl), and ‘Abd ul-Wahhāb Khallāf (in Uṣūl ul-Fiqh), that it is not possible to justify ijmā’ for other than the most obvious matters in Islām. Imām Aḥmad has indicated this in his famous refutation against those who claim ijmā’.
2. I have investigated many of the cases for which there have been claims of ijmā’, and found that there is an obvious difference of opinion concerning them. I even found (in some cases) that the opinion of the majority of scholars is contrary to the claimed ijmā’!”¹

A DANGEROUS BELIEF

The danger of holding a wrong belief in regard to this issue has been clarified and emphasized by al-Albānī:

“We do not doubt this wrong belief’s evil effects upon one who adopts it. He would rely upon others for acquiring rewards and high ranks (in the hereafter), because he knows that the Muslims dedicate hundreds of good deeds everyday to all of the living and dead Muslims, and he is one of them; that would then relieve him from having to work hard when others are striving on his behalf! ...

A more dangerous saying is that it is permissible to perform ḥajj on behalf of others, even if there is no valid excuse preventing them from performing it by themselves. This causes many of the wealthy people to drop ḥajj or other obligations, giving themselves the excuse, ‘They will perform ḥajj on my behalf after my death!’ ...

1 Al-Albānī in Aḥkām ul-Janā’iz 219.

There are many other similar opinions that clearly have evil effects on the (Muslim) societies. It is imperative for the scholars who wish to reform (the societies) to reject such opinions, because they conflict with the texts, as well as the spirit of the Sharī'ah. ...

As for the person who rejects the opinions described above, it is inconceivable that he would ever rely on other people in doing deeds and acquiring rewards. He realizes that only his own deeds can save him, and he is rewarded in accordance with what he himself earns. It is then incumbent that he strives to the utmost to leave behind him good traces which will result in good rewards for him even in the loneliness of his grave – instead of those imaginary good deeds.”¹

FASTING THE VOWED DAYS

‘Ā’ishah (رضي الله عنها) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

‘Whoever dies while he has a fasting to fulfill (as a vow), his *walī*² should fast for him.’³

Ibn ‘Abbās (رضي الله عنه) reported that a woman was travelling in the sea, and she vowed that if Allāh saved her she would fast for one month. Allāh saved her, but she died before fulfilling her vow. Her daughter came to the Prophet (ﷺ) and mentioned this to him. He asked, ‘Had she owed money as debt, wouldn’t you have paid it on her behalf?’ She replied, “Yes.” He said:

1 Aḥkām ul-Janā'iz 222-223.

2 Next of kin or guardian.

3 Al-Bukhārī, Muslim, and others.

«Allāh's debt is more worthy of being fulfilled. So fulfill (the vow) for your mother.»¹

Sa'd Bin 'Ubādah reported that he told Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ), "My mother has died; and she had an unfulfilled vow." He instructed him:

«Fulfill it for her.»²

These ḥadīths clearly indicate that it is recommended for a deceased's walī to fulfill his vows for fasting.

FASTING THE MISSED DAYS OF RAMADĀN

Some scholars recommended, in addition to this, fasting the days of Ramaḍān that the deceased had missed. However, the correct position in this regard is expressed by Imām Aḥmad (رحمته الله):

"One may not fast for a dead person except in the case of a vow."³

This position is confirmed by the understanding of two of the ṣaḥābah: 'Ā'ishah (رضي الله عنها) and Ibn 'Abbās (رضي الله عنه).

'Amrah reported that her mother died without making up her missed days of Ramaḍān. She asked 'Ā'ishah (رضي الله عنها), "Should I make that up on her behalf?" She replied:

"No! Rather, give ṣadaqah to the needy in the amount of a half *ṣā'*⁴ (of grains or food) for every missed day."⁵

1 Al-Bukhārī, Muslim, and others.

2 Al-Bukhārī, Muslim, and others.

3 Al-Masā'il 96 by Abū Dāwūd.

4 A ṣā' is a measure approximately equal to four scoops, with the hands cupped together, of an average man.

5 Recorded by aṭ-Ṭaḥāwī and Ibn Ḥazm. Verified to be authentic by al-Albānī (Aḥkām ul-Janā'iz 215).

Saʿīd Bin Jubayr (رضي الله عنه) reported that Ibn ʿAbbās (رضي الله عنه) said:

“If a man gets sick in Ramaḍān and then dies without fasting, food should be given on his behalf – without a need to make up for the fasting. But if he had made a vow (to fast), his walī should fast for him.” ¹

Commenting on this, al-Albānī says:

“This understanding is adopted by the Mother of the Believers, as well as Ibn ʿAbbās, the great scholar of the Ummah, and is further held by the Imām of Sunnah, Aḥmad Bin Ḥanbal. It is the most moderate and appropriate opinion in this regard; and it fulfills all of the relevant ḥadīths, without rejecting any of them, especially the first, which the Mother of the Believers (رضي الله عنها) did not find applicable to the fasting of Ramaḍān. She is the reporter of the ḥadīth, and it is established that a narrator of a ḥadīth is more knowledgeable about the meaning of what he reports, especially when his understanding agrees with the rules and foundations of the Sharīʿah ², as is the case here.” ³

And Ibn ul-Qayyim (رضي الله عنه) comments on ʿĀʾishah’s above ḥadīth by saying:

“One group (of scholars) generalizes this, and says that both the vowed and missed obligatory fasting should be made up for the deceased. Another group rejects this and says that no fasting may be made up for him. A third group is more specific in saying that only the vowed fasting, but not the obligatory fasting, should be fasted on his behalf. This is the opinion of Ibn ‘Abbās and his followers, and is the correct opinion.

Just as it is not possible for one to pray on behalf of another, or embrace Islām on his behalf, the same is true about fasting. As for a vow, it represents a committed obligation similar to a debt. Thus, the walī’s execution is acceptable, as in the case of the debt. This is the pure understanding (of this issue).

By the same token, it is not possible to perform hajj (pilgrimage) or zakāh (obligatory charity) on behalf of the deceased unless he had an acceptable excuse in delaying that. This is similar to a walī’s feeding the needy on behalf of the one who broke his fast in Ramaḍān with a valid excuse. But as for the one who neglected his obligations without a valid excuse, it would not help him that others perform his neglected obligations, because he was the one required to perform them as a test for him – not the walī. Thus, no one may repent on behalf of someone else, nor accept Islām, nor perform the prayers or other obligations that he neglected until death.”¹

Payment of the Deceased’s Debts

The deceased’s debts should be paid off immediately after his death. The walī should use whatever wealth the deceased had left behind. If that is exhausted, he should seek the help of relatives and friends of the deceased who are capable of helping in paying off the rest of the debt. There is a number of ḥadīths in this regard that we have included in Part 3 of this series. We mention one of them here for reference.

Sa’d Bin al-Aṭwal (رضي الله عنه) reported that his brother died, leaving behind three hundred dirhams and children. He wanted to spend the money on his brother’s children, but the Prophet (ﷺ) told him:

«Your brother is a captive because of his debt. Go pay it off for him.»¹

The Muslims' Supplications

A Muslim's du'ā for a dead Muslim tremendously benefits both of them. When it is done correctly, truthfully, and sincerely, it reflects a high level of brotherhood and concern; and it eliminates the factor of showoff which can potentially destroy the good deeds. Allāh (ﷻ) says:

﴿وَالَّذِينَ جَاءُوا مِن بَعْدِهِمْ يَقُولُونَ رَبَّنَا اغْفِرْ لَنَا وَلِإِخْوَانِنَا الَّذِينَ سَبَقُونَا بِالْإِيمَانِ﴾ الحشر ١٠

«And those who came (into the faith) after them say: "Our Lord! Forgive us and our brothers who preceded us in Īmān." »²

‘Ubādah (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«Whoever seeks forgiveness for the believing men and women, Allāh records for him a good deed for every believing man and woman.»³

Abū ad-Dardā' (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) said:

«A Muslim's supplication for his brother in his absence is acceptable. An angel is appointed to stand by his head; every time he invokes something good for his brother, the appointed angels says, “Āmīn ¹; and the same be given to you.”²

Guarding in Allāh’s Way

As has been previously demonstrated (p. 66) Standing guard in the way of Allāh (ﷺ) benefits a person after his death. Fuḍālah Bin ‘Ubayd and ‘Uqbah Bin ‘Āmir (رضي الله عنه) reported that Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) said:

‘The deeds of a dead person are sealed (at the time of death), except for the one who stands guard in the way of Allāh: his (good) deeds continue to increase until the Day of Resurrection, and he is protected from the trial of the grave.’³

Reviving the Sunnah

Calling to a forgotten Sunnah or fighting an established bid‘ah are among the most important charitable deeds that a person can do during his lifetime. They help revive Allāh’s Dīn and enable other people to follow it clean and pure, as it was revealed to Muḥammad (ﷺ).

Jarīr Bin ‘Abdillāh (رضي الله عنه) reported that they (the companions) were with Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) in the middle of the day when a group of people arrived (from outside al-Madīnah) to see him. They were barefoot, (almost) naked, wearing only woolen lined cloth pieces or cloaks, armed with swords, wearing no izārs ⁴ or anything else beside that. Most or all of them were from (the tribe of) Muḍar. The face of Allāh’s Messenger (ﷺ) changed (reflecting sadness) when he noticed their extreme poverty. He went in (to his house), then came out. He commanded Bilāl to give athān (prayer announcement), prayed zuhr

1 This means, “O my Lord! Answer me!”

2 Muslim and others.

(midday prayer), then mounted a small minbar (steps). He gave a khutbah (speech) in which he praised and thanked Allāh, and then said:

«After this, (I say that) Allāh has revealed in His book:

﴿يَا أَيُّهَا النَّاسُ اتَّقُوا رَبَّكُمُ الَّذِي خَلَقَكُمْ مِنْ نَفْسٍ وَاحِدَةٍ وَخَلَقَ مِنْهَا زَوْجَهَا وَبَثَّ مِنْهُمَا رِجَالًا كَثِيرًا وَنِسَاءً ۚ وَاتَّقُوا اللَّهَ الَّذِي تَسَاءَلُونَ بِهِ وَالْأَرْحَامَ ۚ إِنَّ اللَّهَ كَانَ عَلَيْكُمْ رَقِيبًا ۝﴾ النساء ١

«O people! Revere your Lord who has created you from one soul, and created from it its mate, and from these two spread forth multitudes of men and women; and fear Allāh through whom you demand [your mutual rights], and [revere the ties of] the wombs. Indeed, Allāh is ever-watchful over you.»¹

And He (ﷻ) says:

﴿يَا أَيُّهَا الَّذِينَ ءَامَنُوا اتَّقُوا اللَّهَ وَلْتَنْظُرْ نَفْسٌ مَّا قَدَّمَتْ لِغَدٍ وَاتَّقُوا اللَّهَ ۚ إِنَّ اللَّهَ خَبِيرٌ بِمَا تَعْمَلُونَ ۝ وَلَا تَكُونُوا كَالَّذِينَ نَسُوا اللَّهَ فَأَنْسَاهُمْ أَنْفُسَهُمْ ۚ أُولَٰئِكَ هُمُ الْفَاسِقُونَ ۝ لَا يَسْتَوِي أَصْحَابُ النَّارِ وَأَصْحَابُ الْجَنَّةِ ۚ أَصْحَابُ الْجَنَّةِ هُمُ الْفَائِزُونَ ۝﴾ الحشر ١٨-٢٠

«O you who believe! Revere Allāh, and let every person look to what he has sent forth for the morrow; and revere Allāh. Allāh is well Aware of what you do! And be not like those who forgot (disobeyed) Allāh, and He caused them to forget themselves. Those are the disobedient. Not equal are the dwellers of the Fire and the dwellers of Jannah.

It is the dwellers of Jannah that will be successful.»¹

Spend (in Allāh's way) before you are prevented from spending. Let a man spend of his dīnārs, dirhams, clothes, measure of wheat, barley, or dates.»

Until he (ﷺ) said:

«Do not belittle any amount of ṣadaqah (charity).
Safeguard yourselves from the Fire, even with half a date.»

Observing the people's slow response, the Prophet's (ﷺ) face showed signs of anger. But then, one man from the Anṣār came with a parcel full (of money) of silver and gold, which he could hardly hold in his palm. He handed it to Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ), while he was still on the minbar, and said, "O Allāh's Messenger! Take this in Allāh's way." He (ﷺ) took it. Abū Bakr (رضي الله عنه) then stood and gave something. Then 'Umar (رضي الله عنه) gave something. Then the rest of the Muhājirūn and Anṣār gave. Thus people followed each other in giving charity: This would give a dīnār, this a dirham, this such, and this such – until there were two piles of food and clothes; and the face of Allāh's Messenger (ﷺ) lighted up with a reddish-golden color. So he said:

«He who initiates in Islām a good way gets his reward for it, as well as rewards similar to those who follow him into it, without reducing any of their rewards. And he who initiates in Islām an evil way gets his burden for it, as well as burdens similar to those who follow him into it, without reducing any of their burdens.»

He (ﷺ) then recited:

1 Al-Hashr 59:18-20.

﴿وَنُكَتِبُ مَا قَدَّمُوا وَآثَرَهُمْ وَكُلَّ شَيْءٍ أَحْصَيْنَاهُ﴾

فِي إِمَامٍ مُبِينٍ ﴿١٢﴾

«We record that which they have done, as well as their traces – and We have enumerated everything in a clear book.» ¹

And he divided what was collected among them (the poor people from Muḍar). ²

Conclusion

From the above discussion, we can conclude that:

1. A person's deeds are sealed by his death. Nothing that takes place after that can affect his records.
2. The exception to the above rule is that anything, good or bad, that takes place after a person's death, which he contributed to its occurrence in any manner during his lifetime, will appear in his records in proportion with his contribution to it.

IHYĀ' 'ULŪM AL-DIN

of al-Ghazzali is divided into four quarters (parts), The first deals with the acts of Worship (al-'ibādat), the second with the usages of life (al-mu'amalāt), the third with the destructive matters of life (al-muhlikāt) and the fourth with the saving matters of life (al-munajjiyāt).

Each of these four quarters comprises ten books.

The following four "Books" of the First Quarter have already been published by us :

- (1) THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE
(The Kitāb al-'Ilm)
- (2) THE FOUNDATIONS OF THE ARTICLES OF FAITH
(The Kitāb Qawā' id al-'Aqā'id)
- (3) THE MYSTERIES OF PURITY
(The Kitāb Asrār al-Tahārah)
- (1) THE MYSTERIES OF FASTING
(The Kitāb Asrār al-Sawn)

The present volume viz.,

- (1) THE MYSTERIES OF ALMSGIVING
(The Kitāb Asrār al-Zakāh)

is the fifth "Book" of the first quarter.

All the five have been translated, with notes, by Dr. Nabih Amin Faris of the American University of Beirut, and is the result of years of research and hard labour. In translating he has used four texts of the original book : three printed and one in manuscript.

We have more titles on Ghazali. Please ask for a free copy of our Descriptive Catalogue.

PREFACE

THOUGH ONE OF the most important works corning down to us from medieval Islam, no single part of the Ihyā' Ulūm al-Dīn appeared in English, or any European language at that, until Duncan B. Macdonald published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (1901, pp. 195-252, 705-748, and 1902, pp. 1-28) an English version of Book VIII of the second quarter of the Ihyā', i.e. the Kitāb Ādāb

Al-Samā' w-al-Wajd (On Audition and Grief). The second complete part of the Ihyā' was Edwin E. Calverley's translation of Book IV of the first quarter, i.e. the Kitāb al-Salāh (Madras, 1925). Except for a few extracts and selections, no complete translation of any part of the Ihyā' appeared in English until 1962 when two books from it were finally published : Book I of the first quarter, namely the Kitāb al-'Ilm (The Book of Knowledge) translated by the present writer and published by M. Ashraf, Lahore; and Book III of the fourth quarter, namely the Kitāb al-Khawf w-al-Rajā' (On Fear and Hope), translated by William McKane and published by Brill of Leiden. The following year, 1963, saw also the publication, in English, of two other books of the Ihyā' : Book X of the second quarter, on the Conduct of Life as Exemplified by the Prophet (Adab al-Ma'ishah wa-Akhlāk al-Nubūwah), translated by L. Zolondek and published also by Brill ; and Book II of the first quarter, i.e. the Kitāb Qāwā'id al-'Aqā'id (The Foundations of the Articles of Faith), translated by the present writer and published also by Ashraf.

The following pages present in English garb Book V of the first quarter, namely the Kitāb Asrār al Zakāh (On the Mysteries of Almsgiving). The translation is, based on three printed texts and one in manuscript form. The printed texts are: first, that printed at Kafr al-Zaghāri in A. H. 1352 from the older. Cairo edition of A.H. 1289 ; second, that contained in the text of the Ithāf al-Sādah al-Muttaqīn bi-Sharh Ihyā' 'Ulūm al-Dīn of al-Sayyid al-Murtada al-Zabidi (d. 1791); third, that reproduced in the margin of the same Ithāf al-Sādah ; and fourth, the text preserved in a four-volume manuscript in the Garrett Collection of Arabic Manuscripts in the Princeton University (No. 1481). In the translation of Koranic verses, I have depended mainly on J.M. Rodwell's version.

It is my hope that by making still another Book of the Ihyā' available in English, non-Arabic-speaking scholars will draw a benefit, even from my mistakes.

On the Mysteries of Almsgiving

INTRODUCTION

IN THE NAME of God the Merciful the Compassionate. [190] Praise be to God who hath blessed some with happiness, and reduced others to destitution; who hath brought some to death, and others to life; who hath caused some to laugh, and others to weep; who hath brought some things into existence, and other things He brought to nought; who hath reduced some to poverty, and hath made others rich; who hath visited some with harm, and others He hath blessed with good things; who hath created life from emitted clot,' and then set Himself apart from His creation through His attribute of independence (ghina) and endued some of His servants with excellence, enriching with His blessings those who toil and labour, and withholding His rewards from those who are indolent and languid, for the sake of testing them and trying them; who hath made almsgiving (zakāh) one of the foundations of religion; and hath revealed that, by His grace, through the giving of alms are His servants justified and through the same is their wealth increased. May the peace of God be upon Muhammad the elect, the Lord of creation and the sun of guidance, and upon his family and his Companions who are favoured with learning and piety.

To proceed we say: God has made almsgiving one of the pillars of Islam placing it next to prayer which is the supreme[duty in Islam]. Thus He said,

"Observe prayer and pay alms."¹ The Apostle said, "Islam was built on five [pillars] : to witness that there is no god but Allah and that Muhammad is His servant and Apostle, observing prayer, giving alms, [performing the pilgrimage, and fasting Ramadān]."² Furthermore, God has strongly warned those who are remiss in the fulfilment of these duties. Thus he said, "To those who treasure up gold and silver and expend it not in the way of God, announce tidings of a grievous torment."³ "To expend in the way of God" means to set aside the right proportion [of one's wealth] for alms. Al-Ahnaf ibn-Qays said, "I was once in the company of a group of Qurashites when abu-Dharr passed by and said, 'To those who treasure wealth announce that they will be branded in their back with a red-hot iron rod which will penetrate through their chests, and in the back of their heads with a rod which will pierce through to their foreheads.'" According to another version, the red-hot iron rod will be placed on the nipples of their breasts and forced through to emerge from the centre of their shoulder-blades, and on the centre of their shoulder-blades to emerge from the nipples of their breasts.

Abu-Dharr said, "I came upon the Apostle of God sitting in the shadow of the Ka'bah, and when he saw me he said, 'Verily they [191] are the lost ones ; by the Lord of the Ka'bah, they are the lost ones.' I asked, 'Who are the lost ones?' He replied, ¹ . See Sitrals II : 40, 77, 104, 172, 277, etc. Prayer and almsgiving are mentioned side by side in the Koran no less than twenty-two times.

³ Slirak IX :3

'Those who have the most of wealth except him who gives of it to his fellowmen ; such men are not few. Verily if a person owns camels, or cattle, or flocks and does not set aside the zakāh on them, these camels, cattle, and flocks will return on the day of resurrection bigger and fatter than they ever were and will butt him with their horns and trample him with their hoofs over and over again until all the people are judged.' ''' Since this stricture is related in the two *Sahī*s,² it becomes an important part of religion to unfold the mysteries of almsgiving (zakāh), its obvious and hidden rules, and its outward and inward significance. We shall limit our discussion to those things which the payer of zakāh and its recipient should know. These are unfolded under four sections : First, the different kinds of zakāh and the reasons for its obligatory nature. Second, its inward and outward rules and regulations. Third, the recipient, the conditions which establish his claim, and the etiquette of payment. Fourth, the voluntary almsgiving (sadaqah)³ and its excellence.

1. Cf. Muslim, Zakā : 24. 26, 27 ; al • Bukhārī, Zakāh : 44.

2. Al-Bukhārī's and Muslim's.

3. The difference between zakā and sadaqah is that the former is legal and obligatory while the latter is meritorious and voluntary.

SECTION I

ON THE DIFFERENT kinds of zakāh and the reasons for its being obligatory, as well as the zakāh in relation to the various materials on which it is levied. These are of six kinds : 1. on livestock (na'am), 2. on gold and silver (al-naqdayn), 3. on merchandise, 4. on buried treasures (rikāz) and mines, 5. on land products (al-mu'ashsharāt), 6. on breaking the fast of Ramadan (al-fitr).

1. The Zakāh on Livestock

This, as well as the other kinds of zakāh, is not obligatory except on every free Moslem. That he be an adult and sane is not a prerequisite. In fact the zakāh is obligatory on minors and the insane.. These are the conditions for a person's liability to the zakāh. Those which render the property liable are five : that it be livestock,. maintained on pasturing, in the possession of its owner for at least one uninterrupted year, equivalent to a certain minimum (nisāb), and wholly owned [by the individual].

The first condition is that the property should be livestock, since only camels, cattle and flocks are liable to the zakāh, whereas horses, mules, donkeys, and the cross-breed of deer and sheep are exempt therefrom.

The second condition is pasturing. Livestock maintained on fodder are not liable to the zakāh. Again if they were maintained on pasturing a part of the time and fed on fodder the rest of the time, they would be exempted from the zakāh because of the need to provide for them.

The third condition is possession for [at least] a period of one uninterrupted year. The Apostle of God said, "No zakāh is due on anything until it is in one's possession [for at least] one year." An exception from this rule is the produce of property. To it is applied the same rule which governs the property and is liable to the zakāh because its source [i.e. the original property] has been in the possession of the owner for one uninterrupted year. If during the year the property is sold or given away, the year's possession is interrupted [and the liability to zakāh falls].

The fourth condition is the whole and complete ownership of the property and freedom of action therein. Consequently, mortgaged livestock are liable to the zakāh because the owner himself has been responsible for the sequestration. But lost and confiscated things are not liable to the zakāh unless they are retrieved, at which time the amount due on them for the previous period must be paid. If the person were indebted to the amount of his capital, he would not be liable to the zakāh because he is not rich enough, as to be rich is to have a surplus.

The fifth condition is that the property be equal to a certain minimum [which varies with the kind of property on which the zakāh is levied].

1. Abu-Dāwād. Zakāh : 5.

Camels. No zakāh; is due on less than five camels, on which is levied a sheep in its second year or a goat in its third year. On ten camels two goats are levied, on fifteen camels three goats, on twenty camels four goats, and on twenty-five camels a yearling she-camel (bint mikhād) which is in its second year of age. If the person did not have among his camels a yearling she-camel then a he-camel in the third year of its age (ibn-labūn) would be taken instead, although the person might be able to buy a yearling she-camel. On thirty-six camels a she-camel in the third year of its age (bint labūn) is levied ; on forty-six camels a she-camel in the fourth year of its age (hiqqah) is levied ; on sixty-one camels a she-camel in the fifth year of its age (jadha'ah) ; on seventy-six camels two she-camels in the third year of their age; on ninety- one camels two she-camels in the fourth year of their age ; and on one hundred and twenty-one camels three she-camels in the third year of their age. When their number reaches one hundred and thirty-one camels the scale becomes fixed: for every fifty camels a she-camel in the fourth year of its age is levied, and for every forty camels a she-camel in the third year of its age.

Cattle. No zakāh is due on less than thirty bulls anti cows, on which is levied a calf in the second year of its age (tabi'). On forty bulls and cows a cow in the third year of its age (musinnuh) is levied, and on sixty bulls and cows two calves in the second year of their age. Beyond that the scale becomes fixed : for every forty bulls and cows a cow in the third year of its age is levied, and for every thirty bulls and cows a calf in the second year of its age.

Flock. No zakāh is due on less than forty sheep and goats, on which one ewe in the second year of its age or one goat in the third year of its age is levied. No zakāh is due on any more until the number reaches one hundred and twenty-one sheep and goats for which three ewes are levied. When the number reaches four-hundred, four ewes are levied. Beyond this number the scale becomes fixed and for every one hundred sheep and goats one ewe is levied.

The rule which governs the almsgiving (sadaqah) of two in partnership (khalitayn) is the same as that which governs the sadaqah of the sole owner. Thus if two individuals owned forty sheep together [the zakāh] due on them is one ewe; and if three individuals owned one hundred and twenty ewes in partnership among themselves the zakāh due on them all is one ewe. Partnership of neighbours, in its liability to the zakāh, is exactly like common partnership (khultat, al-shuyū), although it is required that their sheep should be herded together in the same place, taken to drink [192] together [at the same water-hole or well], milked together, graze together in the same pasture, and their mating be carried at the same time and place. Above all the partners should be of the people of the zakāh [i.e. free Moslems], for the partner-ship of the Moslem with the dhimmi and the slave who has ransomed himself (mukātab)² is without

1. Used here as a synonym of zakāh.

2. Cf. Siirak XXIV : 33 Kitabak. literally "writing," is a form of buying oneself free. It is a contractual liberation where the slave pays his owner a certain equivalent in two or three instalments. The owner is the mukātib and the slave is the mukātab. The latter alone can annul the contract if he wishes.

the law.

To give as zakāh a younger camel than the one prescribed by law is permissible, provided the camel given is not younger than a yearling (bint mikhād), although the person should make amends for the age of the camel : a camel one year younger than the prescribed age requires two ewes or twenty dirhams compensation; one two years younger, four ewes or forty dirhams. He may also give as zakāh camels older than the prescribed age as long as they do not go beyond the fifth year of their age (jadha'ah). [When camels older in years than the prescribed age have been given as zakāh], the owner is entitled to [differential] compensation and can collect it from the treasury officials.

No sick camel may be accepted as zakāh when one sound camel is found among the herd on which the zakāh is due. From among thorough-bred camels a thorough-bred is collected and from among the half-breed, a half-breed. No sheep fattened for slaughtering and eating or gravid may be taken as zakāh. Likewise no ewe which has just brought forth, or a male, or the best among the flock may be taken.

2. The Zakāh on Land Products

The second kind of zakāh is that which is levied on land products (al-ma'ashsharāt). The tithe is due on every edible plant when its amount reaches eight hundred manehs. No zakāh is due on any amount less than eight hundred manehs. Likewise no zakāh is due on fruits and cotton but it is due on dates and raisins. To be liable to the zakāh their amount should not be less than eight hundred manehs and they should be dried dates and raisins, not fresh dates and grapes. Fresh dates and grapes become dried dates and raisins after a process of drying.

In common partnership the property of the one partner supplements that of the other [and the zakāh is due on the sum of the two]. For example in a vineyard which is owned in common by several heirs and the crop of which amounts to eight hundred manehs of raisins, eighty manehs of raisins are due on all of them together, each to pay in proportion to his share. This, however, does not hold in the partnership among neighbours.

An amount of wheat may not be supplemented with another of barley in order to raise it to the minimum (nisāb) liable to the zakāh but an amount of barley may be supplemented with thin-husked barley because they are of the same species.

The quality of the zakāh due on land products is as follows: dry dates, dry raisins, and dry grains are accepted as zakāh. Neither grapes nor fresh dates are accepted unless an epidemic should befall the trees and demand, for the sake of the general welfare, that they be cut down before their fruit is ripe. In that event fresh dates, [for example], may be collected—nine measures will be set aside for the owner, and one measure for the poverty-stricken. That the division of property is [equivalent to] the selling [of it] does not prevent such division, rather it is permissible because of necessity.

The zakāh is due at the time when the fruits become ripe and the grains harden ; it is actually collected after the crop has been dried and sifted.

3. The Zakāh on Gold and Silver

When a year elapses with two hundred Makkan dirhams of sterling silver [in the possession of a person], the zakāh due on them will be five dirhams, which is one-fourth of ten per cent. Anything above that, though it may be only a dirham, follow the same ratio [of one dirham for every forty or one fortieth for each dirham].

The minimum amount (nisāb) of gold liable to the zakāh is twenty Makkan miskal of pure gold, on which is due one-fourth of ten per cent. The same proportion holds for anything above the minimum, but no zakāh is due if the minimum were short of one grain. A person possessing counterfeit money is liable to the zakāh if the pure metal it contains is equivalent to the required minimum. The zakāh is due on gold and silver bullion as well as on forbidden gold and silver luxuries such as gold and silver vessels and the gold coaches of [rich] men. On the other hand the zakāh is not due on permissible luxuries. It is also due on the debt of a solvent person capable of paying his debt, in which event it is due at the time of payment. If the payment of the debt has been set for a deferred date, the zakāh is not due until that date is come.

4. The Zakāh on Merchandise

The zakāh on merchandise, like that on gold and silver, [is one-fourth of ten per cent for the year].

The year, however, is reckoned from the time of the person's possession of the gold and silver with which he has purchased the goods, provided the money was up to the minimum liable to the zakāh. If the money were below the minimum, or if the person should purchase some goods with the intention of selling them for profit, then the year would be reckoned from the time of the purchase.

The zakāh is paid with the currency of the land and in terms of the same currency is its value calculated. If the money with which the goods were purchased belonged to a certain monetary unit, and equalled exactly the minimum liable to the zakāh (nisāb) it would be better to calculate the zakāh on the basis of the monetary unit with which the purchase was made than on that of the currency of the land.

If a person decides to invest a part of his income, the year will not be reckoned until he actually purchases something with it, for the mere intent to invest is not enough. If, before the year elapses, the person drops his intention of investing, the obligation to pay the zakāh likewise drops. It is, however, better to pay the zakāh for that year.

Whatever profit may accrue at the end of the year is liable to zakāh through the year of the capital, and will not have a special year reckoned for it as is the case with the increase of [camels, cattle, and flocks].

As to money-changers, the continuity of the year on the basis of which the zakāh due on their money is calculated is not interrupted by the exchange of the money to and fro among them as it is interrupted with exchange of other kinds of merchandise.

The zakāh due on the profits which accrue to the money-lender is due on the lender himself, i.e. on his share of the profit, even before the division of the shares takes place. This is the most regular practice.

5. The Zakāh on Buried Treasures and Mines

A buried treasure (rikāz) is money interred in the earth sometime during the Jāhiliyyah days and later found in a land to which no one has claimed title during the days of Islam. When such a treasure is discovered, he who finds it is required to pay one-fifth of its value, whether the treasure be gold or silver. The lapse of a one-year period is not required. Likewise no certain minimum need be required, since the fact that one-fifth of its value has been set down as the amount of the zakāh due on it establishes its similarity to booty. It is not unusual, however, to require a certain minimum (nisāb) because the way it is spent is the same as that of the zakāh. For this reason [the liability to the zakāh is confined to gold and silver treasures.

As to mines, no zakāh is due on any of the metals mined therefrom except gold and silver, on which, according to the best authority, one-fourth of ten per cent is due after they have been reduced and purified. Furthermore, a certain minimum (nisāb) is here required [193]. As to the one-year period two opinions are set forth, [one requiring and the other ignoring it]. But when one-fifth of its value is fixed as the amount of the zakāh due, the year period is not required.

Two opinions are also set forth regarding the minimum liable to the zakāh. The more likely is that, in the amount of the zakāh due on it, it should follow the same rule as merchandise, since it is also a form of profit. In the case of the one-year period it should follow the rule of the land products and therefore no such period is required, since this is the most sensible course. A, certain minimum is required in this part as it is required in land products. The safest course is to set aside one-fifth of all buried treasures and mine products regardless of their amount and irrespective of whether or not they are gold or silver, in order to avoid these uncertain distinctions and differences, all of which are conjectural views and almost invariably contradictory. It is, therefore, dangerous to lay down fast and strict rules, especially because of the contradictory nature of these conjectures.

6. The Zakāh on Breaking the Fast of Ramadan

The zakāh on breaking the fast of Ramadan (al-fitr) is on the authority of the word of the Apostle of God,' obligatory upon every Moslem from whose food and the food of his dependants, on the day of al-fitr and the night before, a measure, measured with that of the Apostle of God, is left over. The measure of the Apostle of God was equivalent to two and two-thirds manehs. This he should set aside from whatever food he has been eating or from any superior food. If he were feeding on wheat he may not set aside [a measure] of barley [for the zakāh], and if he were feeding on several kinds of grains he should select the best and from it set aside the zakāh. But of whatever grain he sets aside the zakāh it will be sufficient.

I. Cf. al-Nasā'i, Zakāh : 30; al-Bukhārī, Zakāh : 71-76.

The zakāh on the breaking of the fast of Ramadān (al-fitr) is expended in the same way as that of the other properties, and each of the various beneficiaries should be included. It is not permissible to offer either flour or parched barley as zakāh. Furthermore it is obligatory upon every Moslem to pay the zakāh on the breaking of the fast of Ramadan for his wife, slaves, children, and every relative dependent on him, i.e. those relatives whose support is obligatory upon him, such as his father, mother, and children. The Apostle said, "On breaking the fast of Ramadan, give the sadaqah' on behalf of those whom ye support."² In case the slave is jointly possessed by two partners the sadaqah is obligatory upon both. It is, however, not obligatory to pay it on behalf of an unbelieving slave. If a wife should independently set aside her own sadaqah, her sadaqah will be sufficient. Nevertheless, the husband may set aside the sadaqah on behalf of his wife without her permission. If, after paying the sadaqah of his immediate dependants, a person can still afford it, he should proceed to the sadaqah of those next in order beginning with the closest whose claim to his support is the most evident.

1. Sadaqah is used here interchangeably with zakāh.

2. Unidentified.

The Apostle of God has given the child's claim for support precedence over the wife's, and the wife's over that of the servant.'

The knowledge of these rules of jurisprudence is indispensable to him who wishes to be independent of others. He may, however, be confronted with unusual situations not within the scope of this discussion, in which event he should depend upon expert legal opinion having at first fortified himself with this knowledge.

1. . Cf. al-Nasā'i, Zakāh: 54, where the claim of the wife is given precedence over that of the child.

SECTION II

On the Payment of the Zakāh and the Inward and Outward Rules which Govern that Payment

Know that the payer of the zakāh should observe five things :

1. Intention, which means that the person should purpose in his heart the payment of the ordained zakāh, but he does not have to specify the property for which he pays the zakāh. Thus if he had some property under absentee ownership and, on paying the zakāh due on it, said, "This is paid for the property which I own under absentee ownership, provided that property is safe, otherwise let this be a supererogatory deed," his action will be permissible, because he did not specify what the property was. This will be the rule when a property is referred to in general terms.

The intention of the guardian takes the place of that of the insane and the minor. The intention of the magistrate takes the place of that of the owner who has refused to pay the zakāh, although only as far as the outward forms of this world are concerned. As far as the hereafter is concerned the intention of the magistrate does not take the place of that of the owner who has refused to pay the zakāh; on the contrary the latter will continue to be held responsible for it until he resumes its payment.

If the owner should entrust an agent with the payment of the zakāh and, at the time of intrusting, the agent purposes himself to do so, or entrust the agent with the intention, he would fulfill the requirement thereof, because to entrust the agent with the intention is itself an intention.

2. Promptness in paying the zakāh at the end of each year and on breaking the fast of Ramadān (al-fitr). In the case of the latter he should not delay its payment beyond the feast of Ramadān. It is due as soon as the sun sets on the last day of Ramadān, and if one wishes to be very prompt he may pay it during the month of Ramadān, sometime between the first and the last day of the month. Whoever delays the payment of the zakāh, although he is able to be prompt, sins. Furthermore, if he had been able to pay the zakāh but delayed to do so and subsequently his property was destroyed, the obligation to pay it will not be removed from him. But if he delayed its payment because no beneficiaries were present to receive it, and subsequently his property was destroyed, the obligation to pay the zakāh will be removed from him.

To pay the zakāh in advance is permissible provided it is done after the minimum liable to the zakāh has been obtained and the one-year period has already elapsed. It is, however, permissible to pay the zakāh of two-years in advance. If the zakāh is paid in advance and then, before the end of the year, the poor man [who is the beneficiary] should die, or apostate, or grow independently wealthy, or if the property of the owner should be destroyed or he himself die, the sum which had been paid in advance would not constitute a zakāh and cannot be refunded unless it had been so stipulated at the time of payment. Therefore, let him who pays the zakāh in advance keep in mind how things may end and watch for a safe outcome.

3. That no substitute based on the value of the zakāh be offered in its stead. The stipulated zakāh itself should be set aside and offered. Thus silver (waraq) will not take the place of gold, nor gold the place of silver, even though the substitute may exceed that for which it was substituted.

Perhaps some of those who do not understand the purpose of al-Shāfi'i may be inclined to be lenient and permit the substitution of one thing for the other on the ground that the main purpose of the whole thing is satisfying the need. But how far is this from the true knowledge of the law. For while satisfying the need is one of its purposes, it is in no way the sole purpose. Rather the purposes of the law are three. [194] These are :

The first purpose of the law is pure devotion (ta'abbud ma'nā) not affected by personal considerations or desires. This is, for example, like the throwing of the pebbles at the three Jamrahs:¹ no benefit is derived by the Jamrah from the falling pebbles. In this case the main purpose of the law is the trial of man through action, in order that he may show his servitude and bondage to God by means of acts which [in themselves] have no rational meaning. For acts which [in themselves] have rational meaning are transacted by the aid of the mind which urges man to do them. Consequently, rational acts do not reveal man's complete servitude and bondage to God. Real bondage to God, however, is revealed through [blind] obedience to His commandments and not through obedience for some other reason. Thus most of the activities of [the pilgrims during] the pilgrimage are, in themselves, void of any rational significance. For this reason, the Apostle, when in the sacred state (ihrām), said, "With zeal I obey thee O Lord, and through the pilgrimage I display my devotion and servitude." This he did in order to show that man proves his bondage to God through blind obedience to His commandments regardless of whether or not they are agreeable to him and irrespective of his desire and inclination to obey them.

1. During the pilgrimage, when the pilgrims reach the valley of Mina, each one of them is expected to throw seven small pebbles, which he has already picked up at Muzdalifah, at each of the three heaps (sing. jamrah) symbolic of stoning Satan. There are three Jamrahs, al-ūla (the first), al-wusta (the middle), and the last which is known as that of al-'aqabah. Cf. al-Bukhārī : al-Hajj : 134-8; Ibrahim Rif'at, Mir'at al-Haramayn, (Cairo, 1925), vol. I, pp. 328-9.

The second purpose of the Law is a rational benefit rather than pure devotion, like, for example, honouring human debts and restoring to men whatever was forcibly taken from them. Thus there is not a single offence in which the act itself, as well as the motive, is not taken into consideration. Furthermore whenever the right is restored to its owner or a substitute indemnity agreeable to him has been paid, the demand of the law is fulfilled, and its claims are consequently dropped.

These two purposes of the law are free of complications and their comprehension is readily shared by all men.

The third purpose of the law is composite embracing the former two, namely the benefit of mankind and the trial of man by means of [the yoke of] bondage. Consequently therein is combined acts of pure devotion like the throwing of the pebbles, and human benefits like the restoration of [violated]. rights. The latter is, in, itself, rational. But if it is ordained by the law, it becomes imperative that the two purposes be combined. Never, however, should the subtler of the two purposes, namely devotion and servitude, be overlooked on account of the more apparent, [namely human benefit and advantage]. More likely the subtler of the two is the more important.

Of this last kind, [i.e. the third], is the zakāh. No one awoke to this fact except al-Shifī'i. The part of [the zakāh which is spent on] the poverty-stricken serves the purpose of satisfying the need. This is quite clear and is readily understood. On the other hand the requirements of devotion are fulfilled through carrying out the details which are connected with the zakāh. In this regard the zakāh has become an inseparable companion of prayer and the pilgrimage, it being one of the [five] pillars of Islam. No doubt man has to exert some effort in distinguishing the various kinds of his possessions and setting aside a portion of each and finally distributing what he had set aside around eight different groups of [beneficiaries] as will be discussed later. To make concessions on this point will not mitigate the benefits due to the poverty-stricken but will certainly militate against devotion. That devotion is intended in the zakāh is evidenced by the specific treatment of the different kinds of the zakāh by the law. These specifications we have discussed under points of dispute in books of jurisprudence. One of the clearest of these specifications is where the law specifically ordains that the zakāh for every five camels is one ewe, thereby substituting the ewe for the camel but not permitting the substitution of gold and silver. Were this to be explained on the result of the scarcity of gold and silver money among the Bedouins, the explanation would be rendered inadequate as soon as it is recalled that the Apostle has stipulated that the sum of twenty dirhams or two ewes should be given in compensation when the age of the camel given as zakāh is younger than what it should be.' Why then did the Apostle not mention in connexion with the compensation required the amount of shortage in the value, and why did he value it at twenty dirhams or two ewes if garments and vessels of whatever kind were all of the same value as substitutes?

These as well as other similar specifications indicate that the zakāh has not been left void of devotional significance, but unlike the pilgrimage which is purely devotional, embraces both [the rational benefits and the devotional acts]. But whereas feeble minds fail to comprehend complicated things, errors have arisen in this field.

I. See above, p. 8.

4. That the sadaqah should not be transferred from one town to another. For in every town the eyes of the poor look towards the money collected therein for relief; and the transfer of that money to other towns brings disappointment to those who expected aid therefrom. According to one opinion, however, the transfer is permissible, but it is better to avoid anything which may cause dissension. Consequently, let the zakāh be spent in the town wherein it was collected. When this is observed it will no longer be wrong to spend the zakāh on such strangers as may be within that town.

5. That the payer of the zakāh should divide the sum which he pays among the different groups of beneficiaries found in his home-town. To include all the different groups of beneficiaries is obligatory, which thing is proved by the words of God when He said, "But alms (sadaqāt) are only to be given to the paupers and the poor, and those who collect them, and to those whose hearts are reconciled [to Islam], and those in captivity, and those in debt, and those who are on God's path, and for the wayfarers;—an ordinance this from God, for God is knowing and wise." This resembles the saying of the sick man that one third of his possessions is for the paupers and the poor, and consequently this demands settlement through transfer. As for the acts of worship care should be taken not to rush through them in a superficial manner.

Of the eight groups of beneficiaries two, namely

1. Sūrah IX : 60.

those whose hearts are reconciled [to Islam]² and the collectors of the zakāh, have disappeared in most lands, while four still universally exist. These are the paupers, the poor, those in debt, and the travellers, i.e. the wayfarers. Two groups, namely the warriors and those in captivity (al-mukātabūn), are still to be found in some lands. Thus if five groups of beneficiaries were found in one place, the payer of the zakāh should divide it among them in equal or almost equal parts, and should allot to each one part. He then should divide each part into three or more equal or unequal portions. Nevertheless, he is not compelled to divide each part equally among the members of the one group of beneficiaries, but may divide it, if he wishes, into ten or even twenty portions, in which case the share of each individual within the one group will necessarily diminish. The division of the zakāh among the different groups should not be tampered with : nothing should be taken from the one and added to the other but all should be equal. The share of each group should not be divided into less than three portions. Thus if the amount of the zakāh due for breaking the fast of Ramadan were one measure of any grain and there were five groups of beneficiaries in the town, the payer, [on the basis of at least three portions within each group], should divide the zakāh among fifteen men. Should one man be left out and not receive his portion, the payer, if he can afford it, should supply that portion from his own property. But if this were not possible because of the meagreness of the zakāh, a number of those men who are liable to the zakāh should pool their dues and then hand them over to the beneficiaries so that they might divide them among themselves. [195] Resort to this course of action is indispensable.

On. the Details of the Inward Rules of the Zakāh

Know that he who seeks the road of the hereafter through the zakāh has certain duties to fulfil. These are as follows :

The first duty is to understand the reason why the zakāh is obligatory, to comprehend its significance, to find out how it constitutes a criterion wherewith man's devotion to God is tested and tried, and finally why it has been made one of the [five] pillars of Islam although it is merely a financial transaction and does not form a part of bodily worship. This has three significations.

To repeat the two words of the shahādah is an obligation necessary for the acknowledgement of the unity of God and a witness to His oneness. As a prerequisite of man's complete loyalty to God he should banish from his heart every love except the One, the Single, since love tolerates no division of affection. Furthermore the verbal profession of the unity of God is of little value by itself. The degree of the person's love is tested when he parts with his beloved. Property and wealth are much loved by all people because they are the means by which they enjoy the pleasures of this world, and because of them they love life and hate death, although through it they will meet [God] the beloved. As a proof of the truthfulness of their claim that they love God they have renounced property and wealth, the objects of their [earthly] attention and devotion. For this reason God said, "Verily, of the faithful hath God bought their persons and their substance, on condition of Paradise for them [in return]."¹ This is done by means of toil and labour of God, by giving up oneself to His service because of one's longing to meet Him. But giving up wealth is easier than giving up oneself. As people read in this the giving away of wealth and property, they were divided into three different groups. One group of men accepted the unity of God and fulfilled [the terms of] their covenant,² renouncing all their wealth and property and storing for themselves neither gold nor silver. Consequently, they refused to concern themselves with the obligation of the zakāh and that they were expected to pay it, so that when one of them was asked about the zakāh due on two-hundred dirhams he replied, "The law ordains that the common folk pay five dirhams [as the zakāh due on two-hundred], but, we have to give away all." For this reason abuBakr gave away all his possessions and Umar gave away half of his. Thereupon the Apostle asked Umar, "What have you left for your family?" Umar replied, "As much as I have given away." The Apostle then asked abu-Bakr, "And what have you left for your family?" Abu-Bakr replied, "[The protection of] God and His Apostle." The Apostle said, "The difference between you both is the same as the difference between your replies. Verily al-Siddiq has fulfilled his covenant completely, withholding nothing unto himself except God and his Apostle."¹

1. Sūrah IX : 112.

2. Cf. Sūrah II : 172.

The members of the second group rank lower than those of the first. They withhold their wealth for the hour of need and until the season of giving arrives. Their purpose in saving and storing their wealth is to be able to spend according to their needs, though without extravagance, and to give away for charity whatever is left after they had satisfied their need. In giving, these men do not limit themselves to the zakāh but go beyond its fixed amount. In fact some of the followers (al-tabī'ūn), such as al-Nakha'i, al-Sha'bi, 'Atā' and Mujāhid, have said that a man's wealth was subject to other [impositions] besides the zakāh. Thus al-Sha'bi, having been asked, "Is a man's wealth subject to other [impositions] besides the zakāh?", said, "Yes. Have you not heard the words of God, 'And for the love of God distributeth his wealth to his kindred'?"² These same men have been guided in this by the words of God, "And give alms of that with which we have supplied them;"³ and "And expend [in the cause of God] out of that with which we have supplied you ;"⁴ claiming that neither of these two verses has been abrogated by that of the zakāh.¹ Rather they are part of the obligations of one Moslem towards another. In other words whenever a wealthy Moslem comes across one who is needy, he should relieve his want regardless of the fact that he has already paid the zakāh. In this connexion, the correct course, according to jurisprudence, is that the relief of a pressing need is a fard kifāyah, because the life of a Moslem should not be sacrificed.

It maybe said, however, that a wealthy Moslem is under no obligation to surrender any of his wealth for the relief of want except in the form of a loan, and that he is not under any compulsion to give any of it away once he has fulfilled the requirement of the zakāh. It may also be said that he should give away of his wealth for the relief of want but not in the form of a loan. In other words it is not permissible for him to place the poor under the obligation of accepting the loan [and the obligation of paying it back]. Differences of opinion on this question do exist. [To relieve want by] loans [rather than by outright gifts] is to descend to the lowest rank of the common folk, which is the rank of the third group.

The members of this third group confine themselves solely to the fulfilment of that which is obligatory ; they add nothing to it and take nothing away from it. This is, indeed, the lowest rank to which the common folk have confined themselves because of their niggardliness, and because of their strong love for money and their lukewarm love for the hereafter. Said God, "If He were to ask you for your property and to press you for it, ye would be niggardly."¹ (To press you means to urge you). And what a difference is there between a servant from whom [God] has purchased his wealth and soul in return for Paradise and another whom [God] does not urge because of his niggardliness! This, therefore, is one of the meanings of the commandment of God to His servants to give their wealth away.

The second meaning is to purify oneself from the stigma of niggardliness which is one of the destructive matters of life. The Apostle said, "Three things in life are destructive : sordid avarice, vehement passion, and self-conceit."² God also said, "And whoso is preserved from his own covetousness, these are the prosperous."³ We shall discuss in the Quarter on the Destructive Matters of Life in what way it is destructive as well as the manner of avoiding it.

The stigma of niggardliness is removed by the practice of giving money away, since the love of a thing is overcome by compelling oneself to stay away from it until abstention becomes habitual. According to this meaning the zakāh is purity because it purifies the person who fulfils it from the destructive impurities of niggardliness. The extent to which the person if purified from the stigma of niggardliness is proportional to the amount of his giving and the degree of his pleasure in giving and in his delight in spending in the cause of God.

The third meaning is gratitude for the blessings of God, for He has blessed man in his own self and in his possessions. The bodily acts of worship [196] are man's gratitude for the bodily blessings which God has bestowed upon him, while the financial acts of worship are his gratitude for the financial gifts. How vile and ungrateful, then is the person who sees a poverty-stricken man in dire distress and need but does not extend to him a helping hand by giving him one-fourth of ten per cent or ten per cent of his wealth as a sign of his gratitude to God for sparing him the necessity of begging and visiting it upon others instead.

The second duty concerns the time of payment. One of the signs of etiquette among religious people is to pay [the zakāh] before it is already due, in order to show their desire to conform willingly to the law by bringing [relief and] happiness to the hearts of those in poverty, losing no time therein lest unforeseen obstacles arise and prevent them from doing good; and because of their knowledge that in delay are many evils, and that man exposes himself to [the fruits of] disobedience whenever he delays the payment of the zakāh beyond the appointed time. Whenever the impulse for doing good makes itself felt inwardly, the person should seize the opportunity [and hearken unto it] for in so doing he would join the company of heaven, since at that time "the heart of the believer is between two of the fingers of the Merciful God." But how quickly does the heart change its position. For Satan threatens [men] with poverty and invites them to commit turpitude and evil. He has a company that goes after the company of heaven. Consequently, let man seize the opportunity and appoint a definite month for the payment the zakāh if he were wont to pay it annually ; and let him endeavour to have that month fall in the best part of the year, so that he may increase in the favour of God and his zakāh be multiplied double fold. Such a month would be al-Muharram because it is the first month of the year and one of the sacred months;¹ or Ramādān in which the Apostle, who was the best of creation, was like the open air free of all impurities.² To Ramadan also belongs the excellence of the Night of Power (Laylat al-Qadr)³ as well as that of being the month in which the Koran was revealed. Mujāhid was wont to say, "Say not Ramādān, because Ramadan is one of the names of God ; but say ye the month of Ramādān."⁴ Dhu-al-Hijjah is another of the months which claim great excellence since besides being a sacred month, it also boasts of the greater pilgrimage (al-hajj al-akbar),⁵ the appointed days (al-ayyām al-ma'lūmāt),⁶ which are the first ten days of the same month, and the numbered days (al-ayyām al-ma'dūdāt) which are the days of orientation (ayyām al-tashriq).¹ The most excellent days of the month of Ramadan are the last ten, and the most excellent of Dhu-al-Hijjah are the first ten.

4. That Ramādān is one of the names of God is based on a weak tradition which I failed to locate.

The third duty is secrecy. It is farther removed from the desire to be seen and heard. The Apostle said, "The most excellent sadaqah is the secret effort of one of meagre resources to relieve a poverty-stricken individual."² One of the learned men said, "Three things are among the precious works of righteousness, one of which is to give alms (sadaqah) in secret."³ This same saying has been related as a tradition.⁴ The Apostle also said, verily when a man does some thing [good] in secret God will record it down to his credit in secret ; if he reveals it, it will be transferred from the list of the good works done in secret to that of the good works done openly ; if he talks about it, it will be stricken out from both lists and put down in that of the works of hypocrisy."⁵ And again in the well-authenticated (mashhūr)⁶ tradition, he said, "Seven people will God cover with His shadow on the day when there will be no shadow but His ; one of these seven is a man who gives alms but his left hand does not know what his right does."¹ In another tradition he said, "Alms given in secret turn away the wrath of God."² Said God, "But if ye hide it [i.e. almsgiving] and bring it to the poverty-stricken, then it is better for you."³ The advantage of secrecy in giving alms is salvation from the evils of the desire to be seen and heard. The Apostle said, "God will not accept the gift of the braggart, the hypocrite, and the person who is always reminding others of the favours he has done for them."⁴ For he who brags about his alms seeks to be known and heard, and he who gives his alms in the presence of crowds desires to be seen and recognized ; while secrecy and silence are the best protection against [such temptations].

Some have emphasized the excellence of secrecy in giving alms to an extent where they endeavour to conceal the identity of the benefactor from the beneficiary. Some were wont to place their alms in the hand of a blind man ; others used to throw them in the path of the poverty-stricken or in his sitting place where he could see them without seeing the giver ; others were in the habit of hiding them in the garments of the poor while he was fast asleep ; and others used to convey them to the poverty-stricken indirectly through an intermediary so that the identity of the giver might remain unknown. The intermediary, in turn, was charged with silence and warned not to divulge the identity of the giver. These men took all this trouble to insure that the wrath of God has been turned away from them and to avoid the evils of being seen and heard. Whenever it is not possible to give alms without being known by some one, it is better to give the alms over to an agent who would pass them to the poor whose identity should remain unknown to the benefactor; for in knowing the identity of the poor who had received the alms lies both the desire to be known and the evil practice of reminding the poor of the favour done to him, while in knowing only the intermediary, there lies nothing but the desire to be known.

Whenever the giver's aim in giving is fame, his good deed will prove useless since the purpose of the zakāh is to banish niggardliness and weaken the love of wealth, yet the love of position and rank is more insidious than the love of wealth, and both [197] are destructive in the hereafter. While the quality of niggardliness becomes, so to speak, in the grave a stinging scorpion, the desire to be seen is transformed into a biting viper. Yet man is required to weaken or destroy them in order to avoid their harm or at least lessen it. But whenever he seeks to be seen and heard, he strengthens, as it were, the viper and weakens the scorpion. To the extent to which he weakens the scorpion, he strengthens the viper. If he had left them as they were, it would have been easier for him [to avoid their harm]. For the strength of these qualities lies in doing according to their demands, and their weakness is found in opposing and contradicting them and in doing contrary to their demands. Thus what use is there in contradicting the demands of niggardliness and bending before the urge of being seen by men thereby weakening the weaker of the two and strengthening the stronger? (The mysteries of these things will be discussed in the Quarter on the Destructive Matters of Life).

The fourth duty is that the giving of alms be made public, if in so doing men are induced to do likewise and give. The giver, however, should, when making public his gift, guard against being seen in the manner which we shall discuss under the treatment of hypocrisy in the Book on that subject. For God has said, "If ye display your almsgiving, then well is it." This refers to such occasions where display is needed either for the sake of setting an example for giving or because someone has begged for alms in the presence of a great crowd, in which case giving should not be deferred or neglected for fear of being seen. Rather the person should give to him who has begged and try as much as possible to guard himself against being seen. That is because, besides the evils of constantly reminding people of favours done them and the desire to be seen, there is a third thing to be guarded against in connexion with the giving of alms in public. This is the fear of disgracing the poverty-stricken, whose feelings may be hurt at being publicly discovered to be needy. But he who begs in public is solely responsible for bringing disgrace upon himself, and as such, there is no danger of hurting his feelings in giving him alms in public. This is like exposing the incontinence of a person who has hitherto concealed it. Such an exposure is forbidden. Likewise, spying at the person and discussing his incontinence in his absence are prohibited. But he who displays his incontinence openly should be punished by spreading the news of his offence among men although, in reality, he is the cause of it all. Of the same meaning are the words of the Apostle when he said, "He who casts off the garment of shame has no protection against calumny." God said, "And those who expend in alms, in secret and in public, out of what we have bestowed upon them."² He called men to give alms in public, openly, because of the conducive influence which such giving contains. Let man, therefore, be extremely careful in his choice between this beneficial influence and the dangers inherent therein for they vary with the variation of conditions and individuals. Under certain conditions making the giving of alms public is better for some individual. In short any one familiar with the advantages and disadvantages [of giving alms in public] and entertains no worldly ambitions, will readily discern what is better and more fitting under each different condition.

The fifth duty is that man should not make his alms (sadaqah) void by taunts and injury. God said, "Make not your alms void by reproaches and injury."³ People have differed in their definition of taunting and injury. Some have said that taunting is to remind people of favours done for them, while injury is to make them public. Sufyan⁴ said, "He who resorts to taunting renders his alms void." Thereupon he was asked, "And how does a man resort to taunting ? " To which he replied, "By mentioning his alms and discussing them." Others said that taunting is to enslave a person by a gift while injury is to deride him for his poverty. It was also said that taunting is to lord it over a person for having given him something while injury is to upbraid and rebuke him for begging. The Apostle said, "God will not accept the gifts of the person who is always reminding others of the favours he has done for them." In my opinion taunting springs from the [hidden] states and qualities of the heart and then branches out into different concrete forms which manifest themselves through the tongue and the senses. Actually, the giver should deem himself a beneficiary and the poverty-stricken, by virtue of accepting his gifts which are due to God, his benefactor. For in this lie man's justification and his salvation from Hell-fire. Had the poverty-stricken declined to accept his gifts, man would have remained under an obligation to give. It is his duty, therefore to acknowledge that he is under an obligation to the poverty-stricken who has made his hand a substitute for that of God in receiving the dues [which man owes to] God. The Apostle of God said, "Verily alms fall into the hand of God before they fall into the hand of the beggar who receives them."² Let man therefore, know that [when he gives alms], he gives them unto God while the poor [who receives them] is receiving his livelihood from God to whom it was first given. Thus if a person were indebted to another for a certain sum of money, and should turn over the responsibility of its payment to his slave or servant, both of whom are dependent upon him for their livelihood, and then if on paying the debt the slave or the servant should think that he had placed the recipient under an obligation to himself, this would be sheer impudence and ignorance, because the benefactor who deserves the credit is he on whom both the slave and the servant depend for their livelihood, whereas the slave [or the servant] who had made the payment would have done nothing but discharge a debt which the master had incurred, thereby gaining his favour and consequently aiding himself without placing anyone else under obligation to himself. In fact whenever he understands the three different meanings which we have mentioned in connexion with the obligatory nature of the zakāh, whenever he understands at least one of them, he will realize that he has not done any good except to himself either through expending his wealth to show his love to God, or to purify himself from the vice of niggardliness, or to give thanks unto God for the blessing of wealth and ask for more.

Whatever the case may be no dealings can exist between him and the poverty-stricken until he deems himself the benefactor. Whenever he succumbs to such folly he manifests the outward [symptoms of] taunting which we have already discussed, namely repeated discussion of ones alms and insistence on making them known, seeking reward from the beneficiary by expecting from him thanks, praise, service, respect, and veneration, and by requiring him to carry out errands for him, pay him homage in assemblies, and agree with him on all subjects. All these are [198] the fruits of taunting. The inward meaning of taunting we have already mentioned.

The outward manifestations of injury are rebuke, derision, rough speech, stern looks, putting to shame by exposure, and all manner of ridicule. Its inward nature wherefrom its outward manifestations spring is made up of two things : the one is man's unwillingness to give up any of his wealth and the extreme pain which it causes him when he parts with any of it. This [attitude] makes a man inevitably short tempered. The second is his belief that he is superior to the poor who, by reason of his need, is inferior. Both these things are the result of ignorance. For he who dislikes to expend one dirham for a thousand is extremely foolish. It is also well known that he expends his wealth in order to receive the favour of God and to enjoy His rewards in the hereafter. The wealth which he expends for this purpose is nobler than that which he had spent or may spend to purify himself from the stigma of niggardliness or to give thanks in the hope of receiving more. Whatever you may assume, there is no justification for man's unwillingness [to part with any of his wealth].

The second thing [which makes up the inward nature of injury and wherefrom its outward manifestations spring] is ignorance. For if man would realize the superiority of poverty over wealth he would not despise the poor, but rather would seek his blessing and wish that he were in his position instead; since the righteous among the wealthy would enter Paradise five-hundred years after the poor.' For this reason the Apostle said, "By the Lord of the Ka'bah, they shall suffer the greatest loss." Thereupon abu-Dharr asked, "And who are they [who shall suffer the greatest loss ?]" The Apostle replied, "Those who have the most of wealth..." to the end of the tradition.² Furthermore how could he despise the poverty-stricken when God has made the latter the source of his profit, since through the labours of the poverty-stricken he earns and accumulates his wealth, hoarding of it according to his need? He has been ordered [by God] to give the poverty-stricken in accordance to his need and to withhold from him any surplus which will harm him if it were given to him. The wealthy is, therefore, employed in providing for the poverty-stricken and differs from him by his duty to settle disputes and shoulder responsibilities, and his stewardship over the surplus [of his wealth] until he dies, when his enemies will devour what he has left. Consequently, when man's unwillingness to part with any of his wealth is displaced by gladness and joy for the aid which God has given him to fulfil his duty [of paying the zakāh] and handing it over to the poverty-stricken, so that the poverty-stricken, by accepting the payment, might free him from obligation, injury and its [outward manifestations of] rebuke and stern looks will cease and will be replaced by rejoicing, praise, and graceful acceptance of obligation. These then are the causes of taunting and injury.

If you should then say that for a man to see himself as a benefactor is, therefore, [indefinite and] obscure and consequently ask whether or not there is a sign wherewith to test his heart and, [failing to find it], ascertains that he is not a benefactor, then know that such a sign does exist. It is a minute but clear sign and is distinguished in the following manner. The man should confront himself with the following question : Supposing a poverty-stricken man should commit an offence against him or should aid an enemy in a conspiracy against him, would the man's disapproval of and disgust at the poverty-stricken man's behaviour be more intense if the latter had committed his offence after he had received the alms from him than if he had committed it before he had received the alms ? If his disapproval and disgust become more intense because the poverty-stricken man has offended against him after receiving alms from him, then the man's giving of alms is not free from the taint of taunting, since he has expected from the poverty-stricken man, after the latter had received his alms, what he has not expected before.

If you should, then, say that such an expectation is very indefinite and obscure and that the heart of no one is free from it and ask what remedy may be used for it, then know that it has both an internal and an external remedy. The internal remedy is to know the truths which we have already mentioned concerning the obligatory nature [of the zakāh] and to realize that the poverty-stricken man, by his acceptance of the zakāh, enables the benefactor to purify himself [before God], and is therefore the real benefactor. The external remedy comprises the good works which the man who is under obligation does, since the motives from which works proceed colour the heart with their own nature as will be discussed in the last part of this Book. For this reason some were wont to place the sadaqah before the poverty-stricken and, standing before him, beg him to accept it, so that those giving might appear in the form of beggars and to experience the unpleasant feeling of fear lest they be refused. Others used to stretch out their open palms so that the poverty-stricken man might take [the sadakah] therefrom and appear in the role of givers. Both 'A'ishah and umm-Salamah,' whenever they sent a gift or a favour to a poverty-stricken man, used to ask the messenger with whom they sent the gift to remember what good the poverty-stricken man had wished them on receiving their gifts and wish him the same saying, "This wish for his wish, so that our sadakah may be true." They never expected good wishes [in return for their alms] because such wishes are somewhat like a reward. Consequently they responded to every good wish with one like it. The same thing was done by 'Umar ibn-al-Khattāb and his son 'Abdullāh. Likewise the physicians of the heart (arbāb al-qulūb) used to treat their hearts, since there is no external cure for the heart except these good works which signify self-abasement, humility, and acceptance of obligation ; while internally their cure is found in knowledge of the facts which we have already mentioned. The one is from the standpoint of works and the other from that of knowledge. Furthermore, the heart cannot be treated except by means of knowledge and works, a condition in alms' giving corresponding to humility in prayer. This is attested by the words of the Apostle when he said, "Man gains nothing from his prayer except when it is intelligent."¹ This is similar to the words of the Apostle which he said, "God will not accept the gifts of a person who is always reminding others of the favours he has done for them."² It is also similar to the words of God when He said, "Make not your alms void by reproaches and injury."³ The opinion of the jurisprudent that the sadakah is fulfilled regardless of the condition [of knowledge and works according to that knowledge] and that, once given, the person frees himself from the obligation is a different matter altogether, and we have alluded to the meaning of the tradition which purports to support it in the Book, on Prayer.

The sixth duty is that man should belittle his gift because if he should make much of it he would be led to feel well-pleased with it, and vanity is one of the destructive matters of life and renders all good works useless. Said God, 'And on the day of Hunayn¹ when ye were well-pleased with your number it availed you nothing."² It is also said that whenever a good work is belittled by man it grows greater in the sight of God ; on the other hand whenever sin is considered weighty by man it becomes light in the eyes of God. It has also been said that a good work is not made perfect except through three things, namely belittling its importance, hastening its execution, and concealing its report [199].

To make much of a gift, however, is distinct from either taunting or injury. For if a person had expended [some of] his wealth for erecting a mosque or building an outpost (ribāt)³ he could very easily think much of his donation but he could not possibly taunt or cause injury to anyone. Yet vanity and the practice of making much of one's good works invade all the acts of worship and have no remedy except in knowledge and works.

Knowledge entails that a person should recognize that ten per cent or one fourth of ten per cent, [the customary zakāh rates], is but a little portion of a great amount, [and that by so doing], the person has been content not to go beyond the lowest degree of giving as we have explained under the obligatory nature of the zakāh. He should, therefore; be ashamed of this little portion rather than proud of it. If on the other hand he should attain the highest degree and give all his wealth, or the greater part of it, [in alms], let him, before priding himself over it, ponder over the source of his wealth and over the purpose of its expenditure. For all his wealth belongs to God to whom he is under obligation since God has given him all and has aided him in the spending thereof. [Why then should he deem what he expends for God much when it all belongs to God]? And if his station in life should demand that he consider the hereafter and therefore expend his wealth for the sake of reward, why should he make much of his expending that for which he expects manifold reward in the hereafter?

Works, on the other hand, [involve the manner of giving] and require that the person should give because of his sense of shame which he feels for withholding the remainder of his wealth from God. Hence the manner of his giving should be one of humility and shame, just like the person who is requested to hand back a deposit but returns one part of it and withholds another. For the whole of [man's] wealth belongs to God who prefers that it should be all expended. He did not command His servants to do so because of the difficulty that such a command would cause them because of their niggardliness. Thus He said, "And were He to press you for it, ye would be niggardly."²

The seventh duty is that the person should,

1. Words in brackets not in B.

2. Sūrah XLVII : 39.

[when giving], select from his wealth the portion which is best and dearest unto him ; for God is good and accepts nothing but the good. If what he sets aside [for the zakāh] be taken from wealth secured in a dubious way and his title to it is questionable, then it fails to fulfil the required conditions. In that tradition related by Abān¹ on the authority of Anas we read, "Blessed is the servant who expends from wealth which he has earned without sin." If the portion set apart [for the zakāh] is not of the best of a man's wealth he will then be guilty of misconduct for he keeps the best for himself or for his servant or for his family and withholds it from God, thereby giving preference to others over God. If he does the same thing with his guest and offers him the worst food to be found in his house, he will certainly gain his displeasure.

What we have discussed is from the standpoint of God, but if man were to view the matter from his own standpoint it would be inconceivable that he would give others the preference, especially since none of his wealth profits him excepting that which he has given in alms, thereby preserving for himself that which would have been lost if he had spent it on himself for an immediate purpose like, for example, eating. It is, therefore, foolish to limit one's attention to immediate things and neglect to store up for the future. Said God, "O ye who believe ! Bestow alms of the good things which ye have acquired, and of that which we have brought forth for you out of the earth, and choose not the bad for almsgiving,— such as ye would not take yourselves except by connivance."¹ In other words they will not accept such bad things for themselves except unwillingly and for fear of shame at its refusal. This is what connivance means. Therefore prefer not yourselves to God by giving him the bad and keeping the good for yourselves.

We also read in the tradition that "one single dirham has been preferred to a hundred thousand."² This obtains whenever man sets the dirham aside from the best portion of his wealth in a spirit of contentment and joy. On the other hand he may set aside a hundred thousand dirhams from a portion of his wealth which he loathes thereby proving that he will not give unto God anything which he likes. For the same reason God has condemned a group of people who have assigned to Him that which they loathe and abhor. He said, "Yet what they loathe themselves do they assign to God ; and their tongues-utter the lie, that theirs shall be a goodly lot. But beyond a doubt theirs is the Fire."³ In other words the Fire is their reward for assigning to God that which they themselves loathe and dislike.

The eighth duty is to seek for his sadaqah one worthy of it rather than simply be content that the recipient is one of the rank and file of the eight groups of beneficiaries. For among the rank and file of these eight groups are some possessing particular qualities.

2. Unidentified.
3. Sūrah XVI : 64.

1. Perhaps ibn-abi-ʿAyyāsh ; cf. ibn-Sa'd, vol. VII, pt. 2, p. 19.

Let him, therefore, be on the look out for these qualities and, in giving, let him take them into consideration.

These qualities are six in number and are as follows :

First he should seek the pious who have renounced the world and have devoted themselves exclusively to the affairs of the hereafter. The Apostle said, "Do not partake except of the food of a pious man and let no one partake of yours except the pious."¹ This is because the pious is aided by that food to lead a life of piety. Hence by aiding him you would be his partner in his acts of worship. The Apostle also said, "Set your food before the pious and bestow your favours upon the believers."² According to another version, "With your substance entertain those whom you love in God."³

One of the learned was wont to single out the poverty-stricken Sufis and feed them. On being told that it would be better if he would include all the poverty-stricken in his charity he said, "No ! These Sufis are devoting all their energies to God ; if they should come exposed to any need they might be discouraged or confused. Verily to revive the zeal of one single person devoted to God is better than giving alms to a thousand whose concern is this world." This was related to al-Junayd, and he approved of it saying, "Verily this man is one of the saints of God," and added, "It is a long long time since I heard words [200]. better than these." Sometime later it was related that this same man came upon hard times and decided to close shop. Thereupon al-Junayd sent him some money and said, "Make this your capital and do not close down your shop ; verily commerce has no ill-effect on men like you." This man was a grocer who charged the poor nothing for the groceries which they purchased at his shop.

Second, the recipient should be one of those who have devoted themselves to knowledge and learning., Such gifts and alms are a [great] help to him in his search after knowledge. And knowledge, when coupled with good intentions, is the noblest form of worship. Thus ibn-al-Mubārak was wont to give his alms exclusively to the devotees of learning. As a result he was told, "If only you would give others as well." He replied, "I know of no rank, next to that of prophecy, which is better or superior to the rank of the learned men. If one of them were to bother himself about his needs he would not be able to devote his time to knowledge or concentrate upon study. Therefore, it is better to give them all the leisure and help them to apply themselves exclusively to knowledge and learning."

Third, that the recipient be true in his piety and honest in his belief in God and in the acceptance of His unity. The sign of his belief in God and in His unity is to praise God and thank Him and to acknowledge that He is the source of his blessing and not attempt to ascribe it to another. He who is most grateful to God does this: he acknowledges that God is the source of all blessings. In Luqman's testament to his son he said, "Hold not between yourself and your God any intermediary benefactor and regard all other benefactors as instruments [in His hands] compelled to execute His will." He who gives thanks to anyone but God does not know the Benefactor and does not realize that the intermediary instrument [of benefaction] is under compulsion subject to the will of God who has subordinated [the intermediary instruments, i.e. the secondary causes] to the motives (dawā'ī) of action and has made the means [of execution] available unto them. Consequently, the giver makes his gift under compulsion, and once God has implanted in his heart that his well-being in this world and the next depends upon giving, he cannot neglect it even if he should so desire. When the impulse (bā'ih) becomes strong it demands the taking of a definite stand and the rising to immediate action,¹ with the result that a person will be unable to resist or contradict a strong impulse in which there is no room for indecision or hesitation. For it is God who creates impulses and arouses them to action; it is He who heals their weaknesses and does away with their indecision. He it is who imposes upon men the task of rising to action according to their impulses. And he who realizes this fact pays no attention except to the cause of causes (musabbib al-ashāb). Such a realization is of greater value to the giver than all the praise and thanks he may receive, [both] being nothing but chatter which is for the most part useless. [Hence] the opportunity to aid a believing worshipper should not be lost. But he, who gives praise when he receives a gift and wishes the giver good, will find fault when it is withheld from him and will curse whenever he despairs of receiving a gift.¹ Such persons, however, differ [as to the extent of their reactions].

It has been related that the Apostle of God once sent a gift to one of the poverty-stricken and charged the messenger to [be sure and] remember what the man would say. On receiving the gift sent to him by the Apostle the poverty-stricken man said, "Praise be to God who forgetteth not him who remembereth Him and neglecteth not him who is grateful unto Him." The poverty-stricken man then added, "O God! Thou hast not forgotten me; teach me therefore not to forget thee." The Apostle of God was informed of this, and he was well pleased and said, "I have known that he would say this. Behold, then, how he centred his attention on God alone."² At another time the Apostle ordered a certain man saying, "Repent." The man replied, "Before God alone I shall repent and not before Muhammad." Thereupon the Apostle said, "He has known to whom the prerogative belongs."

When, in connexion with the false rumour (qissat al-ifk)³ against 'A'ishah, her innocence was revealed, abu-Bakr, [her father], told her, "Get up and kiss the head of the Apostle of God." But 'Ā'ishah replied, "No! By the eternal I shall not do that and I shall thank no one except God." Thereupon the Apostle said, "Let her alone, O abu-Bakr."¹ According to another version 'Ā'ishah told abu-Bakr, I shall sing the praise of God, not yours nor that of your friend."² The Apostle did not find fault with what she said although the revelation [of her innocence] reached through the words of the Apostle himself. To see things [independent of God] and proceeding from a source other than Him is characteristic of the unbelievers. Thus God said, "And when God alone is mentioned the hearts of those who believe not in the hereafter is filled with disgust, but when those beside Him are mentioned, lo ! they are filled with joy."³ Consequently, he who does purify his inward soul from [the error of] seeing the secondary causes [201] except as instruments [in the hands of God] persists secretly in the sin of associating others with God. Let him therefore fear God and purify his belief from the defects and blemishes of associating others with God.

3. The rumour of improper intimacy between 'Ā'ishah and Safwān ibn-al-Mu'attal, during Muhammad's return from the expedition against the banu-al-Mustaliq (A.H. 6/A.D. 627-8), in which he was separated from her for an entire day, which she passed in the company of Safwān, who had found her when accidentally left behind. The scandal was propagated by one Mistah a relative of 'A'ishah. Sūrah XXIV: 4-26 were revealed to Muhammad shortly afterwards and the innocence of 'Ā'ishah was thereby established. See ibn-Hishām, Sirah, pp. 731-40.

The fourth quality is [that the recipient] be unknown, having concealed his need, and not much given to complaint and grumble. He should be one of the people of magnanimity who has lost his wealth but still keeps his magnanimous qualities and maintains his poise and self-restraint. Thus has God said, "Those who know them not, think them rich because of their modesty. By this their token thou shalt know them—they ask not of men importunately."¹ In other words they do not pester people begging because they are rich in their faith and proud in their fortitude. Such men should be sought by thorough investigation into the lives of religious men in every place and close examination of the inward states of men possessed of goodness and self-restraint. The reward for extending favours to them is manifold the reward of extending it to those who make known their needs and beg openly.

The fifth quality is that the recipient should be one who has to support a family or one disabled through sickness or some other cause, whose state corresponds to that which God described when He said, "There are among you the poverty-stricken, who being shut up to fighting for the cause of God, have it not in their power to strike out into the earth [for riches]."² In other words they are straitened in the way of the hereafter because of some sickness, or distress, or a change of heart. They are "unable to 'knock about' in the earth" because their wings, [as it were], are clipped and their limbs are tied down with shackles. For these reasons 'Umar was wont to give the people of the house (ahl-al- bayt)³ a whole flock of sheep numbering at least ten sheep. The Apostle himself used to bestow the gift in accordance to the size of the family.⁴ 'Umar was once asked about the greatest misfortune and he replied, "A big family and a small wealth."

The sixth is that he should be a relative close of kin so that the gift would be both a sadaqah and a favour to the close of kin. A favour to the close of kin has countless rewards. 'Ali said, "I had rather give one of my brothers a single dirham than give twenty dirhams in alms; and I had rather give my brother twenty than give away a hundred in alms;" and again, "I had rather give him a hundred dirhams than give a slave his freedom." Both friends and the brethren of good should be given precedence over acquaintances just as relatives are given precedence over non-relatives.

Let therefore these details be observed, since they are the required qualities. Each quality has several degrees of which the highest should be sought. If there should be found one who possesses in himself a number of these qualities, that man has taken hold of the greatest treasure and the most valuable booty. Whenever he tries to secure these qualities and is successful in his effort he gains two rewards; but if he fails he earns but one reward. One of his two rewards is the immediate purification of himself from the quality of niggardliness and the establishment of the love of God in his heart as well as [the will] to endeavour and labour in His worship. These are also the qualities which grow stronger and stronger in his heart and make him long to meet God. The second reward is the benefit which he reaps from the prayers and aspirations of the recipient, for the hearts of the righteous exert an immediate and an ultimate influence. If he succeeds [in securing these qualities] the two rewards obtain; but if he fails only the first reward is his. In this manner the reward of him who succeeds in his endeavour is doubled, both in this case and in the others as well.

SECTION III

On the Recipient, the Grounds for his Claim, and the Duties of Receiving

On the Grounds for the Claim. Know that to no one is the zakāh due except to a free Moslem belonging to one of the eight groups mentioned in the Book of God' and being neither a Hāshimite² nor a Muttalibite.³ No zakāh is expended to an unbeliever, or to a slave, or to a Hashimite, or to a Muttalibite. The minor and the insane, however, may enjoy the zakāh if they have a guardian (wali) to receive it on their behalf.

Let us now discuss each of the eight above mentioned groups.

The first group comprises the paupers (al-fuqarā').⁴ The pauper (al-faqīr) is he who has no wealth and is unable to earn a living. If the person possesses his daily food and clothing, he will not be a pauper but a poor man (miskīn).³ If he possesses half his daily food then he is a pauper. If he possesses a shirt but not a towel, or a shoe, or trousers and the value of the shirt be less than to enable him to secure these articles as it befits paupers, then he is a pauper because he lacks that which he needs and is unable to secure it. That the pauper should not possess anything except an article wherewith to cover his nakedness is inordinate and on the whole no such persons exist. Nor does the person cease to be in poverty because he is accustomed to beg. Therefore, begging is not considered a means of earning a living. But if the person is able to earn a living he will no longer be a pauper. If he were able to earn his living by means of an instrument which he does not possess, then he would be a pauper and it would be permissible to purchase the instrument for him. If he were able to earn a living [only] through means unworthy of his honour [202] and not befitting his station, then he would be a pauper. If he were a student of jurisprudence or law and work in order to earn his living would prevent him from continuing his studies then he would be regarded a pauper and his ability to secure a living will not be taken into consideration. If he were a devotee and work to secure a living would prevent him from fulfilling the act of worship and observing the set hours of prayer, let him work for his livelihood as much as possible because his work to earn a living is the more important. The Apostle said, "To seek an honest living is an obligation second only to a religious ordinance [in its importance]."¹ 'Umar said, "To earn a living in a dubious way is better than begging." If he were taken care of by his father or by one under obligation to support him, then he would not be a pauper because this manner of securing a livelihood is easier than earning it through work.

The second group comprises the poor (al-masākin).¹ A poor man (miskīn) is he whose income is not sufficient to cover his expenses. Thus, a person may possess a thousand dirhams and yet be poor while another may own nothing more than an ax and a rope and yet be rich. Neither the little house in which the man may be living nor the garment with which he covers his nakedness does remove him from the category of being poor. The same is true of the furniture of his little house. In other words nothing which, in his position and station, he needs and possesses would make any difference. [He may possess these things and yet be poor]. Similarly, the books of jurisprudence which he may possess do not make him rich, because he is in need of them. If he should possess nothing but these books he is under no obligation to pay the zakāh due on breaking the fast of Ramadān. The rule which governs the possession of books is the same as that which governs the possession of garments and home furniture, for a man is in need of all these. Nevertheless, he should understand the real need which the book fulfils. He needs it for three-purposes: for instruction, for deriving benefit for himself, and for recreation through reading. The last is not considered [a valid purpose] and involves the collection of books of poetry and

History and the like, none of which are of any use in the hereafter. The collection of such books is of no use in this world except as means of recreation and pleasure. These books are, therefore, sold for [the payment of] expiation and the zakāh due on breaking the fast of Ramadan, and their possession removes from the person the name of poor.

If he should possess some books for the pleasure of using them in instruction in order to earn his livelihood, in the same way as the tutor and the teacher do in return for a certain fee, books would then be his tools and, therefore, would not be sold. The rule which governs them is the same as that which governs the tools of tailors and other artisans.

If his purpose in collecting books were to study for the fulfilment of a fard kifāyah they would not be sold and his possession of them would not rob him of the name poor, because the need for such study is grave.

The collection of books for the purpose of deriving benefits from them and for the sake of learning their contents for himself, such as his collecting medical books in order to [learn how to] administer treatment to himself, or books of sermons in order to read their admonitions and heed their warning, is not necessary at all if a physician or a preacher were living in town. Otherwise, he needs them. Again he may not need to read a certain book except after the lapse of a certain period of time, in which event the book should be retained as long as its owner needs it. The most reasonable thing to say is that whatever the man does not need within the course of the current year may be spared and dispensed with.

1. Sing, miskīn, for which poor or a poor man has been used throughout this book.

If a person should have something left over from his daily food he would be under obligation to pay the zakāh due on breaking the fast of Ramadan. Since we reckon food on the basis of a day we should reckon home furniture and bodily clothing on the basis of a year. Consequently, the summer clothes are not sold in winter time nor the winter clothes in the summer. And books in this respect, have closer resemblance to clothes and furniture than to anything else.

A person may possess two copies of the same book and therefore has need of only one of them. If he should say that the one was more correct while the other was more beautiful and therefore he would need both of them, we would say, "You should be content with the more correct copy and sell the more beautiful, and you should let pleasure and luxury alone." If he should have two versions of a work on the same subject, the one extensive and the other brief, and his purpose of having the work should be deriving benefit for himself, let him content himself with the extensive, but if his purpose should be one of instruction and teaching, he would then be in need of both the extensive and brief versions for each possesses distinctive features not found in the other.

Cases like these are numerous and unlimited, and therefore, have not been dealt with in the science of jurisprudence. We have not touched upon the subject under jurisprudence, but mention it here because of the wide-spread nature of these and similar conditions and to paint out that the position here taken is superior to the others. Nevertheless, it is impossible to exhaust the study of all these cases because such an undertaking will require the further investigation into each particular house, its size, the quantity, number, and kind of its furniture, and even the kind of clothing the person possesses. These things have no exact definitions and each jurispudent applies his own interpretation in an attempt to perfect definitions and thereby avoid the dangers of dubiosities. The pious person choses the safest course of conduct, abandoning what causes him to doubt what does not cause him to doubt. The ambiguous intermediate positions which fall between the two definite and clear opposite extremes are indeed numerous and nothing saves a person from being entangled in them except [extreme] precaution.

The third group comprises the agents (al-'āmilūn).¹ These are the workers who collect the zakāh except the caliph and the judge. [The list] includes the superintendent ('arīf), the recorder (kātib), the collector (mustawfi), the keeper (hāfiz), and the porter (maqqāl). They are paid alike, and if any money is left from the eighth [of the whole] after all have been paid it is transferred to the [portion of the other] groups, and if [the amount] proves too little it will be supplemented from other revenues.

The fourth group comprises those whose hearts are reconciled [to Islam] (al-mu'allafah qulūbuhum).² These are the nobles who embraced Islam. They are

1. Sūrah IX : 60.

1. See above, p. 23.

obeyed and respected among their followers, and by giving them [a portion of the zākāh] they are confirmed in Islam while their peers and followers are attracted and encouraged.

The fifth group comprises those in captivity (al-mukatabūn).¹ Their portion is paid to their masters although it is permissible to pay it directly to them. The master, however, does not pay any of his zakāh to the slave who is ransoming himself because the latter is still his slave.

The sixth group comprises those in debt (al-ghārimūn).² A debtor is a pauper who has borrowed [some money for the execution of something] righteous something permissible. If he should borrow the money for an evil purpose he should not be given it unless he should repent. If he were rich, his debt should not be settled [with money from the zakāh funds] unless he had incurred his debt for the welfare [of the community] or for the settlement of a dispute or an outbreak [of violence].

[203] The seventh group comprises the warriors (ghuzāh)³ who are not inscribed in the commissary registry (dīwān al-murtaziqah). Although they may be wealthy they receive a portion of the zakāh as a subsidy in time of war.

The eighth group comprises the wayfarers (sing. ibn-al-sabūl). A wayfarer is one who has set out from his own town on a trip the purpose of which is not evil, or one passing the town for a purpose of the same nature. If such a person were a pauper (faqīr) he would be given aid [from the zakāh fund], and if he were possessed of some wealth in another place he would be given aid in accordance to his need.

If you should say, "How then are these qualities known ?", we would say : Pauperism (faqr) and poverty (maskanah) depend upon the word of the recipient, who should not be required to produce any evidence or swear an oath. Rather, he should be taken at his word if he were not an established liar. War and travel are matters of the future. Consequently, anyone who announces his intention of embarking on a war expedition should be taken at his word and given aid from the zakāh fund. If he should not carry out his announced intention the aid which was given to him should be withdrawn and taken back. As to the other groups evidence should be produced.

These are then the grounds for the claim. As to the amount which is given to each, a discussion of it is forthcoming.

On the Duties of the Recipient

The duties of the recipient are five. The first duty is that the recipient should know that God has ordained the expenditure of [a portion of] zakāh on him for the purpose of removing his cares and to make all his worries into one single [concern]. For God has imposed upon creation the requirement that their concern in life be focused upon one thing, namely God himself and the last day. This is what is meant by the words of God when He said, "And I have not created jinn and men but that they should worship Me."¹ But whereas [divine] wisdom has ordained that man should be subject to desires and needs which divert his attention [from devotion to God, divine] generosity ordained that he be blessed with bounties sufficient to meet those needs. Consequently, God made wealth abundant and caused it to flow into the hands of His servants to be for them a means wherewith to meet their needs and free themselves from want in order to devote their time exclusively to His worship and service. To some He gave plentifully and made their wealth a cause of plague and torment, thereby exposing them to the danger [of destruction]. Others He loved and consequently shielded from [the evils of] this world, in the same way as a pitying man guards his patient against injuries. Consequently, He removed from them the luxuries of this world and gave them provisions according to their necessities by placing upon the rich the responsibility of supplying their needs, so that the task of toiling and labouring to earn a living might fall on the rich, while its benefits flow to the paupers [and the poor]. As a result [the paupers and the poor] can devote their lives to the worship of God and prepare themselves for what lies beyond death. Neither the luxuries of this world will divert them from the worship of God nor poverty and distress from the preparation for the hereafter. Of such is the ideal grace and blessings. Therefore it befits the poverty-stricken to know the value of poverty and to realize that the bounty of God to him is more [manifest] in those things which God has withheld from him than in those which He has granted him, as we shall establish and explain in the Book on Poverty. Let him therefore, accept whatever God has given him in way of livelihood and regard it as an aid for him in his worship of God, and let him, [when enjoying these gifts], have only one single purpose : that through them he may receive strength to serve Him. If, however, he finds himself unable to do this let him expend those gifts and use them for the attainment of those things which God has made permissible.

If he should use (these gifts) as an aid to disobey God he would be ungrateful to God, denying His blessings and deserving His disfavour and wrath.

The second duty of the recipient is that he should thank the giver, wish him good, and speak well of him. His good wishes, however, should be such as would not remove the giver from being only an instrument [in the hands of God], rather it should bring out the fact that the giver is only the means through which the grace of God has been extended to him and by which it has reached him. It is true that the means have their own place and importance but this does not and should not prevent the recipient from acknowledging that all blessings come to him from God. The Apostle of God said, "He who is not grateful to men is not grateful to God." Furthermore, God Himself praised and commended his servants at several occasions for their good works although He

1. Al-Tirmidhi, al-Barr w-al-Silah : 35.

Himself is the creator of those works and the author of man's ability and will to do them. Thus He said, "How excellent a servant, one who turned to Us was he !",¹ as well as other similar things.

In his good wishes for the giver, let the recipient say, "May God purify thy heart together with the hearts of the righteous, and with the good works of the upright and virtuous may He render thy works acceptable and just, and along with the spirits of the martyrs may He bless thine." The Apostle said "Whoever doeth unto you a favour, recompense him, but if ye be not able to do so, wish him good until ye ascertain that ye have recompensed him."²

Among the signs of gratitude is to overlook and conceal the defects of the gift whenever it is defective, and to avoid belittling and finding fault with it. Nor should the recipient reproach the giver with stinginess if the latter should withhold [something] from him. On the contrary he should magnify the man's gift both before men and before himself ; for it is the duty of the giver to belittle his gift, and the duty of the recipient is to magnify it and show his gratitude. Each man should, therefore fulfil his duty. There is no discrepancy in this because the belittling of the gift and the magnifying of it counter balance each other. It is beneficial, therefore, for the giver to observe the methods of belittling his gifts while the opposite process is harmful to him.

All this does not militate against seeing and acknowledging that all blessings come from God.

1. Sūrah XXXVIII : 44.

2. Al-Tayālisi: 1895.

He who fails to realize that the means through which he had received the blessing is nothing but an instrument [in the hands of God] goes astray ; and to regard the instrument as the origin is evil and disapproved.

The third duty of the recipient is that he should examine what he receives and if he should find out that it was not of a lawful source he should abstain therefrom. For he who fears God will be given his livelihood by God from whence he does not reckon. And he who abstains from what is unlawful will not suffer want but will receive his needs from lawful sources [opened to him by God]. Let him therefore accept nothing from the Turks, the soldiers, the agents of magistrates, and those whose income is mostly unlawful, unless he be in dire distress. Similarly, if he does not definitely know to whom the gift which has been offered to him belongs, [204] he may take of it according to his need and necessity. The legal opinion on this kind [of property] is that it should be given away in alms as will be explained in the Book on the Lawful and the Unlawful. For if the person were unable to avail himself of something lawful and had to take what was within reach, his taking of it would not constitute partaking of the zakāh because no zakāh would obtain when the property on which it had been paid is unlawful.

The fourth duty of the recipient is to guard against the pitfalls of doubt and ambiguity regarding the amount of the zakāh which he may take. He should not take anything except the amount permissible to him to take, and should not touch it unless he were certain that his claim to it was established. If his claim were through a deed of manumission (kitābah)¹ or through a debt, he should not take anything in excess of that debt ; and if his claim were through his work as a collector he should not accept anything more than his rightful share—if he were offered more he should decline the offer. For the money does not belong to the giver so that he can dispense with it as he wishes. If the recipient were travelling he should not take anything in excess to the amount sufficient to defray the expenses of his provisions and the cost of hiring the mount to the place of his destination. If he were on a war expedition he should not take anything beyond what he needs for war, especially horses and arms, the amount of which and the expenses thereof are determined independently and have no limit. The same is true of the provisions of travel. The pious thing for the recipient to do is to ignore what causes him to doubt for what does not cause him to doubt.

If he should receive something on the grounds of poverty, he should first examine the furniture of his house as well as his clothes and books and see whether there are things with which he could dispense or expensive things which he could exchange for cheaper ones and expend the difference. All these things depend primarily on his own choice and opinion and involve two [opposite] states : one which clearly establishes that he is deserving and the other that he is not. Between the two lie several uncertain and questionable states. And he who plays with fire is liable to get burned. In this thing one has to rely upon the word of the recipient and take it as its face value. The needy persons, in estimating their needs, are either very strict or very generous. The pious is apt to be very strict while the unscrupulous is inclined to be generous to an extent where he deems himself in need of many [unnecessary] things, all of which the Law abhors.

When the amount of his need has been definitely ascertained, he should not reach for more but should take an amount sufficient for his need over a period of one year beginning with the time of payment. For this is the limit which the Law allows, since with the lapse of each year the source of the income increases. Furthermore, the Apostle of God [was wont] to store up the provisions of one whole year for his family.¹ This is the nearest thing towards a definition of the status of the pauper and the poor. If the recipient would limit himself to the need of one month or even that of one day he would draw closer to piety.

The views and opinions held by the learned men with regard to the amount which a person could receive from the zakāh and the sadaqah are varied and many. Some would go to the limit in reducing the amount and require that the person limit himself to no more than his daily food, insisting on following the words of the tradition which Sahl ibn-al-Hanzaliyah¹ related to the effect that the Apostle of God had forbidden a person to beg because he was rich. On being asked what made that person rich the Apostle replied, "[His ability to procure] his dinner and supper."² Others said that a person may receive as much as he wishes provided he does not go beyond the limit which separates the rich from the poor. This limit is [marked by the possession of] the minimum amount³ on which the zakāh is due. Others hold, that it is [marked by the possession of] fifty dirhams or the possession of its equivalent in gold, basing their opinion on a tradition reported on the authority of ibn-Mas'ūd who related that the Apostle of God once said, "He who begs despite the fact that he has riches sufficient for his needs will be brought forth on the day of resurrection with his face full of scars and scratches." On being asked "What manner of riches will suffice his needs?", he replied. "Fifty dirhams or their equivalent in gold."⁴ It has been said, however, that the reporter□ of this tradition was not reliable. Others still say that the possession of forty dirhams or their equivalent in gold marks the distinction between the rich and the poor, and

5. The chain of authority (isnād) given by al-Nasā'i is as follows : Ahmad the Sulayman, Yahya ibn-Adam, Sufyan al-Tbawri, Hakim ibn-Jubayr, Muhammad ibn-'Abd-al-Rahman ibn-Yazid, his father, 'Abdullah ibn-Mas'ūd, the Apostle. The weak link was Hakim ibn-Jubayr. Consequently, al-Nasā'i states that Sufyan had heard the same tradition from Zubayd (ibn-al-Hārith) on the same authority. Al-Nasā'i Zakāh : 87.

base their contention on a tradition from the isnād of which a name has dropped (munqati'), related by 'Atā' ibn-Yasār to the effect that the Apostle of God once said, "He who begs while he possesses an ounce¹ [of gold] is insolent in his begging."²

On the other hand others have gone to the extreme in generosity and said, that a person may take as much as would buy him a whole village which will make him independent for the rest of his life, or as much as would establish him in a business that will make him secure for the rest of his days, since this is what they believe a rich person should have. 'Umar said, "When ye give, enrich [those whom ye give]." Consequently, some have gone as far as to say that if a person should lose his wealth and be reduced to poverty, he might take [of the zakāh] as much as would restore him to his former state, even though the amount be ten thousand dirhams. But if he should go beyond the limits of moderation [he should be restrained].

When abu-Talhah³ became too much occupied with his garden so as to neglect the observance of the prayer he announced his intention to give it away as a sadaqah, but the Apostle said to him, [205] "It is better that you give it to your relatives."⁴ Thereupon he settled the garden on Hassān^s and abu-Qatādah.¹ A grove of palms, therefore, is sufficient for two and is more than what they need. 'Umar once gave a Bedouin a she-camel and a young camel it was nursing. These instances are related in support of generosity [in the distribution of the zakāh].

As to the strict [practice of distribution] which will reduce [the benefits of the zakāh to an amount equal] to the daily food [of the individual] or to an ounce of gold, it has been mentioned in connexion with the aversion to begging and frequenting the house-door both of which are disapproved and are subject to another rule. In fact to permit the person to receive of the zakāh as much as would enable him to buy a whole village so that he might become independent for the rest of his life is more probable although it is apt to be extravagant. More moderate is to take an amount sufficient for the current year. To exceed this limit is dangerous and to fall short of it causes distress.

In all these things, unless the Law offers a definite restriction, the independent interpreter of the Law can do nothing but hand down a judgment according to the best of his knowledge and say to the pious [inquirer] what the Apostle himself had said, namely "Consult your own heart although you have been given a dispensation [once, twice, or thrice]." ² But since "sin is heart alluring," the recipient should, whenever he is tempted to take anything [unlawful], fear God and not justify his act by a dispensation which he received from learned men [versed] in the letter of the Law [but not in its spirit]. For their dispensations are [subject] to rules and regulations, particular and general, dictated by necessity and expedience and are full of conjectures and dubious [points]. To guard against such dubiousities is characteristic of men of religion and travellers on the path of the hereafter.

The fifth duty of the recipient is to inquire of the owner of the money concerning the amount of his obligation. If the owner should offer him an amount higher than one eighth of the whole zakāh, he should refuse to accept, for, together with the members of his group, he is entitled only to one eighth of the whole zakāh. He, therefore, should deduct from the sum which comprises one eighth of the whole an amount equal to the share of two members of his group.

This inquiry is obligatory on most people, since they usually do not take into consideration this division of the sum [into eight parts and the one eighth into at least three portions], either because of ignorance or because of neglect. It is, however, permissible to ignore the inquiry into these things if it does not appear [to the recipient] that there is in them anything which will make them seem probably unlawful. The questions relating to begging and the different degrees of probability will be discussed in the Book on the Lawful and the Unlawful.

Consequently, he will be on a par with the giver who, through his gifts, seeks the welfare of his own religion.

The Apostle was once asked, “Which sadaqah is best?” To which he replied, “That which you give when you are in good health and expect many more years of life, despite the fact that your resources are meagre and regardless of your fear of want, not that which you give when you are on your death-bed.”□ On another occasion the Apostle addressed his Companions saying, “Give alms.” Thereupon one of

On the Excellence of the *Sadaqah*¹

The excellence of the sadaqah is attested by the following traditions. The Apostle said, "Give alms even a single date, for it will satisfy the hunger [of the starving] and does away with sin as the water extinguishes the flames."² He also said, "Guard yourselves against Hellfire even by giving half a date, and if ye have none to give, speak a kindly word."³ And again, "No Moslem will ever give a bushel of dates from wealth lawfully earned, and God accepts nothing but the lawful, without its being accepted by God, who will tend it in the same way as any one of you tends his young camel or colt, until it grows and multiplies so as to become as great as [Mt.] Uhud."⁴ The Apostle also said to abu-al-Dardā', "If you happen to cook some soup be sure to put plenty of water and to invite your neighbours them said, "I have one dinar," and the Apostle replied, "Spend it on yourself." The man then said, "I have another dinar," and the Apostle answered, "Spend it on your wife." Again the man said, "I have another," and the Apostle replied, "Spend it on your child." Once again the man said, "I have another," and the Apostle answered, "Spend it on your servant." When for the last time the man said, "I have another dinar," the Apostle replied, "You should know best how to dispense with it."

At another time the Apostle said "The sadaqah for the family of Muhammad is unlawful because it is made of men's filth." ² And again, "Remove from the beggar the necessity of begging, even though it be with a morsel of food as small as the head of a bird." ³ He also said, "Had the beggar been truthful, no one who had turned him empty away would prosper." ⁴ Jesus said, "The angels will not enter the house of him who turneth a beggar empty away." ⁵ It was the practice of our own Prophet to insist on doing certain things himself and to entrust their performance to no one. These were getting ready his ablution water at night and setting it aside under a cover and handing the alms to the poor with his own hand.⁶ The Apostle said, "The poor man is not he who is dismissed with a couple of dates, or a

In history the excellence of the sadaqah is attested by the following :

'Urwah ibn-al-Zubayr ³ once said, " [During her life time] 'Ā'ishah gave fifty thousand [dinars] in alms, yet her garment was full of patches." Commenting on the words of God, "Who for His love bestow their food on the poor, the orphans, and the captives,"⁴ Mujāhid said, "This means that though longing for it themselves, they give their food to the poor, the orphans, and the captives." 'Umar [ibn al-Khattab] was want to say, "O God ! Grant plenty and abundance unto the generous among us; haply they may share it with those of us who are in need." 'Abd-al-'Aziz ibn-'Umar in B which reading is correct. 'Abd-al-'Aziz ibn-'Umar died in A.H. 68/A.D. 764 ; see al-Tabari, vol. III, p. 40 ; Shadharāt al-Dhahab, vol. I, p. 219.

throne." Ibn-abi-al-Ja'd said, "Verily a single sadaqah closes away seventy gates of evil." He also regarded secret alms seventy times superior to those given in public, and that each [is capable of] dislocating the jaws of seventy devils. Ibn-Mas'ūd said, "Once upon a time there was a man who for seventy years worshipped and obeyed God. Then suddenly he committed a grave sin and marred his record. One day he passed by a poor man and gave him a loaf of bread. Thereupon God forgave his sin and restored to him the credit of the seventy years of worship and obedience."

Luqmān once told his son, "Whenever you commit a sin [atone for it by] giving alms." At another time Yahya ibn-Mu'ādh said, "I know of no grain which outweighs the mountains of the whole world except the grain of alms." On another occasion 'Abd-al-'Aziz ibn-Rawwād¹ said, "It used to be said that three things were among the treasures of Paradise. These were: concealing one's illness, giving alms in secret, and maintaining silence under afflictions." This has also been related as an authentic tradition the isnād of which goes back to the Apostle.

'Umar ibn-al-Khattāb said, "Once upon a time the works of man vied with one another in excellence and the sadaqah declared its superiority to all the rest." It was the custom of 'Abdullāh ibn-'Umar to give sugar in alms saying, "I have heard God say, 'Ye shall never attain righteousness until ye give alms of that which ye love,'² and God knows that I am fond of sugar."

Al-Nakha'i said once, "If anything be set aside for God it should have no defect, for that would displease me."

'Ubayd ibn-'Umayr¹ once said, "On the day of resurrection people will be assembled for judgment as hungry as ever, as thirsty as ever, and as naked as ever. Those who, in their lifetime, for love of God have given the hungry something wherewith to satisfy their hunger, will be filled; those who have given the thirsty something wherewith to quench their thirst, will be refreshed; and those who have given the naked something wherewith to clothe themselves, will be clothed."

[207] Al-Hasan [al-Basri] said, "If God had so desired He could have made you all rich, not a single poor or pauper among you. But He had willed that some of you be responsible for the support of the others." At another time al-Sha'bi said, "He who does not regard his need to the reward attending his alms greater than that of the recipients of the alms themselves renders his almsgiving useless and, as it were, smites his own face therewith." On another occasion Mālik said, "We see no harm in the rich man's drinking of the water which he has donated to be served in the mosque, because such water is intended for the use of the thirsty in general and not solely for the benefit of the needy and the poor."

Once upon a time al-Hasan [al-Basri] passed by a slave-trader accompanied by a maid for sale. Turning to the trader al-Hasan said, "Would you accept a dirham or two for the maid ?” “No,” said the trader. Thereupon al-Hasan replied, “Then go your way. God Himself has been content with but a farthing and a single mouthful for a dark-eyed houri.”¹

On Secrecy and Publicity in the Giving of Alms

The paths of the seekers after truth have diverged in pursuing this subject. Some have been disposed to give secrecy the preference while others have been inclined to regard publicity as the more excellent. We shall now discuss the meaning of each, point out the good and the evil therein, and finally bring to light the exact truth of the whole matter.

Secrecy has five advantages. The first is that it better conceals the identity of the recipient. For his receiving alms in public is disgraceful to his manhood. It bares his need and obliges him to relinquish the desirable qualities of self-restraint and temperance, qualities because of which he is regarded rich by the ignorant.

The second [advantage] is that the maintenance of secrecy in the giving of alms is safer for the hearts and the tongues of men who may be otherwise moved to envy and driven to reproach by thinking that the person has received aid without really needing it or that he has taken more than he actually needs. For envy, suspicion, and backbiting are among the major sins, and to guard men against such sins is very important. Ayyūb al-Sakhtiyānī² once said, “Indeed it has always been my practice to avoid putting on a new garment lest I provoke the spirit of jealousy and envy in my neighbours.” Another ascetic said, “Many a time I would relinquish one thing and refrain from another simply for the sake of my brethren who might have wondered wherefrom I have gotten them.”

It has also been related that Ibrāhīm al-Taymī was once seen wearing a new shirt and consequently some of his brethren asked him saying, “Wherefrom have you gotten this ?” To which he replied, “It was given to me by my brother Khaythamah,¹ but if I had known that his family had any knowledge of it I would have not accepted it.”

The third [advantage] of secrecy is that it aids the giver to keep his good works secret, for to give in secret is far superior to giving in public, and to help one do good is itself good. But secrecy is broken whenever the news are made known to more than two individuals, at which time the identity of the giver becomes public property.

A certain man once gave one of the learned men something in public but the latter declined the offer. At another time another person gave him something in secret and he accepted it. Questioned concerning [his behaviour] he said, “This man has acted with politeness and concealed his good deed, consequently I accepted his gift. The other has acted rudely, therefore I rejected his gift.”

A certain Sufi was once given something in the midst of a crowd publicly, but he refused to accept it. Thereupon the giver said to him, “Do you reject that which God has given thee ?” The Sufi replied saying, “You have associated others besides God in that which pertains to Him alone. Therefore I return to you your sin of association.” On another occasion one of the gnostics accepted in secret something which he had rejected in public. Asked [by the giver concerning his action] he replied, “You have publicly disobeyed God but I refused to be your accomplice in your sin. When, however, you obeyed Him in, secret, I helped you in your obedience.” At another time al-Thawri said, “If I were sure that there was among them one who would not talk about or discuss his alms I would have accepted his gifts.”

1. Cf. Sūrah LVI : 22-3.

2. Also al-Sakhtiyānī ; died A.H. 131/A.D. 748-9 ; see ibn-Sa'd, vol. VII, pt. 2. pp. 14-17 ; ibn-Qutaybah, pp. 238-9 ; al-Sam'ānī, fol. 2926-293a.

The fourth [advantage of secrecy is that it helps to spare the recipient the humiliation attending the receipt of alms in public]. For to receive alms in public is humiliating and insulting to the recipient, and the believer need not expose himself to humiliation. Thus one of the learned men was wont to accept alms in secret, but refuse them in public saying, “To receive alms in public is degrading to learning and humiliating to its torch bearers. Hence I never accept anything which degrades learning and humiliates its torch bearers.”

The fifth [advantage] is avoiding [the necessity of] sharing [the alms with those who may be present at the time of giving]. For the Apostle said, “Those who happen to be present when a man receives a gift are his partners therein.”¹ That the gift is silver or gold does not change its being a gift. The Apostle said, “The best gift which a man can give his brother is silver or bread.” He thus made silver by itself a gift.

1. Unidentified.

In short the practice of giving in the presence of a crowd publicly is viewed with disfavour unless it is done with the consent of all present. Even then the practice is questionable.

Publicity in the giving of alms as well as open discussion of gifts has four advantages. These are as follows:

The first advantage of publicity is that it promotes sincerity, truthfulness, freedom from affectation and hypocrisy.

The second advantage of publicity is that it does away with vainglory and haughtiness, affirming servitude to God and poverty instead. It frees man from pride and self-sufficiency, and makes him indifferent to popular acclaim. A certain gnostic once said to one of his disciples, “Do not, under any condition, conceal the fact that you have been the recipient of alms. For when you receive alms and hide not the fact one of two things will ensue : either you lose favour with some people, a thing which is safer for your religion and more wholesome to your soul, or grow in the regards of others because you have revealed the truth. This is exactly what your brother desires because his reward increases [208] as your love to him grows greater and your respect to him becomes more profound. You also would be rewarded if you were instrumental in bringing about the increase in his reward.”

The third advantage is that the gnostic is not mindful of anybody other than God. His attitude to Him is the same in secret and in public. Consequently, and disagreement or difference between the attitude of the individual towards God in secret and his attitude towards Him in public constitutes a sin against the Unity of God. Thus one of the gnostics once said, "We were wont to pay no attention to the prayers of him whose practice it was to accept [alms] in secret and reject them in public." To aim at pleasing men, whether they are at the moment present or absent, impairs the state [of mind which man should have towards God]. Man should, therefore, be mindful of no one other than the one and only God.

The story has been told that a certain teacher was extremely fond of one of his pupils (sing. murīd) but the other pupils resented the [apparent] favouritism. The teacher, desiring to prove to the pupils the superiority of his favourite, give each one of them, including the favourite, a chicken and ordered them to disband into solitary spots where each could kill his chicken without being seen by anyone else. All except the favourite pupil did what the teacher asked them to do. On being asked by the teacher why he failed to carry out his command, the favourite pupil replied, "I could not find a secluded place where no one would see me, because wherever I went God saw me." Thereupon the teacher said, "It is for this reason that I favour this pupil, because he is mindful of no one but God."

The fourth is that publicity fulfils the obligation of gratitude. God said, ""Declare the bounty of the Lord."

' Secrecy, on the other hand, is a denial of that bounty, and God has condemned those who conceal His bounties unto them describing them with niggardliness. Thus he said, "[Verily, God loveth not the proud, the vain boaster] who are niggardly themselves, and bid others to be niggards, and hide away what God hath of his bounty given them." ¹ The Apostle said, "Whenever God bestows a bounty upon one of His servants, He likes the bounty to be seen." ²

A certain person once gave something to one of the virtuous, who immediately displayed the gift saying, "This is something from this world wherein publicity is best, but in matters pertaining to the hereafter secrecy is best." For this reason a certain person said, "If you are given something in the presence of a crowd accept it, later returning it in private."

Gratitude and thankfulness for alms is highly recommended. The Apostle said, "He who is not grateful to men is not grateful to God." ³ Gratitude takes the place of reward to such an extent that the Apostle once said, "Whoever doeth unto you a favour recompense him, but if ye be not able to do so, wish him good until ye ascertain that ye have recompensed him." ⁴

When on one day the emigrants were discussing with the Apostle the question of gratitude and thanks they said, "O Apostle of God, never have we seen anybody in whose house we lived as guests and whose property we shared, without fearing that he would run away with all the reward." Thereupon the Apostle replied, "[Fear not], for your thanks and praise are as good as compensation."

1. Sūrah IV :41.

4. Al-Tayālisi : 1895.

Now that you have seen these various advantages know that the differences which exist in them are in reality not basic differences in the problem itself but rather differences in the attitudes [of men] towards the problem. The gist of the matter is that we do not rule that privacy is, under all conditions, the best practice, or the publicity is the best. Rather they differ as the intentions differ, and the intentions in turn differ as the attitudes and the individuals differ. Consequently, the sincere person should watch himself carefully lest he be misled by vanity and beguiled by the deception of nature and the artifice of the devil. Artifice and deception are more prevalent in privacy than in publicity, although they affect both. Deception enters into privacy through the predilection of [human] nature to it, especially because it helps to maintain one's prestige and position before men, shields him against their disfavour and contempt, and spares him the necessity of acknowledging the giver as a benefactor and philanthropist. It is a virulent disease which afflicts the soul and through which the devil brings the advantages of privacy home to the individual, thereby persuading him to justify his behaviour with [one of] the five points which we have mentioned [in favour of privacy]. The criterion of this as well as its acid test is one single thing, namely that the suffering which the individual undergoes, because the fact of his receiving alms has been made public, be just as acute as the suffering which he experiences when one of his adversaries or opponents has received alms and the news of his receiving them has been made known. For if he were interested in shielding people against calumny, envy, and suspicion or desirous to avoid betraying a confidence and anxious to aid a giver conceal his gifts, as well as to safeguard learning against [disgrace and the learned men against] insult, he should know that all these things would result from making public his brother's receipt of alms [just as they would result from making public his own]. If the exposure of his own is harder on him than that of others, then his apprehensions regarding these considerations are untrue and false, resulting from the artifice and the deception of the devil.

Furthermore, to disgrace and discredit learning is forbidden not because it is the learning of this or the other person but simply because it is learning itself. Calumny is forbidden because it is the defamation of a person's honour as such, not because it is the vilification of a particular person's honour.

Anyone observing this point may prove too strong for the devil to subdue, otherwise he will be a man of much activity but little success.

On the other hand human nature may incline to publicity, because through it the individual humours the giver and pleases him thereby encouraging him to do the same again. Moreover by making the receipt of alms known to the public, the recipient reveals himself extremely grateful so that people might become disposed to honour him and ready to inquire about him and help him.

This is a virulent disease which afflicts the heart. [209] The devil, however, cannot prevail over the religious except by presenting such corruption to him as a part of the Law, telling him that open gratitude is a part of the Law, while concealing it is hypocritical, and reciting to him all the various advantages which we have already mentioned in connexion with publicity in order to induce him to make public his thanks. Man's inner purpose and motive, however, is that which we have already described, namely to make people better disposed to help him and be gracious unto him.

The criterion of this as well as its acid test is that the individual should compare his readiness to be thankful in cases where his thanks are neither revealed to the giver nor to the person who intends to extend to him his aid with his readiness to be thankful in the presence of persons who dislike making their gifts known but desire to keep them secret and whose custom is not to give except to one who keeps the news of their gifts secret and refrains from giving thanks. If both these conditions appear equal to him his motive would then truly be the observance of the Law by gratitude and articulate thankfulness. Otherwise, he is deluded. Again if he were moved to gratitude and thanks by the demands of the Law, he should not neglect to fulfil his duty -to the giver. If the latter were fond of being thanked publicly the recipient should hide his gratitude and not express his thanks, because it is his duty not to aid the giver to sin, since his expectation of thanks is sinful. But if he should find out that the giver is not fond of being thanked and does not expect or seek it, the recipient should then thank him openly and make his gift known to the public. For this reason the Apostle of God said of the person who was praised in his presence, "You have overdone his praise ; verily if he were to hear it he would fail," although the Apostle was wont to praise people to their face. This is because he had confidence in their faith and because he was sure that his praise would not harm them but rather would increase their desire and encourage them to do good. On another occasion the Apostle said [pointing] to a certain visitor, "Behold this man is the master of all Bedouins (ahl al-wabar)."² Referring to another he said, "When a celebrity visits you honour him."³ At another time he heard someone talk and, being pleased with his speech, said, "Verily there is magic in eloquent speech."⁴ He also said, "If any of you should see something worthy in his brother, he should tell him of it for that would make him more desirous to do good."⁵ And again, "Whenever the believer is praised, belief grows stronger in his heart."⁶

1. Cf al-Bukhārī, Adab : 54.

2. Ahl al-wabar is literally the inhabitants of hair tents, i.e. The nomads or the Bedouins. The reference is to Qays ibn-'Asim who appeared before the Apostle and embraced Islam. Qays died A.H. 47/A.D. 667-8; see ibn-Sa'd, vol. VII, pt. I, pp. 23-4 ; ibn-Qutaybah, pp 153-4 ; al-Aghānī, Vol. XII, pp. 149-158; abu-al-Fidā', vol. I, pp. 196-7.

3 Ibn Mājah, Adab : 19.

4. Al-Bukhārī, Nikāh : 48.

5. Unidentified.

6. Unidentified.

Al-Thawri once said, "He who knows himself will not be harmed by the praise of men." On another occasion he said to Yūsuf ibn-Asbāt, "Whenever I do you a favour I am more pleased with it than you are because I regard it as one of the blessings of God upon me. Consequently, I give thanks to God. Unless I see my favour in this light my gratitude will be false."

These details should be observed by anyone who watches his heart, for without these details the works of the senses are the laughing-stock of the devil and the object of his ridicule and malice especially for what seems to be much activity but little profit. It is such knowledge which is described by the following saying, namely, "Learning one point of such knowledge is better than a year of worship." For through this knowledge worship becomes a living and a vital thing and without it, it dwindles and comes to nought. In short, to take in public and to reject in private is the best and safest policy to follow. Furthermore, no one, in rejecting a gift, should be excessive in his protestations of unworthiness. Rather his knowledge should be complete so that both privacy and publicity would be the same to him. Such a state is like red sulphur, often heard of but never seen.

On which is Better, to Accept Aid from the Sadaqah or from the Zakāh¹

Both Ibrāhīm al-Khawwās and al-Junayd, as well as many others, held that accepting aid from the sadaqah fund was better than accepting it from the zakāh money, because in sharing the latter the individual competes with the poor and diminishes their means. Furthermore, he may not be able to establish his claim to the benefit from the zakāh money or prove himself actually deserving in accordance with the qualifications set down in the Glorious Book. But the sadaqah is more general.

1. As has been shown before the term zakāh represents the legal alms and sadaqah, the voluntary. Al-Ghazzālī has so far used the two terms interchangeably ; now however he uses the sadaqah for the voluntary alms and the zakāh for the legal and obligatory.

Others have said that a person should accept aid from the zakāh fund rather than from the sadaqah money, because in so doing he would be fulfilling the Law.¹ Thus, if all the poor should refrain from accepting aid from the zakāh fund they would sin. A person should accept [his portion of] the zakāh [not only] because it places him under no obligation but also because it has been ordained by God as a means of livelihood for those needy among His servants. It is, therefore, because of need and necessity that a person accepts zakāh [money], and he certainly knows his needs.

To accept aid from the sadaqah funds is an offence against religion, because ordinarily the benefactor gives only to those of whom he thinks well; while the company of the poor is more conducive to humility and meekness and farther removed from pride; since oftentimes a person may accept a sadaqah as though it were merely a present and nothing distinct [210] from a present.

These indicate an insistence on the humility and the need of the receiver of the zakāh. The truth of the matter is that these things vary with each individual depending on the particular state in which he may be at that time and on the kind of intention which he may at that moment entertain. If he were in doubt as to whether or not he was deserving he should not accept anything from the zakāh. But if he were certain that he was deserving, as, for example, when he has to pay a debt which he had incurred for a just cause and is unable to pay it without aid, then he is certainly entitled to that aid and justified in accepting it.

If a deserving individual were given the choice between accepting aid from the zakāh or the sadaqah and had found out that the person who is to give the sadaqah would not give that particular sum unless he were to accept it, let him by all means choose the sadaqah, as the zakāh which is compulsory would always be paid to its deserving beneficiaries. This would increase charity and better the conditions of the poor.

If the money were to be definitely given as a sadaqah any way and on the other hand the acceptance of the zakāh would not result in distress for the poor, the person would be free to make his choice. In short the arguments in favour of the one or the other vary. On the whole the acceptance of aid from the zakāh is more conducive to modesty and humility.

ŞŪFĪ COMMENTARIES ON THE QUR'ĀN IN CLASSICAL ISLAM

The Classical period of Islam, from the tenth to the fifteenth centuries, was the period in which the most influential commentaries on the Qur'ān were written. Şūfī Commentaries on the Qur'ān in Classical Islam looks at the unique contributions of Şūfis to this genre and how these contributions fit into the theological and exegetical discussions of the time.

The study begins with an examination of several key hermeneutical assumptions of Şūfīs, including their understanding of the ambiguous and multivalent nature of the Qur'ānic text, the role that both the intellect and spiritual disciplines play in acquiring knowledge of its meanings, and the ever-changing nature of the self which seeks this kind of knowledge. The second half of the study is an analysis and comparison of the themes and styles of several different commentaries on the Qur'ānic story of Mūsā (Moses) and al-Khaḍir; the figure of Maryam (The Virgin Mary); and the Light Verse. It demonstrates that, while Şūfī interpretation has often been characterized as allegorical, these writings are more notable for their variety of philosophical, visionary, literary, and homiletic styles.

Şūfī Commentaries on the Qur'ān in Classical Islam is the first comprehensive study of the contributions of Şūfīs to the genre of commentaries on the Qur'ān and is essential reading for those with research interests in Şūfism, Qur'ānic exegesis and Islam.

ROUTLEDGE STUDIES IN THE QURAN

Series Editor: Andrew Rippin

University of Victoria, Canada

In its examination of critical issues in the scholarly study of the Quran and its commentaries, this series targets the disciplines of archaeology, history, textual history, anthropology, theology, and literary criticism. The contemporary relevance of the Quran in the Muslim world, its role in politics and in legal debates are also dealt with, as are debates surrounding Quranic studies in the Muslim world.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I am very grateful to have had so many people help and support me in the writing of this book. In its beginning draft as a PhD dissertation at New York University, I benefited greatly from the thorough and thoughtful comments of my advisor, Philip F. Kennedy. Other key readers of the manuscript at this stage were Peter J. Chelkowski and Alfred L. Ivry, teachers whose encouragement and generosity toward me has been unfailing. I would also like to thank several people outside of New York University who carefully read and commented on the entire manuscript in this early stage: Ali Campbell, Ruqiyya Hutton, and Omar Trezise. My primary debt for the book in hand is to Andrew Rippin, the editor of this Routledge Studies in the Quran series, for his astute suggestions and detailed comments. Abd al-Rahman Tayyara was kind enough to check the Arabic transliterations. Any errors that remain, however, are my own. My thanks to David M. Buchman and Brigham Young University Press for allowing me to include excerpts from Dr Buchman's translation of al-Ghazālī's Niche of Lights. Finally, I thank my husband Michael for the generosity of spirit he has shown in never complaining about the seemingly endless hours, days, and years spent on this project.

INTRODUCTION

The Qur'ān, for Muslims, represents the word of God revealed to Muḥammad. Its interpretation, then, requires a certain audacity. How can one begin to say what God “meant” by His revelation? How does one balance the praiseworthy desire to understand the meanings of the Qur'ān with the realistic fear of reducing it to the merely human and individualistic? Is interpretation an art, a science, an inspired act, or all of the these? Ṣūfī commentators living in the classical time period of Islam from the tenth to the fifteenth centuries answered these questions in their own unique way, based on their assumptions regarding the nature of the Qur'ānic text, the sources of knowledge considered necessary for its interpretation, and the nature of the self seeking this knowledge. The commentaries they wrote are distinct from other types of Qur'ānic commentaries both in terms of content, which reflects Ṣūfī ideas and concepts, and the variety of styles ranging from philosophical musings to popular preaching to literary narrative and poetry.

Early Western scholarship on Ṣūfī Qur'ānic interpretation focused on the origins of Ṣūfī thought. In his Die Richtungen der islamischen Koranlegung, Ignaz Goldziher characterized the Ṣūfī approach as eisegesis, the reading of one's own ideas into a text.¹ Goldziher firmly believed that Ṣūfī thought is radically different from “original, traditional Islam,”² finding little basis for their beliefs in the Qur'ān. Not surprisingly then, he viewed Ṣūfī Qur'ānic commentary as an attempt to reconcile these different belief systems and to justify the Ṣūfī worldview within an Islamic framework through the method of allegoresis. According to Goldziher, the Ṣūfis were influenced in this by Platonic thought which contrasts the world of appearances with the world of Ideas, just as Ṣūfī exegetes distinguish the exoteric (ẓāhir) from the esoteric (bāṭin) levels of meaning of the Qur'ān. Although Ṣūfis insisted that they were uncovering deeper meanings of the Qur'ān, Goldziher found them reading ideas into a text essentially alien or even hostile to their system of thought.

The conclusions of Goldziher regarding the sources of Ṣūfī thought were debated by Louis Massignon, who attempted to show through an analysis of early Ṣūfī vocabulary that it was the Qur'ān itself, constantly recited, meditated upon, and practiced which was the origin and genuine source for the development of Ṣūfism.³ Paul Nwyia continued Massignon's research, focusing particularly on the mystical commentary attributed to Ja'far al-Šādiq (d. 765). Nwyia concluded that Ja'far al-Šādiq's commentary was the result of a dialogue between personal, mystic experience, and the text of the Qur'ān. The vocabulary found in this commentary marks the beginning of the development of specific Šūfī terminology that was not derived from foreign ideas and concepts but rather was created to describe the dialogue originating from and remaining within a Qur'ānic context.⁴ Both Massignon and Nwyia insisted that the Qur'ānic text remains primary for the Šūfī; that is to say, the Muslim mystic does not impose his own ideas on the Qur'ānic text, but rather discovers ideas in the course of his experiential dialogue with the text.⁵

The term allegoresis used by Goldziher does not adequately convey the complex and varied use of metaphorical language in Šūfī Qur'ānic commentaries. Studies by such scholars as Henry Corbin,⁶ Toshihiko Izutsu⁷ and William Chittick⁸ on the use of language in other types of Šūfī writings have shown the relationship between symbolic and metaphorical language and the concept of imagination, understood not as fantasy, but as an objective reality of the mind and cosmos. In his study of the Dhakhā'ir al-a'lāq of Ibn 'Arabī (d. 1240), Chittick identifies imagination as a concept referring to three different things: a faculty by which humans may obtain knowledge, just as they obtain knowledge from prophetic revelations and rational thought; an intermediate realm between the world of pure spirit and the world of bodies, sometimes called the "world of images" ('ālam al-mithāl); and something that reflects the nature of the cosmos as a whole.⁹ The kind of language and discourse used in Šūfī writings may, then, appear to be metaphorical while in fact being descriptive of experience in this intermediate realm, or it may be truly metaphorical since language using imagery is considered to be a better indicator of the nature of reality than abstract, rational thought.

The issue of language is related to the problem of defining the nature and objective of Šūfī writings. The possibility that Šūfīs are merely describing the reality that they see is rejected by those who consider their experiences a form of fantasy and their writings fictive compositions. In an article on the concept of the "world of images" (ālam al-mithāl) Fazlur Rahman rejects the ontological existence of this realm and therefore criticizes the claim of some Šūfīs to mystical experience within it; instead of descriptions of theophanies, he sees only an artistic impulse struggling to express itself.

Once the flood of imagination is let loose, the world of figures goes beyond the specifically religious motivation that historically brought it into existence in the first place and develops into the poetic, the mythical, and the grotesque: it seeks to satisfy the relatively suppressed and starved artistic urge. Much of the contents of the 'ālam al-mithāl [the world of images], as it develops later, has, therefore, nothing to do with religion but indirectly with theater.¹⁰

Leonard Lewisohn, on the other hand, suggests that reading Šūfī literature without accepting the reality of mystical experience results in a distortion of their writings. If one approaches Ṣūfī works from an aesthetic and literary perspective alone, one will see only allegories instead of metaphysical referents which can only be grasped experientially. While the aesthetic and literary element of Ṣūfī writings is undeniable, Lewisohn states that there is no “art for art’s sake in Ṣūfī literature.”¹¹

Hamid Dabashi has looked at the political dynamics behind Persian Ṣūfī poetry, describing its development within the context of a competition for authority among jurists, philosophers, court politicians, and the Ṣūfīs. As Ṣūfīs began writing poetry, or when poets became Ṣūfīs, they became propagandists for their mystical doctrines rather than poets first and foremost, subordinating the artistic impulse to a mystical worldview. Like Lewisohn, he agrees that the artistic impulse is secondary, but describes the phenomenon as an appropriation of art for other purposes.¹² Michael Sells views the interaction between these groups in a different way, as a creative clash of cultures. He suggests that the use of different language contexts by Ṣūfīs demonstrates a central aspect of classical Islamic culture, “the interpermeability and interfusion of discursive and cultural worlds.”¹³ J.C. Bürgel notes the major role that Ṣūfism played in allowing the arts to flourish in the Islamic world and suggests that this is because Ṣūfī theories made acts of creativity “licit magic,” while more orthodox Islam criticized and sometimes condemned poetry, representational art and music, seeing in their power an attempt to rival the creativity and power of God.¹⁴

The objective of this book is to add to these previous discussions by studying the relationship of Ṣūfīs to the Qur’ān more comprehensively. Understanding the nature of this relationship provides insight into the use of creative composition in other genres adopted by the Ṣūfīs as well. Part I of the study concerns Ṣūfī hermeneutics, a word used here to refer to the way in which Ṣūfīs described the nature of the Qur’ānic text and the types of knowledge and methods needed to understand it. The unique characteristics of Ṣūfī interpretation are further highlighted by means of an analysis of the writings of those who criticized and defended it. Part II begins with a brief overview of the lives and exegetical works of the Ṣūfī commentators studied for this work. Selections from their commentaries on the story of Mūsā and al-Khaḍīr, the figure of Maryam, and the Light Verse will be presented in order to demonstrate common themes and different compositional styles.

The most basic question addressed in these works, and the question from which all other questions are derived, is how to best approach the Qur’ān in order to discover its richness and transforming possibilities. It is a question asked directly in the hermeneutical writings and addressed indirectly in the commentaries themselves. Because interpretation is seen as an unending process which will be different for each individual, Ṣūfī interpretations are more suggestive than declarative; they are “allusions” (ishārāt) rather than explanations (tafāsīr), to use the Arabic terms. They therefore indicate possibilities as much as they demonstrate the insights of each writer. The concept of imagination which plays such a prominent role in Ibn ‘Arabī’s thought is less pronounced in the writings studied here. There is instead an emphasis on the connection between knowledge granted directly from God (‘ilm ladunī) and the ethics and spiritual practice of the individuals seeking this knowledge. The language and type of discourse chosen to express this knowledge varies with the different commentators, and demonstrates the individuality of each. The interplay of language worlds and discourses in classical Islam which Sells notes is very much apparent here; many of these commentaries can only be understood within the context of discussions occurring within other areas of Islamic thought.

The role of creativity in these writings is not a question that is addressed, probably because the self is not viewed as the origin of this knowledge. This is not to say, however, that the writers studied here are unaware of issues of style and composition. On the contrary, these aesthetic matters are considered important because the primary function of these works is didactic. The question of creativity is addressed somewhat indirectly through the justifications made for the highly individualistic nature of these interpretations, especially in the apologetic writings of Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī (d. 1111).

Much of the subject matter in this book could be productively compared to studies on the interpretation of books considered sacred in other traditions as well as contemporary hermeneutical and literary theories on reading texts. I have, however, deliberately avoided making these comparisons in order to keep the focus on the complexity of the classical Islamic and Ṣūfī discussions on Qur'ānic interpretation. Western scholarship has only just begun to scratch the surface of the vast literature included within the genre of Qur'ānic commentary; this study represents only a small contribution towards what will hopefully be a greater appreciation of the enormous variety of Islamic thought.

A word should be said about the use of the terms Ṣūfī and Ṣūfism throughout this work. As Carl Ernst has pointed out, the Arabic equivalents to these words are terms used relatively infrequently in the writings we now label as Ṣūfī. When they are used in classical works, it is in a prescriptive rather than descriptive sense.¹⁵ In the works studied here, the authors do not refer to themselves as Ṣūfīs but rather as “the people of allusion and understanding” (ahl al-ishāra wa'l-fahm), “the people of meanings” (ahl al-ma'ānī), “the people of love” (ahl al-ishq), “gnostics” (ʿarifūn), “verifiers” (muḥaqqiqūn), and “the people of states” (ahl al-mawājid), to give just a few examples. However, despite the different terminology and writing styles employed, these works share common hermeneutical assumptions and elements. The use of unifying terms to describe their approach, then, seems appropriate and the words “Ṣūfī” and “Ṣūfism” are the logical choice in English, despite the problems outlined by Ernst.

The translations in this work are my own unless otherwise noted. I have benefited greatly from the work of previous translators and the choice to use my own translation in many places is due to a concern for consistency in terminology rather than a criticism of the translations of my predecessors. The translations of the Qur'ān have been made after consulting the translations of Arberry, Ali, and Asad. I have taken the liberty of omitting the frequent phrases of blessings that occur in these texts for the sake of brevity and clarity. The transliteration system used is that of The Encyclopedia of Islam with the exception of j for jīm and q for qāf.

Part I

HERMENEUTICS

THE QUR'ĀN AS THE OCEAN OF ALL KNOWLEDGE

Şūfī interpretation begins with several basic premises: that the Qur'ān contains many levels of meaning, that man has the potential to uncover these meanings, and that the task of interpretation is endless. In their exegetical writings, Şūfīs quote such Qur'ānic verses as We have left nothing out from the Book (6:38), We have counted everything in a clear register (36:12), There is nothing whose treasures are not with Us and We only send it down in a known measure (15:21),¹ and, If all the trees on the earth were pens and the sea seven seas after it to replenish it, the words of God would not be depleted (31:27).² The image of the Qur'ān as an ocean is a particularly popular one, as in this quote from the Jawāhir al-Qur'ān of Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī.

I will rouse you from your sleep, you who have given yourself up to recitation, who have taken the study of the Qur'ān as a practice, who have seized upon some of its outward meanings and sentences. How long will you wander about the shore of the sea with your eyes closed to its wonders? Was it not for you to sail through its depths in order to see its amazing things, to travel to its islands to pick its delicacies, to dive to its bottom and become rich from obtaining its jewels? Don't you despise yourself for losing out on its pearls and jewels as you continue to look only to its shores and exoteric aspects?

Haven't you heard that the Qur'ān is an ocean from which the knowledge of all ages branches out just as rivers and streams branch out from the shores of the ocean? Don't you envy the happiness of people who have plunged into its overflowing waves and seized red sulfur,³ who have dived into its depths and taken out red rubies, shining pearls and green chrysolite, who have roamed its shores and gathered gray ambergris and fresh blooming aloes wood, who have clung to its islands and found an abundance in their animals of the greatest antidote and pungent musk?⁴

A similar passage can be found in the introduction to the Qur'ānic commentary of 'Abd al-Razzāq al-Kāshānī (d. 1329):

Their souls are purified by [the Qur'ān's] exoteric sense (ẓāhir) because it is water which flows copiously and the thirst of their hearts is quenched by its inner sense (bāṭin) because it is a surging sea. When they wish to dive in order to extract the pearls of its secrets the water crashes over them and they are submerged in its current. The riverbeds of insights (fuhūm) flow from this deluge according to their capacities, while the streams of realizations (uqūl) proceed from its rivers. The riverbeds bring forth piercing jewels and pearls upon the shores and the streams cause flowers and fruit to bloom upon the banks. Hearts take from the overflow as much as they can, filling their laps and sleeves, while souls set out to harvest the fruits and lights, grateful for finding them, their desires fulfilled by them.⁵

The idea that there are exoteric (ẓāhir) and inner (bāṭin) senses of the Qur'ān was well developed by Ṣūfīs before al-Kāshānī. Although the division of the exoteric and the inner has its basis in the Qur'ān,⁶ its importance in hermeneutical discussions is more closely tied to a ḥadīth attributed to 'Abd Allāh b. Mas'ūd (d. 652).

The ḥadīth of Ibn Mas'ūd

The ḥadīth of Ibn Mas'ūd is the ḥadīth most frequently quoted by the Ṣūfīs as proof of the many dimensions of the Qur'ān open to interpretation. Commentators who were not Ṣūfīs, such as Abū Ja'far al-Ṭabarī (d. 923),⁷ quoted it as well but they understood it in a different way. Here is al-Ṭabarī's version of the ḥadīth from the introduction to his Qur'ānic commentary, Jāmi' al-bayān:

The messenger of God said, "The Qur'ān was sent down in seven aḥruf. Each ḥarf has a back (ẓahr) and a belly (baṭn). Each ḥarf has a border (ḥadd) and each border has a lookout point (muṭṭala')."⁸

Al-Ṭabarī includes this ḥadīth among several other aḥādīth about the seven aḥruf, devoting several pages to the controversy over the meaning of the word "ḥarf (pl. aḥruf)" and concluding that the seven aḥruf refer to both dialects (alsun) of the Arabs and aspects (awjuh) of the revelation.⁹ The meaning of this particular Tradition, according to al-Ṭabarī is as follows:

"Each ḥarf has a border (ḥadd)" means that each of the seven aspects (awjuh) has a border delimited by God which no one may go past. As for his words "and each ḥarf has a back (ẓahr) and a belly (baṭn)," its back (ẓahr) is that which becomes apparent (ẓāhir) in recitation and its belly (baṭn) is its interpretation (ta'wīl) which is hidden (baṭāna). His words,

“and each of the borders has a lookout point (muṭṭala')” means that each of the borders in which God has delineated the permitted and prohibited and the rest of His revealed laws has a measure of the rewards and punishments of God which will be seen and beheld in the Hereafter and met at the Resurrection, just as 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb¹⁰ said, “If everything in the world belonged to me, assuredly I would ransom myself with it against the terror of the lookout point (muṭṭala').”¹¹

For al-Ṭabarī, the inner sense (bāṭin) refers to events in the future, knowledge of which is not given to man until the Day of Resurrection. The word ta'wīl has different meanings in the Qur'ān; al-Ṭabarī seems to use it here in its sense of the unfolding of events, not interpretation.¹²

Roughly contemporary with al-Ṭabarī, the Ṣūfī interpretation of Sahl al-Tustarī (d. 896) gives us a reading of this ḥadīth that is different in two important respects. The first is in its designating knowledge of the external sense (ẓāhir) as public ('āmm) and knowledge of the inner sense (bāṭin) as private (khāṣṣ). The second difference is in the interpretation of the lookout point (muṭṭala'). Using the tradition from 'Umar, al-Ṭabarī understands this as a terrifying vantage point on the Day of Resurrection. Al-Tustarī, on the other hand, understands the muṭṭala' as a vantage point of the heart, an overview from which one can understand what God meant by certain verses of the Qur'ān while still in this life.

Every verse of the Qur'an has four kinds of meanings: an exoteric sense (ẓāhir), an inner sense (bāṭin), a limit (ḥadd), and a lookout point (muṭṭala'). The exoteric sense is the recitation, the inner sense is understanding (fahm), the limit is what [the verse] permits and prohibits, and the lookout point is the elevated places of the heart (qalb) [beholding] what was intended by it as understood from God Almighty. The knowledge of the exoteric sense is public knowledge ('ilm 'āmm) and the understanding of its inner sense and what was intended by it is private (khāṣṣ).¹³

Al-Tustarī does not specify in this passage as to exactly who possesses this public and private knowledge. Throughout his tafsīr, he uses the terms “elect” (khuṣūṣ) and common people ('umūm) without saying what he means by this distinction.¹⁴

Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī (d. 998), writing about a hundred years after al-Tustarī in his Qūt al-qulūb, interprets the ḥadīth in much the same way as al-Tustarī, adding details regarding exoteric and esoteric knowledge, and confirming the view that the lookout point (muṭṭala') refers to a vantage point attainable in this life. He seems to reference the saying of 'Umar found in al-Ṭabarī, but manages to soften its frightening aspect by a play on words:

Its back (ẓahr) is for experts in the Arabic language (ahl al-'arabiyya), its inner sense (bāṭin) is for the people of certainty (ahl al-yaqīn), its limit (ḥadd) is for the exotericists (ahl al-ẓāhir), and its lookout point

(muṭṭala') is for the people of elevated places (ahl al-ashraf) who are the gnostics ('arifūn), loving and fearing; they have beheld (iṭṭala'ū) the kindness of the One who looks down (muṭṭali') after having feared the terror of the lookout point (muṭṭala').¹⁵

Al-Ghazālī mentions the Ibn Mas'ūd ḥadīth in his defense of Sūfī exegesis in his Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn. His use of the ḥadīth is part of a more combative style intended to rebut religious scholars who believe that Qur'ānic commentary should be based entirely on the transmitted traditions of the Companions and the Followers of the Prophet. Al-Ghazālī's challenges them to explain the meaning of the Ibn Mas'ūd ḥadīth if exegesis is to be so restricted. He bluntly states that "the one who claims that the Qur'ān has no other meaning than what exoteric exegesis (ẓāhir al-tafsīr) has explained (tarjama), should know that he has acknowledged his own limitations and therefore is right with regards to himself, but is wrong in an opinion which brings everyone else down to his level."¹⁶

But al-Ghazālī is rather unique in his desire to engage with the opponents of Sūfism head-on. The approach of Rūzbihān al-Baqlī (d. 1209) in his Qur'ānic commentary 'Arā'is al-bayān is more typical. He writes for his fellow Sūfīs alone, describing the division between exotericists and Sūfīs as part of God's plan in Creation:

Then he gave the external reins of [the Qur'ān] to the hands of the exotericists (ahl al-zāhir) among the scholars ('ulamā') and the wise (ḥukamā') so that they introduce its precepts, limits, regulations, and laws, and He reserved the unseen of the secrets of His speech and the hidden subtleties of His signs for the best of His people. He disclosed Himself in His words by the attribute of unveiling (kashf), eyewitnessing ('iyyān), and explanation (bayān) to their hearts (qulūb), spirits (arwāḥ), intellects ('uqūl), and innermost secrets (asrār).

He taught them the sciences of His realities (ḥaqā'iq) and the phenomena of His intricacies (daqā'iq). He purified the degrees of their intellects by the unveiling of the lights of his Beauty. He sanctified their understandings by the splendor of His Majesty. He made them the places for the hidden deposits of the symbols (rumūz) of His speech, the obscurities of His secrets deposited in His Book, the subtlety of His allusions (ishārāt) to the sciences of the ambiguous verses (mutashābihāt) and [other] difficulties of the verses. He Himself informed them of the meanings of that which He hid in the Qur'ān so that they would come to know by means of His causing them to know. He anointed their eyes by the light of His nearness and communion. He showed them the unseen mysteries of the brides of different kinds of wisdom and knowledge, and the meanings of the innermost understanding and innermost secret, the exoteric sense (ẓāhir) of which is a fundamental principle (ḥukm) in the Qur'ān and inner sense (bāṭin) of which is an allusion (ishāra) and unveiling (kashf) which God (al-ḥaqq) reserves for His purified ones and His greater friends (awliyā') and His exiled beloved among the sincere and close companions (muqarrabūn).

He veiled these secrets and marvels from others, those among the scholars of the external sense ('ulamā' al-zāhir) and the exotericists (ahl-rusūm) who have an abundant portion of the abrogating and the abrogated, and the comprehension and knowledge of the permitted and prohibited, the limits and rules.¹⁷

Although Ṣūfīs in this time period used the term “exotericists” (ahl al-zāhir or ahl al-rusūm), they did not call themselves “esotericists” (bāṭiniyya) since this was a derogatory term applied to those who rejected the literal sense of the Qur'ān and the exoteric practices of Islam, especially the Ismā'īlīs. None of the Ṣūfīs studied here rejected the external aspects of practice and knowledge, but rather considered these the necessary prerequisites for proceeding with the inward aspects.

Nizām al-Dīn al-Nisābūrī (d. 1327) echoes the thoughts of Rūzbihān in his interpretation of the Ibn Mas'ūd ḥadīth, found in the introduction to his Qur'ānic commentary entitled Gharā'ib al-Qur'ān wa raghā'ib al-furqān. He writes that the exoteric sense (zāhir) of the Qur'ān is what scholars ('ulamā') know, and the inner sense (bāṭin) is what is hidden from them, and he adds, “and we speak of it as we have been commanded and entrust the knowledge of it to God most High.”¹⁸ Al-Nisābūrī provides both exoteric and esoteric definitions for the word muṭṭala'. The first repeats the tradition of 'Umar found in al-Ṭabarī regarding the lookout point on the Day of Resurrection. The second definition confirms the Ṣūfī belief in the possibility of acquiring this vision in the here and now. The muṭṭala' is “the point of ascent (maṣ'ad), a place to which one arrives where one understands [a thing] as it is (yafhamu kamā huwa).”¹⁹

Al-Kāshānī's commentary on the ḥadīth interprets the back (zahr) and the belly (baṭn) as exoteric exegesis (tafsīr) and esoteric interpretation (ta'wīl). He understands the limit (ḥadd) as the place “where understandings of the meaning of the words end” and the lookout point (muṭṭala') as the place to which one rises up from the limit and “beholds (yafṭali'u) the witnessing of the all-knowing King.”²⁰

In all of these interpretations of the Ibn Mas'ūd ḥadīth, the division of the Qur'ān is basically twofold, exoteric and esoteric. The exoteric is the external sense (zahr) and the commands and prohibitions that constitute the limit (ḥadd). The esoteric is the inner sense (baṭn) and the gnostic's lookout point (muṭṭala'). In 'Alā' al-Dawla al-Simnānī (d. 1336), this twofold sense is expanded into a four-fold hierarchical interpretative process:

O seeker of the inner meaning of the Qur'ān! You should first study the literal level of the Qur'ān and bring your body into harmony with its commands and prohibitions. Secondly, you should occupy yourself with purifying your inner being so that you may comprehend the hidden meaning (batn) of the Qur'ān according to the instruction of the Merciful One and the inspiration of the Holy Angel. Thirdly, you should contemplate the gnosis of its limit (ḥadd) in the realm of hearts. [Only then] will you be distinguished with witnessing its point of ascent (muṭṭala') without thought or reckoning.²¹

According to al-Simnānī, the source of interpretation varies according to these four different levels of the Qur'ān:

The commentator on the exoteric dimension of the Qur'ān should rely exclusively upon his external sense of hearing through which he learned the verses himself. The mystic should rely on inspiration (ilhām) to comment on the esoteric dimension, while the accomplished Sufi who has truly declared the unity of God should only comment on the limit with divine permission. The individual who has attained the secret of the essence should not comment at all, but proceed in a faltering manner into the point of ascent of the Qur'ān.²²

Al-Simnānī relates the four levels of meaning to four realms of existence: the Human Realm (nāsūt), the Kingdom (malakūt), the Omnipotence (jabarūt), and the Divinity (lāhūt).²³

Sayings from 'Alī and Ja'far al-Šādiq

In addition to the Ibn Mas'ūd ḥadīth, the Šūfīs found validation for their belief in the existence of deeper, discoverable meanings in the Qur'ān in sayings attributed to 'Alī (d.661) and Ja'far al-Šādiq (d. 765), important figures for both Šūfīs and Shī'īs.²⁴ The first of the sayings attributed to 'Alī quoted below echoes the ḥadīth of Ibn Mas'ūd:

Every verse of the Qur'ān has four kinds of meaning: an exoteric sense (zāhir), an inner sense (bāṭin), a limit (ḥadd), and a lookout point (muṭṭala'). The exoteric sense is the recitation (tilāwa), the inner sense is understanding (fahm), the limit (ḥadd) is the rulings of what is permitted and prohibited, and the lookout point (muṭṭala') is what is meant by God for the servant by [the verse]. It is said that the Qur'ān is a clear expression (ibāra), an allusion (ishāra), subtleties (laṭā'if) and realities (ḥaqā'iq), so that the clear expression is for hearing, the allusion is for the intellect ('aql), the subtleties are for witnessing (mushāhada) and the realities are for self-surrender (istislām).²⁵

There is no good in an act of worship without comprehension, nor in a recitation without pondering.²⁶

The Messenger of God (peace and blessings of God be upon him), did not confide anything in me which he concealed from people, except that God most High gives a servant understanding of His Book.²⁷

If I had wished, I could have loaded seventy camels with commentary (tafsīr) on the Fātiḥa of the Book (the opening sūra).²⁸

For the one who understands (yafhamu) the Qur'ān, thereby whole bodies of knowledge are explained (fussira).²⁹

Those attributed to Ja'far al-Šādiq are:

The Qur'ān is recited with nine aspects (awjuh): the Truth (ḥaqq), truth (ḥaqīqa), realization (taḥqīq), realities (ḥaqā'iq), oaths, contracts, limits, the cutting off of attachments, and the exaltation of the One who is worshipped.³⁰

The Qur'ān was sent down in seven modes (anwā'): to inform, entrust, awaken affection, ennoble, unite, frighten and restrain. Moreover, it was revealed as a command, a prohibition, a promise, a threat, an indulgence, a foundation, and a test. Moreover, it was revealed as an inviter, a guardian, a witness, a preserver, an intercessor, a defender, and a protector.³¹

The Book of God has four things: the clear expression ('ibāra), the allusion (ishāra), subtleties (laṭā'if) and realities (ḥaqā'iq). The clear expression is for the common people ('awāmm), the allusion is for the elite (khawāṣṣ), the subtleties are for the friends (awliyā'), and the realities are for the prophets (anbiyā').³²

THE QUR'ĀNIC TEXT AND AMBIGUITY

Verse 3:7

The Ṣūfīs' insistence upon the multivalent nature of the Qur'ānic text is related to their understanding of its ambiguity. A key verse here is Qur'ān 3:7 because it addresses the problems in interpreting a text that is both clear and ambiguous.

He it is who sent down to you the book containing clear verses (ayāt muḥkamāt) which are the mother of the Book and others that are ambiguous or similar (mutashābihāt). As for those in whose hearts is a turning away, they follow what is ambiguous or similar (mutashābih) in it, seeking discord and seeking its interpretation (ta'wīl) but none knows its interpretation except God. Those who are firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fīl-'ilm) say, "We believe in it; the whole is from our Lord," and no one remembers except those who possess understanding (ulū al-albāb).

An alternative translation of the last part of this verse is possible, which makes those who are firmly rooted in knowledge a continuation of the phrase except God, resulting in the statement but none knows its interpretation except God and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge who say, "We believe in it; the whole is from our Lord." Most classical commentaries on this verse attempt to define what is meant by the clear and ambiguous verses of the Qur'ān and those seeking discord and those firmly rooted in knowledge. As is often the case in Ṣūfī commentaries, Ṣūfī interpretations are best understood within the context of exoteric commentaries such as al-Ṭabarī's that cite the interpretative traditions transmitted from the Companions and Followers of the Prophet.

The clear and ambiguous verses (muḥkamāt wa mutashābihāt)

In his commentary on the Qur'ān, al-Ṭabarī mentions five early interpretations for what constitutes the clear and ambiguous verses (muḥkamāt wa mutashābihāt).¹ Among these five, al-Ṭabarī's preferred interpretation is that the muḥkamāt are those verses that may be interpreted and understood by religious scholars ('ulamā') whereas the mutashābihāt are those verses that may be interpreted only by God – the disconnected letters occurring at the beginning of several chapters of the Qur'ān or verses pertaining to future eschatological events.² Although this interpretation is often referred to in later commentaries, the interpretation more widely preferred after al-Ṭabarī is the one attributed to Muḥammad ibn al-Zubayr (d. 728–38), which states that the muḥkamāt are verses that can only be interpreted in one way, while the mutashābihāt are verses that allow for various interpretations.³ As we shall see, this interpretation was used to develop a methodology for dealing with the difficult theological issues raised by verses concerning God's attributes and actions.

Ṣūfī interpretations of Qur'ān 3:7 understand the Ibn al-Zubayr tradition as additional confirmation of different levels of meaning in the Qur'ān. The muḥkamāt verses constitute the basic message necessary for salvation addressed to all mankind while the mutashābihāt are addressed to an elect group of individuals; the Qur'ānic text is designed both to reveal and conceal, to communicate both simply and profoundly. This concept is described in the Qur'ānic commentary of the Ṣūfī Abū'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī (d. 1074). Al-Qushayrī, always liberal in the use of metaphor in his writing, appears here to be using the literal meanings of the words “revelation” (tanzīl) and “interpretation” (ta'wīl) to evoke an image of something that descends with ease but is brought back up with great difficulty.

He has classified the discourse for them. From its apparent sense (ẓāhir), there is the clarity of its revelation (lit., “its being sent down,” tanzīlihi) and from its obscure sense (ghāmiḍ), there is the problem of its interpretation (lit., “its being brought back,” ta'wīlihi). The first kind is for the purpose of unfolding the law and guiding the people of the outwardly manifest (ahl al-ẓāhir). The second kind is for the purpose of protecting secrets (asrār) from the examination of outsiders.⁴

The Persian Qur'ānic commentator Rashīd al-Dīn al-Maybudī (fl. 1135) used al-Qushayrī's commentary as a source for his own, incorporating and expanding on his work in a decidedly literary manner. In this section of his Kashf al-asrār, al-Maybudī develops al-Qushayrī's suggestion that the obscurity in the Qur'ān is intentional, adding a short poem that taunts those who would undertake the search for deeper meanings casually:

There are two exalted parts to the Qur'ān. One of them is the clear apparent sense (ẓāhir-i rawshan) and one is the difficult obscure sense (ghāmiḍ-i mushkil). This apparent sense is the majesty of the law (sharī'at) and that obscure sense is the beauty of reality (ḥaqīqat). This apparent sense is so that the masses (‘amma) of mankind might understand and practice this in order to reach the comfort (nāz) and blessing. That obscure sense is so that the elite (khawāṣṣ) of mankind might submit to and accept that, in order to reach the blessing of the secret (rāz) of the friend. How great is the distance (lit., descent and ascent) between the place of the comfort and blessing and the place of intimacy and the secret! Because of the grandeur of that state and the nobility of that work, the veil of obscurity (ghumūd) and ambiguity (tashābuh) is not removed, so that not just any stranger could set foot in that quarter, since not everyone is worthy of the tale of the secrets of kings.

Do not stroll around the royal curtain of secrets!

What can you do since you are not a man?

A real man ought to be peerless in each of the two worlds since he drinks the last drops of the draught of friends.⁵

By creating a series of corresponding polarities here, the muḥkamāt and the mutashābihāt of the Qur'ānic text, the masses (‘amma) and the elite (khawāṣṣ), the law (sharī‘a) and the reality (ḥaqīqa), God's Majesty and Beauty; al-Maybudī connects the structure of the Qur'ān to that of mankind and the cosmos.

This linking of the structure of the Qur'ānic text to the nature of existence can also be seen in the commentary of Rūzbihān al-Baqlī. For Rūzbihān, the muḥkamāt are those verses that cannot be altered from how they were in pre-eternity. These are verses for believers that contain the practical application of the commandments, functioning like medicine for the sick in healing mankind and strengthening faith. They provide all that is necessary for man's salvation. The mutashābihāt, on the other hand, give information, to the few who are prepared to receive it, about the mysterious way in which God manifests Himself in His creation.

The mutashābihāt are descriptions of the ambiguous wrapping (iltibās) of the Attributes (ṣifāt) and the manifestation (ẓuhūr) of the Essence (dhāt) in the mirror of witnessings (shawāhid) and signs (ayāt).⁶

Iltibās is a term found frequently in Rūzbihān's writings. It is a verbal noun derived from the Arabic root lbs. Two first form verbs from this root occur in the Qur'ān: labisa, which means to wear something or to clothe someone, and labasa, which means to confuse. The eighth form of the verb, iltabasa (verbal noun: iltibās), means "to become entangled" or "to become confused."⁷ Rūzbihān uses the word to refer to the process by which God "clothes" His messages in forms that can be confusing or ambiguous to people.⁸ The mutashābihāt are examples of these kinds of messages.

Another way to express the concept of iltibās is to speak of unity and multiplicity, the terminology that ‘Abd al-Razzāq al-Kāshānī uses in his comments on Qur'ān 3:7. Without specifically identifying it, al-Kāshānī refers to Ibn al-Zubayr's interpretation before expanding it to include Šūfī metaphysical ideas and terminology:

Potentiality of meaning and ambiguity cannot touch [the muḥkamāt]; they convey only one meaning. They are the mother, i.e. the root (aṣl) of the Book. And others that are mutashābihāt. They convey two meanings or more, and the truth and falsehood are ambiguous (yashṭabihu) in them. That is because the Truth (ḥaqq) has one face, which is the absolute abiding face after the annihilation of creation, not admitting multiplicity or plurality. He also has multiple additional faces in accordance with the mirrors of the loci of manifestation (mazāhir). [These faces] are what become manifest from that one face according to the preparedness (isti'dād) of each locus of manifestation. The truth and falsehood are ambiguous in them. The revelation appeared in this manner so that the mutashābihāt would turn towards the faces of the different forms of preparedness (isti'dādāt). So everyone clings to that which is appropriate to it, and the test and trial thereby become manifest.⁹

When al-Kāshānī speaks of loci of manifestation (mazāhir), he is employing one of the terms initiated by Ibn 'Arabī to explain the nature of existence. God is One both in His Essence and His attribute as the Manifest, while the loci within which He manifests are qualified by multiplicity. "Preparedness" (isti'dād) is the term he uses to describe the receptivity of individually created things and beings to the manifestation of God, each becoming a locus of manifestation according to its innate capacity.¹⁰ Although the terminology of al-Kāshānī and Rūzbihān are different, the basic concept is the same, that God created the world in such a way that truth and falsehood intermingle in an ambiguous way. Like al-Qushayrī and al-Maybudī, they distinguish between the muḥkamāt verses that send a message to all mankind and the mutashābihāt verses that are addressed to a few. The elitism here is not unique to Ṣūfīs but how the elite are defined is, as we shall see in the following section.

Those in whose hearts is a turning away and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fī'l-ilm)

Qur'ān 3:7 describes two ways in which mankind responds to the ambiguous verses (mutashābihāt) in the Qur'ān. Those in whose hearts there is a turning away try to create discord by means of these verses, whereas *those who are firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fī'l-ilm)* have faith in God's message as a unified whole. This part of the verse provoked extensive discussions in Qur'ānic exegesis concerning what constitutes sound interpretative methodology. The answer depends on how the mutashābihāt are defined. If the mutashābihāt are taken to refer to those events known only to God, such as future events, then *those firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fī'l-ilm)* leave their interpretation to God.¹¹ This is al-Ṭabarī's preferred interpretation and the one which produces the clearest statement regarding the role of the interpreter. By narrowing the definition of the mutashābihāt to the verses of disconnected letters and the verses having to do with future events, al-Ṭabarī narrows the area of the unknowable in the Qur'ān, thereby emphasizing its clarity.

all of the verses of the Qur'ān that God revealed to His Messenger were revealed as a clear explanation (bayān) to him and his community and guidance to the worlds. It is not possible that anything could be included in it that they did not need, or anything that they did need but had no way of knowing by interpretation.

Since this is so, mankind has a need for everything in the Qur'ān even though there are some meanings they can do without and many meanings that they very much need. This is like when God says, on a day when some of the signs of your Lord will come, no soul will benefit if it has not already believed or earned something good by means of its faith (6:158). The prophet taught his community that the sign that God speaks of in this verse... is the rising of the sun from the west. What the worshippers needed to know was the time period in which repentance would benefit them without restricting it to years, months, or days. God explained this for them by means of the Book and clarified it for them by means of His messenger acting as an exegete (mufasssīr). They did not need to know the length of time between the revelation of this verse and the appearance of this sign. They had no need of knowing it for their religion or present life. It is knowledge that God has reserved for Himself exclusively and not His creation, and He has veiled it from them.¹²

The muḥkamāt consist of everything except the verses having to do with the future events and disconnected letters. Although these mukḥamāt verses could be interpreted in various ways, their intended meaning has been made clear elsewhere in the Qur'ān or in the explanations of the Prophet. The role of the religious scholar (ʿālim) is merely to present this intended meaning.

If the mutashābihāt are as we have described, everything else is muḥkam by virtue of its having only one meaning and one interpretation. No one hearing it would need any explanations for it. Or, it is clear despite its possessing many aspects and interpretations and the possibility of many meanings because there exists an indication to its intended meaning either through an explanation by God Himself or an explanation by His Messenger to his community. The knowledge of the religious scholars (ʿulamāʾ) in the community will not go beyond that because of what we have explained here.¹³

In keeping with his narrow definition of what constitutes the mutashābihāt, al-Ṭabarī prefers the reading of the verse that limits knowledge of the interpretation (taʾwīl) of the mutashābihāt to God alone, although he presents views from the Companions and Followers of the Prophet supporting the other reading as well. Because the verses with disconnected letters and those relating to future events make up a relatively small portion of the Qur'ānic text, al-Ṭabarī's preferred interpretation retains a broad role for the religious scholar in interpretation, since in this definition the muḥkamāt constitute the majority of the Qur'ān.

However, if the mutashābihāt are taken to refer to verses that can be interpreted in more than one way, then those who are firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fī 'l-'ilm) are those who know how to interpret them in light of the muḥkamāt. Al-Ṭabarī quotes Ibn al-Zubayr as saying,

Then they refer the interpretation of the mutashābiḥa to what they know of the interpretation of the muḥkama that admit only one interpretation. The book is thereby harmonized by what they say, one part confirming another. By means of it, the proof (ḥujja) is established, victory appears, falsehood departs and infidelity is refuted.¹⁴

As for those in whose hearts is a turning away, they do the opposite, finding the meaning they want in the ambiguous verses, even when this meaning contradicts the clear verses.¹⁵

The Mu'tazilī commentator al-Zamakhsharī (d. 1144)¹⁶ gives examples of how this methodology works in his Kashshāf 'an ḥaqā'iq al-tanzīl, applying it to support Mu'tazilī views denying the possibility of seeing God and affirming man's absolute free will. According to al-Zamakhsharī, the Qur'ānic verse Vision cannot encompass Him (6:103) is the muḥkam verse to which the mutashābih verse gazing at their Lord (75:23) must be referred. The first verse is to be understood literally while the second must be interpreted in light of the literal truth of the first. Likewise, the muḥkam verse God does not command what is shameful (7:28) makes sense of the mutashābih verse When We intend to destroy a town, We command those who live easy lives in it, and they act sinfully (17:16), which otherwise would seem to suggest that God commands some people to sin.¹⁷

The problem with this interpretative methodology is that one person's muḥkam verse is easily another's mutashābih and vice versa. In the process, the potential exists for undermining the very message of the Qur'ān, a danger noted by the theologian Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (d. 1210)¹⁸ in his Al-Taḥfīr al-kabīr:

Know that among the apostates there is one who has attacked the Qur'ān because of its inclusion of the mutashābihāt. He said, "You say that the duties which mankind has been charged with are connected to this Qur'ān until the Coming of the Hour. Yet we see that [the disagreement over the mutashābihāt] reaches the point where each follower of a school of thought clings to it according to his own school, so that the Jabarite [determinist] clings to the verses of compulsion such as We have placed veils upon their hearts lest they understand it, and heaviness in their ears (6:25, 17:46, 18:57). The Qadarite [proponent of free will] says, "no, this is the school of infidels," indicating that God related this about the infidels when blaming them, saying, They say our hearts are veiled from what you call us to and in our ears is a heaviness (41:5) and in another place, they say, "our hearts are enclosed in a covering" (2:88, 4:155).

Similarly, the one who affirms the beatific vision clings to His words on that day faces will be radiant, gazing towards their Lord (75:22–3) and the denier clings to Vision cannot encompass Him (6:103). The one who affirms that God has direction clings to His words they fear their Lord above them (16:50) and His words the Merciful sat upon the throne (20:5), while the denier clings to His words there is nothing like Him (42:11).

Then each one calls the verse that agrees with his school muḥkam and the verses which disagree with his school mutashābih. Maybe the situation of preferring one verse over another derives from covert preference and weak positions. So how can it be fitting for the Wise to have made the Book that is the reference point for all of the religion until the Coming of the Hour thus? Wouldn't the objective be more likely attained if He had made it conspicuously evident and free of these mutashābihāt?¹⁹

After quoting this provocative question al-Rāzī provides several possible answers. He tells us that there are many religious scholars who believe that the difficulties of the mutashābihāt increase the reward for those who struggle to discover the truth, forcing them to exercise their minds, and freeing them from ignorance and uncritical faith (taqlīd). These verses also cause one to learn the methods of interpretation (ta'wīlāt) and preferring one (verse) over another (tarjīḥ ba'dihā 'alā ba'd). The strongest benefit, according to al-Rāzī, is that these verses facilitate comprehension of the more difficult aspects of God's attributes and actions for those with the capacity for such comprehension, while at the same time not confusing those for whom simple explanations are best.²⁰

Despite the dangers al-Rāzī outlines for the interpretative method of preferring one (verse) over another (tarjīḥ ba'dihā 'alā ba'd), he nonetheless accepts its validity and necessity, and attempts to establish guidelines for how this is to be done. Simply put, any expression in the Qur'ān that can be interpreted in more than one way must be interpreted by its more probable meaning (rājiḥ) unless there is a clear-cut indicator (dalīl munfaṣil) that demonstrates the absurdity of the apparent sense (ẓāhir). According to al-Rāzī, this clear-cut indicator (dalīl munfaṣil) can be either linguistic (lafẓī) or rational ('aqlī). However, even though a definitive rational indicator can demonstrate the absurdity of the probable meaning, the intended meaning remains a matter of conjecture (ẓann). Guessing is permissible only for legal matters where action is required, not for the fundamentals of faith.²¹

An example of the kinds of expressions al-Rāzī means here are the anthropomorphic descriptions of God in the Qur'ān in verses such as The Merciful sat upon His throne (20:5). According to al-Rāzī, anthropomorphists (mushabbihā) seek to validate their beliefs with the apparent sense (ẓāhir) of this verse, even though it has been clearly established by reason (thabata bi ṣarīḥ al-'aql) that God cannot be characterized as confined in space. The anthropomorphists, then, are among those in whose hearts there is a turning away because they try to support their false ideas by claiming that an ambiguous verse is a clear verse.²²

The interpreter's task, in al-Rāzī's opinion, is to correctly identify which verses are the clear verses and which are the ambiguous verses, working as "impartial verifiers" (muḥaqqiqūn munṣifūn) rather than proclaiming the verses that agree with their school of thought muḥkamāt and the verses which disagree with the same mutashābihāt. When it can be shown definitively that the apparent sense of a verse is impossible, the sound interpreter knows that what is intended is a figurative expression (majāz) for its reality (ḥaqīqa). However, figurative expressions are capable of many meanings and the preference of one over another can only be a linguistic preference. Since this is not definitive proof, it is not permissible. Accordingly, when those who are firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fī 'l-ilm) and those who possess understanding (ūlū al-albāb) see something ambiguous in the Qur'ān, they accept that it has a sound meaning with God and believe in it without knowing its exact meaning. Al-Rāzī, then, prefers the reading of this verse that stops after and no one knows its interpretation except God.²³ However, far from belittling the role of the commentator, al-Rāzī understands this verse as praise for those who do exegesis correctly.

This verse indicates the grandeur of the situation of the theologians (mutakallimūn) who search for rational indicators (al-dalā'il al-'aqliyya) and by means of them seek knowledge of the essence, qualities, and acts of God.²⁴

Al-Rāzī is following the views of his fellow Ash'arī al-Ghazālī here, who makes three recommendations in his Qānūn al-ta'wīl for dealing with verses whose literal meaning seems to contradict knowledge obtained by the intellect (ma'qūl). The first is not to aspire to fully know the meaning of these verses. The second is to accept that interpretation is unavoidable because reason does not lie. The third recommendation is to refrain from specifying an interpretation when the [various] possibilities [of interpretation] are incompatible.²⁵ The best recourse is to say,

I know that its literal meaning is not what is intended, because it contains what is contrary to reason. What exactly is intended, however, I do not know, nor do I have a need to know, since it is not related to any action, and there is no way truly to uncover [its meaning] with certainty. Moreover, I do not believe in making judgements by guessing... This means that one should say, "We believe therein; the whole is from our Lord" (3:7).²⁶

Others, such as Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328),²⁷ a fierce critic of the writings of al-Ghazālī and al-Rāzī, asserted that the literal sense of the Qur'ānic text must never be abandoned, whether that abandonment is through interpretation (ta'wīl) or through entrusting its meaning to God (tafwīd). Ibn Taymiyya's insistence upon staying with the literal sense was not a rejection of the use of reason, but rather was based on the claim that true reason will never be in contradiction with the Qur'ān and sound aḥādīth.²⁸ He defines his own methodology of sound interpretation based entirely on these sources, a methodology which we will examine in Chapter 5.

Although al-Ghazālī limits the role of reason in his Qanūn al-ta'wīl and the permissibility of interpreting the mutashābihāt, he makes a significant exception to this rule in a book written towards the end of his life, Iljām al-'awāmm 'an 'ilm al-kalām. The book addresses the problem of traditions attributed to the first generations of Muslims (salaf) that appear to interpret anthropomorphic descriptions of God in the Qur'ān literally. Al-Ghazālī not only denies that the salaf ever interpreted these passages literally, but also claims that they established guidelines detailing how the general public ('awāmm) should understand them. According to al-Ghazālī, the general public should avoid literal interpretations of anthropomorphic verses of the Qur'ān while, at the same time, avoiding any attempt to understand their true, non-literal meanings. They should avoid paraphrasing the text or engaging in theological proofs and arguments regarding them. Instead, they should accept that these verses do have a meaning that is fitting to God, but a meaning that can only be understood by the Prophet, his leading Companions, saints (awliyā'), and those firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fī 'l-'ilm). The mutashābihāt, then, are primarily addressed to an elite.

If you were to say, "What is the benefit in speaking to mankind about something which they do not understand?" Your answer is that the goal of this speaking is to facilitate the understanding of those who are worthy of it: the saints (awliyā') and those firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fī 'l-'ilm).²⁹

Important here is the definition that al-Ghazālī provides for what he means by the general public ('awāmm) on the one hand, and the saints and those firmly rooted in knowledge on the other. He includes in the first category the litterateur (adīb), the grammarian, the ḥadīth specialist (muḥaddith), the exegete (mufasssīr), the jurist, and the theologian (mutakallim). None of these people should attempt interpretations (ta'wīlāt), nor act freely with the external sense of the words (al-taṣarruf fī khilāl al-ẓawāhir) of the Qur'ān or traditions. Al-Ghazālī warns that it is prohibited (ḥarām) to plunge into the sea if you are not a good swimmer, and the sea of gnosis (ma'rifa) of God is far more dangerous than the sea of water. Those who are permitted to interpret the difficult passages of the Qur'ān are those who devote themselves exclusively to learning to swim in the seas of religious gnosis (ma'rifa); who restrict their lives to Him alone; who turn their faces from this world and the appetites; who turn their backs on money and fame, mankind, and all other pleasures; who devote themselves to God in the different types of knowledge and actions; who act in accordance with all the ordinances of the religious law and its courtesies (ādāb) in performing the obediences and avoiding the objectionable; who have emptied out their hearts from everything except God; who despise the world and even the Hereafter and the Highest Paradise next to love of God. They are the divers in the sea of gnosis.³⁰

In shifting to metaphorical language, al-Ghazālī signals his shift from theologian to Ṣūfī. The only people qualified to interpret the mutashābihāt, after the Prophet and some of his immediate followers, are the Ṣūfīs, and their methodology is that of Ṣūfī practice.

Al-Ghazālī frequently functions, as he does here, as an apologist for Ṣūfism, and we will examine some of his many attempts to defend Ṣūfī Qur'ānic interpretation in more detail later. For now, however, we will move on to what other Ṣūfīs have to say in less apologetic works about how those firmly rooted in knowledge approach the mutashābihāt of the Qur'ān. The echoes of the discussions we have seen so far regarding verse 3:7 can be heard in these works, but take second place to the claim that there are some who receive knowledge directly from God concerning the ambiguous passages of the Qur'ān. Here is what al-Qushayrī has to say about those firmly rooted in knowledge (al-rāsikhūn fī 'l-ilm):

The way of those whose knowledge is firmly rooted (al-'ulamā' al-rasūkh) in seeking its meaning is in accordance with the fundamentals (uṣūl). Whatever their investigation obtains is acceptable and whatever resists the effect of their reflection (fikr) they surrender to the World of the Unseen.

The way of the people of allusion and understanding (ahl al-ishāra wa'l-fahm) is listening with the presence of the heart (ḥuḍūr al-qalb), so that the object of their levels of understanding (fuhūm), appearing from the things that are made known, is based upon the allusions of unveiling (ishārāt al-kashf).³¹

Again making a distinction between public and private interpretation, al-Qushayrī notes that those who receive this knowledge should not share it with others without being commanded to do so.

If they have been asked to maintain the veil and conceal the secret, they feign dumbness. If they have been commanded to reveal and proclaim, they freely release the elucidation of the Truth and speak from knowledge received from the Unseen.³²

Al-Qushayrī uses metaphors to describe those who understand these deeper meanings and those who do not.

Those who have been confirmed with the lights of insights (anwār al-baṣā'ir) are illuminated by the rays of the suns of understanding

(fahm). Those who have been clothed in a covering of doubt have been denied the subtleties of actualization, so that states (aḥwāl) divide them and mere conjectures (ẓunūn) plague them, and they are swept away in the wadis of doubt and deception. They only become more and more ignorant, more and more estranged through their uncertainty.³³

Rūzbihān al-Baqlī gives one possible explanation for why some can legitimately interpret the ambiguous verses while others should not. He writes that those who understand the meanings of the mutashābihāt see God in everything without falling into the trap of believing that God is incarnated in the world, while those who do not understand this mystery create chaos when they try to interpret them.

As for those in whose hearts is a turning away, they follow what is mutashābih in it. The people of blind imitation (taqlīd) plunge into the mutashābihāt, seeking unity (tawḥīd), but are cut off from witnessing it because they are the victims of illusion (aṣḥāb al-wahm), and the victim of illusion does not recognize the truth of temporally originated things (al-ashyāʾ al-muḥdatha). How can he recognize the existence of the Truth (ḥaqq) by the mark (rasm) of illusion? If he tries to seek the different kinds of knowledge of the mutashābihāt, he will not reach the truth regarding them and may create discord (fitna). It is because of this that the Prophet said, “Reflect upon the bounties of God, not His Essence.” One who has not traversed the seas of the realities of certainty has not seen the mirror of realization. The distinguishing mark (rasm) of the mutashābihāt falls short of that which has been marked for his faith. He does not grasp their meanings because this is the station of the lovers (ahl al-ʿishq) who see the Truth (ḥaqq) in everything. As one of the people of meanings (ahl al-maʿānī) said, “I do not see anything without seeing God in it.” This is the description of the manifestation of the Divine self-disclosure (tajallī) in the mirror of engendered existence (kawn). But this does not mean that God is in things because He is free from all forms of incarnation (ḥulūl).³⁴

Because those firmly rooted in knowledge are inwardly rooted in the knowledge of how things really are, they are outwardly calm, courageous, and self-effacing before life’s vicissitudes.

Those firmly rooted in knowledge are those who witness the quality of spirits (arwāḥ) [existing] prior to the bodies (ashbāḥ) in the court of pre-eternity, who have seen with their own eyes the concealed secrets of the particulars of the eternal types of knowledge. They have understood from them the end results of their situation in the pathways of subsistence (baqāʾ). They are firmly rooted in the sea of the source of certainty (ʿayn al-yaqīn) and are not agitated by the appearance of worldly authorities who are characterized by change, transformation, deceit and treachery. They are not overwhelmed by acts of force and the fear they arouse; they stand firm before the blows of God, standing firm with God in that which appears from Him bearing the mark of effacement (maḥw) and obliteration (tams). They know that all of it is a trial and a test, so they remain tranquil in servanthood ('ubūdiyya) as their outward distinguishing mark and are firmly rooted in the witnessing of lordliness (rubūbiyya) in their inward absolute reality.³⁵

Once again al-Kāshānī expresses a similar idea using different terminology. Those who are firmly rooted in knowledge are those who see unity and not multiplicity, the abiding face and not the appearance of multiplicity in the mirrors of created things. Al-Kāshānī understands the scholarly tradition of interpretation of referring the mutashābihāt to the muḥkamāt as interpretation through this mode of perception.

The gnostic verifiers (al-'ārifūn al-muḥaqqiqūn),³⁶ who recognize the abiding face in whatever form or outward appearance it takes, recognize the true face among the various faces which the mutashābihāt take and they refer them to the muḥkamāt, following the example of the poet:

There is only one face yet when you count the qualities there is multiplicity.

Those who are veiled, those in whose hearts is a turning away from the Truth, seek what is mutashābih because of their being veiled by multiplicity from unity. The verifiers follow the muḥkam, subordinating the mutashābih to it and choosing from its possible aspects what conforms to their religion (dīn) and school of thought (madhhab). Seeking discord, i.e. seeking to mislead themselves and others. And seeking its interpretation (ta'wīl) according to what conforms to their state (ḥāl) and method (tarīq). When the knife is crooked, its scabbard becomes crooked. Because they do not recognize the one abiding face among the other faces, it necessarily follows that they do not recognize the true meaning among the other [possible] meanings.³⁷

According to the Ṣūfīs, the knowledge of those who are firmly rooted in knowledge is not like the knowledge of religious scholars, but neither does it contradict it. One of the earliest writers on this topic, al-Tustarī, explains that their knowledge comes from their detachment from ordinary passion – a detachment which opens up the possibility of being granted profound knowledge directly from God of the many levels of meaning in the Qur'ān.

Those firmly rooted in knowledge. It has been related from 'Alī that they are those whom knowledge protects from the intrusion of passion (hawā) and arguments presented without [knowledge of] hidden things (al-ghuyūb), because God has guided them and given them power over his hidden secrets in the treasures of the different kinds of knowledge (‘ulūm). They say, “We believe in it,” and God is thankful to them and has made them the people of firmrootedness (ahl al-rusūkh) and extraordinary accomplishment in knowledge, an increase from Him, just as He said, Say, “Lord, increase me in knowledge” (20:114).

God made an exception for those firmly rooted in knowledge in their saying, “all of it is from our Lord,” meaning the abrogating and the abrogated, the muḥkam and the mutashābih. They are those who have uncovered (kāshifūn) three kinds of knowledge, since those who know (‘ulamā’) are of three kinds: those who devote themselves exclusively to knowledge of their Lord (rabbāniyyūn), those who devote themselves exclusively to knowing the Light (nurāniyyūn), and those who devote themselves exclusively to knowing the Essence (dhātiyyūn).³⁸ Additionally, there are four kinds of knowledge: revelation (wahy), God’s self-disclosure (tajallī), [knowledge] from what is near [to Him] (‘indī) and [knowledge] from [His very presence] (ladunī), as in His words We gave him mercy from Us (alaynāhu raḥmat^{an} min ‘indinā) and taught knowledge to him from Our very presence (‘allamnāhu min ladunnā ‘ilm^{an}) (18:65).³⁹

In his comments on but no one remembers except those who possess understanding, al-Kāshānī adds detachment from habit (‘āda) as another prerequisite for receiving deeper understanding. He also uses the etymology of the word albāb from the phrase *those who possess understanding (ūlū al-albāb)*⁴⁰ to create a metaphor for the transformation that is necessary to become wise. Lubb (pl. lubūb) means the choicest part or the kernel of foods such as nuts or wheat and lubāb (pl. albāb), from the same root, is the choicest part of anything. When said of a man, it means his intellect or understanding.⁴¹ Referring implicitly to this dual meaning, al-Kāshānī compares the “kernels” of the wise to the “husks” of the more ordinary human characteristics.

*And no one remembers that singular and decisive knowledge (al-‘ilm al-wāḥid al-faṣl) within the ambiguous and manifold particulars (al-tafāṣīl al-mutashābiha al-mutakaththira) except those whose intellects (‘uqūl) have been purified by the light of guidance and freed from the husk (qishr)⁴² of passion (hawā) and habit (‘āda).*⁴³

Al-Nisābūrī uses the metaphor of husks and kernels somewhat differently in his commentary on this verse. For al-Kāshānī, the contrast is between those who perceive unity and those who perceive multiplicity. For al-Nisābūrī, the contrasts are between ego existence and spiritual existence, the knowledge acquired in this life (‘ulūm kasbiyya) and knowledge given directly to man by God (‘ilm ladunī) on the Day of the Covenant.⁴⁴

And no one remembers except those possessing understanding (ūlū al-albāb), those who follow the example of the Prophet, leaving the darkness of the husks (qushūr) of their ego existence (wujūduhum al-naḥsānī) for the light of the kernel (lubāb) of their spiritual existence (wujūduhum al-rūḥānī). They are those who are firmly rooted in the husks of the acquired types of knowledge (al-‘ulūm al-kasbiyya) and who have reached the realities of the kernel (lubāb) of types of knowledge received from His very presence (al-‘ulūm al-laduniyya) from the very presence of one who is Wise, Knowing (min ladun ḥakīm khabīr) (11:1).

In the verse there is an allusion (ishāra) to the fact that the types of knowledge of those who are firmly rooted were all taught to them on the Day of the Covenant (al-mithāq), since He disclosed the attribute of lordship to the seeds of future humanity and He made them testify regarding themselves (7:172) by the evidence of lordship, Am I not your Lord? (7:172). Through the witnessing of this evidence, the knowledge of unity (tawḥīd) was firmly embedded in the natural disposition (jibla) of the seeds of future humanity and they said, "Yes." All of the different types of knowledge are included in the knowledge of unity, just as He said, and He taught Adam all of the names (2:31).

The seeds were sent back to the loins and were veiled by the attributes of humanity (ṣifāt al-bashariyya), and were transferred to wombs and wandered through the ages from one state and place to another, from the most remote places to the process of birth. The speaking soul, which knew the knowledge of unity, was sent back to the lowest of the low forms, veiled in the veil of humanity, forgetful of these different types of knowledge and the speech regarding them.

But then his parents remind him of this knowledge by means of symbols (rumūz) and analogies (qarā’in) until he remembers some of them from beneath the veils of human nature and stages of development. He speaks in the language of his parents, not the language with which he answered his Lord, saying, “Yes.” For that language was the kernel (lubb) of this language that is the husk (qishr). In a similar way, the entire outer and inner existence of man are husks of the kernel (lubāb) of that existence which heard and answered on the Day of the Covenant. His hearing is the husk of that hearing which listened to the speech of the Truth. His sight is the husk of that sight which saw the beauty of the Truth. His heart is the husk of that heart which understood the speech of the Truth. All of his different types of knowledge are the husk of those types of knowledge which were learned from the Truth.

Thus, the Prophet was only sent to remind him of the truth of these different types of knowledge, the husk of which his parents had reminded him, just as He said, Remind! You are only a reminder! (88:21). So the reminding is for everyone (al-tadhkīru ‘āmm) but only a few remember (al-tadhakkuru khāṣṣ). Because of this, He said, and no one remembers except those who possess understanding (ūlū al-albāb).⁴⁵

What distinguishes the Ṣūfī understanding of those who are firmly rooted in knowledge from other viewpoints is primarily their understanding of what type of knowledge is involved. Most Muslim thinkers accepted some combination of reason, authoritative tradition, and linguistic expertise as valid tools for interpreting the Qur’ān. For the Ṣūfīs, the sciences based on these tools are part of what al-Nīsābūrī calls acquired knowledge (‘ulūm kasbiyya). The sciences that lead to deeper knowledge of the Qur’ān’s meaning, however, are received directly from God (‘ilm ladunī). In Chapter 3, we will see the relationship between this type of knowledge and spiritual practice.

UNCOVERING MEANING

Knowledge and spiritual practice

For the Ṣūfīs, knowledge cannot be separated from spiritual practice. Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj (d. 988)¹ explains this view in his Kitāb al-luma', one of the earliest books to discuss the methodology of Ṣūfī Qur'ānic interpretation. According to Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj, the Ṣūfīs are characterized by their practical application (isti'māl) of the verses of the Qur'ān and the Traditions of the Prophet, which produces noble qualities, virtuous actions, and higher states, all of which are implied in the word adab. Although this manner of acting in imitation of the Prophet is also discussed in the books of scholars ('ulamā') and jurists (fuqahā'), al-Sarrāj claims that their understanding of these behaviors and attitudes is not as deep as their understanding of other sciences. He states that it is the Ṣūfīs who alone understand the various realities and attributes of states such as repentance (tawba), piety (wara'), trust in God (tawakkul), contentment (riḍā'), to name just a few. The people who experience these states attain them in various degrees according to what God has apportioned to them.²

In addition to their experience of states, the Ṣūfīs are also characterized by their knowledge of the soul (nafs), its characteristics and inclinations, the subtleties of hypocrisy (riyā'), hidden lust (al-shahwāt al-khafīyya), and hidden polytheism (al-shirk al-khafī). They know how to rid themselves of these vices by turning to God and giving up any sense of one's own ability and power.³

The Ṣūfīs are distinguished as well by what they have discovered (mustanbaṭāt) in sciences that are difficult for jurists and scholars to understand. Their ability to loosen the knots and understand what is difficult comes from their sacrificing the very core of their beings (badhl al-muhajj), so that when they speak of these discoveries, they speak from direct experience of them.⁴ Because of what they have discovered, the people of understanding (fahm) among the actualized (muḥaqqiqūn) conform to the Qur'ān and the practice of the Prophet externally (ẓāhir^{an}) and internally (bāṭin^{an}). When they act in this manner, God grants knowledge to them of the deeper meanings of the Qur'ān and Traditions of the Prophet.⁵

This last passage from Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj alludes to a ḥadīth that is cited in full by al-Ghazālī in his discussion of the relationship between certain kinds of knowledge and behavior in his Jawāhir al-Qur'ān.

Maybe you will say, “So demonstrate the purpose of the relationship between the two worlds, and why visions are by similitude (al-mithāl) and not the unambiguous (al-ṣarīḥ), and why the Prophet used to see Gabriel often in a form other than his own but only saw him twice in his own form.”

Know that you have become arrogant and have reached quite a height if you think that the knowledge of this can come to you all at once without your undertaking the task of preparing yourself to receive it by discipline (riyāḍa), effort (mujāhada), complete renunciation of the world, disengagement from the tumult of creation, utter immersion in love of the Creator, and the search for Truth. Knowledge like this will be withheld from the likes of you and it will be said,

You have come in order to learn the secret of my happiness but you will find me stingy with it.

Let go of your greed to attain this knowledge by means of exchanging treatises. Seek it only through the door of effort (mujāhada) and piety (taqwā). Then guidance will follow and strengthen your effort, just as God said, We will surely guide to Our paths those who have struggled (jāhadū) for Us (29:69). And the Prophet said, “For anyone who practically applies what he knows, God will bequeath knowledge of what he does not know.”⁶

Linking the bestowal of knowledge to practice and behavior was not unique to the Ṣūfīs but the emphasis they placed on it was. Abū ‘Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī (d. 1021) quotes a ninth century Ṣūfī as saying, “The whole of Sufism is ways of behavior (al-taṣawwuf kulluhu ādāb).”⁷

Reading the Qur’ān with presence of the heart (ḥuḍūr al-qalb)

Among the manners (ādāb) that the Ṣūfīs tried to cultivate was a respectful and thoughtful way of reciting or listening to the Qur’ān, intended to facilitate the understanding of its deeper meanings. Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj writes that

The people of understanding (fahm) among the people of knowledge (‘ilm) know that the only way to correctly connect to that to which the Qur’ān guides us is by pondering (tadabbur), reflecting (tafakkur), being wakeful (tayaqquḥ), recollecting (tadhakkur) and being present with the heart (ḥuḍūr al-qalb) when reciting the Qur’ān. They know this as well from His words, A book which We have sent down to you as a blessing so that they might ponder its verses and so that those who possess understanding might recollect (38:29). Pondering, reflecting and recollecting are only possible through the heart being present because God said, *surely in that there is a remembrance for one who has a heart (qalb) or will lend an ear with presence (aw alqā al-sam'a wa huwa shahid) (50:37), that is to say, one who is present with the heart (hādir al-qalb).*⁸

There were several different ways in which Ṣūfīs tried to awaken themselves to the task of listening with presence of the heart. One way was to remind themselves of the awesome nature of the revelation and its transcendent origins. An oft-repeated quote is attributed to Ja'far al-Šādiq saying, "I swear by God that God has disclosed himself (tajallā) to His creation in His speech but they do not see."⁹ Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī writes in his Qūt al-qulūb of a man from the first generations (salaf) who used to read a sūra and, if his heart wasn't in it, he would repeat it a second time.¹⁰ Another method is recorded in Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj's Kitāb al-luma' and attributed to Abū Sa'īd al-Kharrāz (d. 899):

There are three ways to listen and to be present while listening. The first is to listen to the Qur'ān as if you were hearing the Messenger of God recite it to you.

Then you should rise from this and hear it as if Gabriel was reciting it to the Prophet, because Allah said, and surely it is the revelation of the Lord of the worlds. The trustworthy spirit descends with it upon your heart (26:192–4).

Then you should rise from this so that it is as if you were hearing it from God (al-ḥaqq). That is God saying, We revealed the Qur'ān which is a healing and a mercy to the believers (17:84), and His words, the revelation of the Book is from God, the exalted, the wise (39:1) and it is as if you were hearing it from God most High. Likewise, Hā. Mīm. The revelation of the Book is from God, the exalted, the knowing (40:1).

In your listening [as if you were hearing it] from God, understanding (fahm) is brought out by the presence of your heart (ḥuḍūr al-qalb) and your being devoid of any preoccupation with the world and your self by the power of witnessing (mushāhada), the purity of remembrance (dhikr), focused attention (jam' al-hamm), good manners (ḥusn al-adab), purity of the innermost secret (sirr) and sincerity of realization (ṣidq al-tahqīq).¹¹

The result of this approach is described as both sweet and awesome. Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī tells us that a scholar said:

I used to read the Qur'ān but found no sweetness in it until I recited it as if I was hearing the Messenger of God reciting it to his Companions. Then I rose to a station above it and I recited it as if I was hearing Gabriel presenting it to the Messenger of God. Then God brought me to another way station and now I hear it from the Speaker. Here I found from it a blessing and delight I could not resist!¹²

He then tells the story of Ja'far al-Šādiq who was overcome by something during prayers and fainted. When he came, he was asked about it and said, "I kept repeating the verse in my heart until I heard it from its Speaker and my body was unable to stand firm when I saw His power."¹³ Al-Kāshānī quotes this tradition from Ja'far al-Šādiq and then relates his own experience:

Frequently, I used to engage in reciting the Qur'ān and pondering its meanings by means of the faculty of faith. In spite of diligence in devotions, my breast was tight and my heart was agitated, my heart neither opening because of these meanings, nor my Lord turning me away from them, until finally I became familiar and intimate with them. I tasted the sweetness of their cup and their drink. Then my soul was animated, my breast opened, my mind broadened, my heart expanded, my innermost secret made spacious, the moment (waqt) and the state (ḥāl) made pleasant, and my spirit delighted by that opening. It was as if continually, morning and evening, meanings were being unveiled to me in every verse such as would fatigue my tongue to describe. There could be no power adequate to contain them, nor enumerate them, nor any strength patient enough to divulge and disclose them.¹⁴

As in many other aspects of Sūfī piety, the various methods towards mindful reading were systematized by al-Ghazālī in his Iḥyā', drawing upon much of the material found in Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī's Qūt al-qulūb,¹⁵ expanding it and arranging it neatly into ten categories regarding the external courtesies of recitation (ẓāhir ādāb al-tilāwa) and ten categories regarding inner practices in the recitation of the Qur'ān (a'māl al-bāṭin fī tilāwat al-Qur'ān).¹⁶ The external courtesies, which will not be discussed here, have to do with the ritual state of the reciter, where and when he recites, the quantity, speed, volume and beauty with which he recites, the advisability of weeping while reciting, the ritual prostrations and supplications in reciting, and how the Qur'ān is to be written down.¹⁷ The inner practices are as follows:

- 1 Understanding the exaltedness and grandeur of the speech of the Qur'ān, and God's grace and kindness to His creation in His descending from his exalted throne to the level of their understanding. One of the examples used to explain this is a story of a wise man (ḥakīm) who preached to a king. The King asks him how it is that man is able to bear the speech of God. The wise man tells him that God's speaking to man is similar to man's speaking to the animals, descending to their level through the use of sounds and whistles. It is also like the Sun, the full gaze of which man is unable to bear, and yet he is able to attain what he needs from it.¹⁸
- 2 Exaltation of the Speaker. The reciter must be mindful¹⁹ of the majesty of the Speaker, knowing that what he reads is not the speech of man, and that there is an extreme danger in reciting the speech of God. Just as only the ritually pure may touch the Qur'ān, only the inward part of the heart that is pure and illuminated by the light of exaltation and reverence will be able to understand

- its inner meaning. The act of exaltation of the Speaker will come about only when the reciter reflects upon the attributes, majesty, and acts of God.²⁰
- 3 Presence of the heart (ḥuḍūr al-qalb) and abandonment of the talk of the soul (ḥadīth al-naḥs). Al-Ghazālī seems to be talking here about distracting thoughts. He says that a gnostic was asked, “When you read the Qur’ān does your soul talk about anything?” He said, “What would be more beloved to me than the Qur’ān so that my soul would talk of it?” This kind of mindfulness follows from the previously mentioned exaltation that creates an intimacy without any inattentiveness, as the reciter finds unending delights in the Qur’ān.²¹
 - 4 Pondering (tadabbur). Pondering goes beyond being present with the heart (ḥuḍūr al-qalb), for one might not be reflecting on anything but the Qur’ān yet nevertheless be merely hearing it without pondering it. Al-Ghazālī tells us that this is the purpose of reciting the Qur’ān and it is why it is recommended to read it in a slow and distinct manner (tartīl). He quotes ‘Alī b. Abū Ṭālib as saying, “There is no good in an act of worship without comprehension, nor in a recitation without pondering.”²² Al-Ghazālī’s distinction here between the presence of the heart (ḥuḍūr al-qalb) and pondering (tadabbur) is not one made by other Ṣūfī authors, who seem to use ḥuḍūr al-qalb as shorthand for all of the methods used in listening attentively. For example, Al-Qushayrī writes, “the method (sabīl) of the people of allusion (ishāra) and understanding (fahm) is listening with the presence of the heart (ḥuḍūr al-qalb).”²³
 - 5 Trying to understand (tafahhum). This is to seek to clarify each verse in a suitable manner by contemplating the meanings of the attributes and works of God, and the circumstances of the prophets and the people to which they were sent.²⁴
 - 6 The abandonment of the obstacles to understanding (fahm). Al-Ghazālī says that the veils to understanding are four: too much concern for the correct articulation of letters; rigidity and zealotry in following (taqlīd) a school of thought (madhhab) instead of allowing for insight (baṣīra) and witnessing (mushāhada); persistence in sin, being prideful, or being afflicted in general with a passion for the world with which one complies; belief that there are no meanings of the Qur’ān other than those transmitted from Ibn ‘Abbās,²⁵ Mujaḥid²⁶ and others, and that all other commentary is that from prohibited personal opinion (tafsīr bi’l-ra’y).²⁷
 - 7 Personal application (takhṣīs). The reader should assume that every message in the Qur’ān is meant for him. Since God’s message is intended for all people, it is intended for each individual. Al-Ghazālī here is inviting people to contextualize the text to their own experience, for if the reader assumes that he himself is being spoken to by God, he will not consider the study of the Qur’ān as work but, rather, will meditate upon it and act in accordance with it.²⁸
 - 8 Affectivity (ta’aththur). His heart should be affected by the tenor of different verses, so that for everything which he understands, his heart will be connected to a state (ḥāl) or strong emotion (wajd) such as grief (ḥuzn), fear (khawf), hope (rajā’), and so on. When his knowledge is perfected, the predominant state of his heart will be awe (khashya), for constriction (tadyīq) predominates in the verses of the Qur'ān. Therefore, he will notice that the mention of forgiveness and mercy is connected to conditions that he has yet to fulfill. The Qur'ān is meant to attract these states and to cause one to act on it; otherwise, the trouble of moving the tongue with its letters is insignificant.²⁹

- 9 Ascent (taraqqī). Al-Ghazālī repeats the three stations of reciting the Qur'ān from Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī's Qūt al-qulūb and elaborates. The first station is the servant who assumes he is reading to God, standing before him, and He sees him and hears him. His state is one of petitioning, adulation, imploring, and supplicating. The second station is when he witnesses with his heart that God sees him and speaks to him with His kindnesses and whispers to him with His blessings and beneficence. Therefore, his state is one of modesty, exaltation, attentiveness (iṣghā') and understanding (fahm). The third station is when he sees the Speaker in the speech and the Attributes in the words. Therefore, he does not look to himself, nor to his reading, nor to his blessings but rather, his attention is confined to the Speaker, his reflection devoted to him as he is immersed in witnessing the Speaker to the exclusion of anything else.³⁰
- 10 Disavowal (tabrī'). This is the disavowal of one's own ability and power, and of considering oneself with approval and self-validation. The reciter will not consider himself among those who are pious, although he hopes to join them. Instead, he should view himself as one among those who are disobedient and negligent.³¹

METHODS OF INTERPRETATION

Beyond describing how to prepare oneself for reading the Qur'ān, Ṣūfīs also wrote more specifically about their exegetical methodologies, referred to by a variety of different words or phrases. Most avoided using the term tafsīr, reserving this instead for what they called exoteric Qur'ānic interpretation.

Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj and the methods of understanding (fahm) and allusion (ishāra)

Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj tells us that there are three things that the sound interpreter will never do: change the word order of the Qur'ān; forget his basic servanthood by contesting the divinity; and distort words. Although he gives no examples of the first two errors, he illustrates word distortion (taḥrīf) with several examples. Here are two of them:

This is like what is related about someone who, when asked about His words, When Job cried to his Lord, "Truly I have been touched by distress (massanī al-ḍurr)" (21:83), said that its meaning was, "I have not been touched by distress (mā sā'anī al-ḍurr)."¹ We have heard that someone else, when asked about His words, Did He not find you an orphan (yatīm) and give (you) shelter? (93:6), said that the meaning of yatīm was understood [not as an orphan but] as the singular, incomparable pearl (al-durra al-yatīma allatī lā yūjadu mithlahā).¹

In contrast to these interpretative errors, Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj gives examples from two methods he deems to be correct Ṣūfī exegesis, the method of understanding (ṭarīq al-fahm) and the method of allusion (ṭarīq al-ishāra). One of several examples he gives to illustrate the method of understanding is from Abū Bakr al-Kattānī (d. 934) on Qur'ān 26:89, only the one who brings to God a sound heart.

According to the method of understanding (fahm), the sound heart is of three types: One of them is the one who comes to God with a heart in which there is no partner to God; the second is the one who comes to

God with a heart uninterested in anything but God, not desiring anything but God; and the third is the one who comes to God, existing only in Him, having been annihilated from all things in God, and then annihilated from God in God.²

Another example is from al-Shiblī (d. 945), who was asked about Qur’ān 50:37:

Truly in this is a remembrance for the one who has a heart or will lend an ear with presence, and he said, “For the one for whom God is his heart,” and then he recited, “From me to You, a heart has no meaning. From me to You, every one of my limbs is a heart.”³

These interpretations do not radically change the topic of the verses but rather meditate upon the meaning of the phrases “sound heart” or “listening with presence.” The controversial aspect of the interpretations has more to do with the fact of the inclusion of such Ṣūfī concepts as the annihilation of the self which was strenuously opposed by some Muslims.

The examples Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj gives for the allusive method of interpretation (ṭarīq al-ishāra), on the other hand, demonstrate far-reaching interpretative analogies which constitute a far more problematic kind of exegetical methodology. He quotes Abū Yazīd al-Biṣṭāmī (d. 874) who, when asked about gnosis (maʿrifa), replied with an allegorical interpretation of a Qur’ānic verse from the story of the prophet Sulaymān and the queen Bilqīs.

He said, Truly, when kings enter a village, they destroy it and debase the exalted among its inhabitants. This is the way they behave (27:34). What is meant by that is that it is the custom of kings, when they descend upon a village, to enslave its people and make them submissive to them, so that they can do nothing without the command of the king. Likewise, when gnosis (maʿrifa) enters the heart (qalb), nothing remains in it that it does not uproot, and nothing moves in it that it does not burn.⁴

In the story of Bilqīs and Sulaymān, these words are spoken by Bilqīs, demonstrating her political sagacity in trying to avoid a violent confrontation with Sulaymān’s forces. Al-Biṣṭāmī creates an analogy between the force of an invading king and a powerful knowledge that seizes the heart completely.

Another example Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj gives of this method is attributed to al-Junayd (d. 910). Considered a more “sober” Ṣūfī than al-Biṣṭāmī, his allusive interpretation demonstrates the acceptability of this kind of interpretation for most Ṣūfīs.

When asked about his silence and lack of movement during the spiritual concert (samāʿ), al-Junayd alluded to His words, and you see the mountains, thinking them to be firmly fixed, but they will pass as the clouds pass: the artistry of God who perfects everything (27:88).⁵

The verse is part of a passage describing the events of the Day of Judgment, but al-Junayd applies it here to his spiritual state in the present world.

This method of allusion (ṭarīq al-ishāra) is the more problematic of the two methods that Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj describes because it goes beyond the literal sense of the text. The controversial nature of this kind of interpretation is addressed some 200 years later in the writings of al-Ghazālī, who attempts to distinguish the method from that of the bāṭiniyya and philosophers.

Al-Ghazālī and the method of striking similitudes (ḍarb al-mithāl)

Al-Ghazālī's Mishkāṭ al-anwār is a book that includes both a methodology for Qur'ānic interpretation and al-Ghazālī's interpretation of the Light Verse of the Qur'an. Al-Ghazālī calls the methodology "the secret and method of creating similitudes (sirr al-tamthīl wa minhājihī)"⁶ or "the method of striking similitudes (minhāj ḍarb al-mithāl)."⁷ The phrase ḍarb al-mathal or ḍarb al-amthāl is used twenty-seven times in various forms in the Qur'ān – mostly to describe the analogies and parables created by God to explain things to mankind.

Al-Ghazālī connects the method of "striking similitudes" to the existence of two worlds, worlds which he describes using both philosophical and Qur'ānic terminology. The one world is spiritual (rūḥānī), intellectual ('aqlī), and supernal ('ulwī); it is the world of Sovereignty (malakūt) and the Unseen (ghayb). The other world is physical (jismānī), sensory (ḥissī), and lower (sufī); it is the world of Dominance (mulk) and the Visible (shahāda).⁸

The World of the Visible ('ālam al-shahāda) is the place from which one rises up to the World of Sovereignty ('ālam al-malakūt), an ascension made possible by the interrelationship (munāsaba) and connection (ittiṣāl) between the two. To help man's ascent, God has made the World of the Visible parallel to the World of Sovereignty. There is nothing in this world that does not have a likeness (mithāl) or several likenesses in that world, and there is nothing in that world which does not have a likeness or likenesses in this world.⁹ To illustrate this, al-Ghazālī uses the example of the viewing the celestial bodies by Ibrāhīm (Abraham).¹⁰

Indeed, there are high and noble luminous substances (jawāhir nūrāniyya sharīfa 'āliyya) in the World of Sovereignty ('ālam al-malakūt) that are called angels. Because lights emanate from them to human spirits, they are called "lords" (arbāb) and God is the "Lord of lords." They have varying degrees of luminosity that have similitudes (amthāl) in the World of the Visible ('ālam al-shahāda): the sun, the moon and the stars.

At first, the traveler on the way (al-sālik lil-ṭarīq) reaches a degree that is the degree of the stars, and the radiance of [the star's] light becomes clear to him. The fact becomes unveiled to him that the lowest world is entirely under its authority and the radiance of its light. Suddenly, from [the star's] beauty and sublimity, it becomes clear to him, and he says, “This is my lord!” (6:76). Then, when what is above [this star] becomes clear to him, the degree of the moon, he sees that the former has set in relationship to the latter, so he says, “I do not love that which sets” (6:76).

Likewise, he continues to ascend until he reaches that which has its similitude in the sun, and he sees that it is greater and more sublime. Yet he sees that it also has its similitude in its interrelationship (munāsaba) to the others, and whatever has a relationship with something imperfect is imperfect itself and “sets.” From this, he says, “I have turned my face to the one who created the heavens and the earth in pure faith (ḥanīf^{an})” (6:79).¹¹

The method of striking similitudes (ḍarb al-mithāl) is to find the connections between the physical and the spiritual world. Another example al-Ghazālī gives of this interpretative method in the Mishkāt al-anwār concerns God’s speech to Mūsā (Moses) in which Mūsā is asked to remove his shoes in the holy valley where he has seen a fire.¹²

If the first waystation of the prophets is the ascent to the world sanctified from the turbulence of sense perception and imagination, then the similitude (mithāl) of that waystation is the holy valley (20:12). And if it is not possible to tread that holy valley without removing the two worlds, meaning the present world and the hereafter, turning towards the One, God (al-ḥaqq) . . . , then the similitude of that removal is the taking off of the shoes at the time of switching to the pilgrims’ garments in order to turn towards the holy Ka’ba.¹³

Al-Ghazālī finds two parallel meanings for the removal of Mūsā’s shoes here. In the first, he compares the removal of the shoes to a spiritual state in which one distances oneself from concern for this world or the next. In the second, he compares it to the ritual enacted during the preparation for the pilgrimage. Al-Ghazālī explains that the method of striking similitudes (ḍarb al-mithāl) is like the science of dream or vision interpretation (ta’bīr).¹⁴

Accepting the literal and the symbolic meaning simultaneously is like accepting two different kinds of language acts. In his Jawāhir al-Qur’ān, al-Ghazālī suggests that knowledge of the deeper meanings of the Qur’ān requires knowledge of the language of similitudes:

I do not think that you will be successful (in seeking out the secrets of the Qur’ān) if you obstinately proceed with your own opinion (ra’y) and intellect (‘aql). How can you understand this when you do not understand the language of states (lisān al-aḥwāl)? Instead, you only believe in propositional speech (maqāl)! You will not understand the meaning of His words, There is nothing which does not proclaim His praise (17:44) nor His words, They [the heavens and the earth] said, “We have come willingly” (41:11) so long as you think that the earth has a language (lisān) and a life. You will not understand the words of the speaker who said, “The wall said to the peg, “Why are you making a hole in me?” He said, “Ask the one who is hammering me and does not drop me! Behind me is the stone which hammers me.” You are not aware that these words are true and more correct than propositional speech, so how will you understand the secrets that are behind this?¹⁵

The example of the talking inanimate objects, the wall and the peg, is one that al-Zamakhsharī also uses in his commentary, written some twenty years after al-Ghazālī’s death, in his interpretation of verse 41:11.¹⁶ Either al-Zamakhsharī borrowed from al-Ghazālī, which seems unlikely, or they both adopted the example from a previous commentator or theologian. Al-Zamakhsharī understands the words spoken by the heavens and the earth, “We have come willingly,” as a figurative expression (majāz) which is either the creation of a similitude (tamthīl) or an imaginative representation (takhyīl) whose only purpose is to depict the effect of God’s power over decreed things, having nothing to do with the real acts of speech and answering. He uses the example of the talking wall and peg both to illustrate the figurative use of speech and to confirm the meaning of the verse.

Whereas al-Zamakhsharī uses the concept of figurative language to solve the problem of the anthropomorphism of the verse, al-Ghazālī’s point seems to be different. Although he might have agreed with al-Zamakhsharī’s interpretation as it explains a verse which otherwise seems literally absurd, al-Ghazālī is saying something more than that; he is asserting that metaphorical and symbolic ways of speaking are superior modes of expression for facilitating deeper comprehension of the Qur’ān. Ibn ‘Arabī develops this idea further in his writings by comparing the rational and imaginative faculties in man.

Ibn ‘Arabī and the method of allusion (ishāra)

Unlike al-Ghazālī, Ibn ‘Arabī rejects rational interpretation (ta’wīl ‘aqlī) outright. Although there are aspects of the revelation which reason declares impossible, this only proves the imperfection of man’s rational faculties, not the necessity of interpretation.¹⁷ Man has two faculties by which he obtains knowledge of God. The faculty of reason (‘aql) in man works by means of reflection (fikr), using the language of abstraction. It is capable of knowing God’s incomparability, how He is utterly different from His creation. The imaginative faculty (khayāl) in man, on the other hand, works through sensory perceptions, using the language of images. It is capable of perceiving God’s similarity in His self-disclosures (rajālī) in His creation. Perfect knowledge combines both of these faculties. Use of only the rational faculty turns God into an abstraction and use of only the imaginative faculty leads to polytheism and anthropomorphism.¹⁸

The Qur’ān uses both abstractions and images to communicate its message, but the latter predominate because revelation entails a descent of meanings into the imaginal realm and sense perception and is an act of connection, not separation. The rational faculty is unable to understand the images of the Qur'ān and therefore seeks to interpret it so as to make it conform to the dictates of reason, but this leads to a distortion of its meaning. Prophets and friends of God, on the other hand, accept the whole of the Qur'ān because they understand the language of images by means of unveiling (kashf).¹⁹ To use al-Ghazālī's example described previously, the prophets and friends of God will understand what the verse They said, "We have come willingly" (41:11) means because they have experienced it through the seeing, hearing, and tasting of the imaginative faculty.

Only the prophets and friends of God understand the principles of "striking similitudes" (ḍarb al-amthāl). They can strike similitudes themselves because God has taught them how to do this, and they recognize the similitudes that God has struck for Himself because they have witnessed the connection between the similitude and the meaning it represents.²⁰ However, "striking similitudes" (ḍarb al-amthāl) is not the term Ibn 'Arabī uses to describe Ṣūfī interpretation of the Qur'ān, nor does he use the term ta'wīl, which he applies almost exclusively to the kind of rational interpretation (ta'wīl 'aqlī) of which he is so critical.²¹ Instead, the term Ibn 'Arabī prefers is "allusion" (ishāra). He explains that Ṣūfīs have chosen this word over "commentary" (tafsīr) in order to defend themselves from the ignorance of exotericists. The word ishāra, which literally means "to point," is used just once in the Qur'ān (19:29), in a verse referenced by Ibn 'Arabī as part of his explanation for the Ṣūfīs' adoption of the term. Just as Maryam (the Virgin Mary) "pointed" to the infant 'Īsā (Jesus) so that he spoke in her defense against the accusations of her people, so do Ṣūfīs "point" or "make allusion" to what they know so that they will not be attacked by uncomprehending exotericists.²²

Some of the examples of Ibn 'Arabī's own Qur'ānic interpretation in his Futūḥāt al-makkiyya resemble Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj's method of allusion (tarīq al-ishāra)²³ and al-Ghazālī's "striking of similitudes" (ḍarb al-mithāl), albeit with the addition of his own technical vocabulary. Chittick translates one such example from the Futūḥāt on verses 52:1–8 of the Qur'ān:

By the mount – the body, because of the natural inclination within it, since it is not independent through itself in its wujūd [existence].

And a book inscribed from a divine dictation and a right hand writing with a pen of potency.

On a parchment, that is your own entity – by way of allusion, not exegesis.

Unrolled, manifest, not rolled up, so it is not curtained.

By the inhabited house, that is, the heart that embraces the Real, so He is its inhabitant.

And the uplifted roof – the sensory and suprasensory faculties in the head.

And the burning sea, that is nature kindled with the ruling fire that necessitates movement.

Surely thy Lord's chastisement is about to fall. In other words, something from which the animal self, the command spirit, and the high intellect take refuge but which derives from the self's nurturing Master, who makes its affair wholesome, is about to fall and come down upon it. For the self possesses the low waystations absolutely in respect to its possibility and relatively in respect to its nature.

There is none to avert it, because there is only what I have mentioned. What we have is receiving His coming down and climbing up to His approach. Between these two properties become manifest the barzakhs [isthmuses], which possess towering splendor and firmly-rooted knowledge.²⁴

In this interpretation, the five signs invoked to attest to the reality of the Day of Judgment are taken to refer to the spiritual makeup of man. Events which will occur at the end of time are taken to refer to events which happen in the here and now. What makes Ibn 'Arabī's correspondence between these two realities unique is the way in which he connects them. The first verse of this sūra is By the mount (wa'l-ṭūr); as Chittick explains,

The word ṭūr or "mount" derives from a root that means to approach something and to hover around it. The Shaykh takes the etymological sense as an allusion to the bodily nature's inclinations, which draw it toward things that it desires.²⁵

It is this close attention to the etymological and grammatical possibilities of the text which distinguishes Ibn 'Arabī's approach to Qur'ānic interpretation, an approach based on the assumption that all the possible meanings which the Arabic language allows for any given word or group of words in the Qur'ān are valid. To reject any one of these meanings is to limit God's knowledge, to imply that He was unaware of the various ways in which His Book could be interpreted.²⁶

One example which shows the difference between this kind of hyperliteralism and a more purely symbolic or allegorical approach is Ibn 'Arabī's interpretation of the verse, "laysa ka-mithlihi shay'um" (42:11), which can be translated as, there is nothing similar to him. The ka means "like" and mithl means "similar." Ibn 'Arabī accepts the common explanation that the ka here merely serves to reinforce the meaning of mithl. He also endorses an interpretation in which ka retains its meaning, making it possible to translate the verse as there is nothing like His similar, and to understand it as a reference to the Perfect Man.²⁷ Although the common interpretation of this verse is that it asserts God's incomparability, Ibn 'Arabī's acceptance of all possible interpretations allows him to find in it confirmation for God's incomparability and His similarity. Ibn 'Arabī understood this interpretative approach as an extreme fidelity to the possibilities of the Qur'ānic text. His critics denounced it as a distortion of its meaning (tahrīf ma'ānī 'l-Qur'ān).²⁸

Al-Nisābūrī and al-Kāshānī and the method of esoteric interpretation (ta'wīl)

The terms tafsīr and ta'wīl have a complicated history.²⁹ In the first few centuries of Islam, they were used interchangeably to refer to any commentary on the Qur'ān. Over time, however, the word tafsīr began to be applied only to those works that relied heavily on the transmitted interpretative traditions from the first few generations of Muslims, while ta'wīl became a term used to describe other types of interpretations. In the fourteenth century both al-Nisābūrī and al-Kāshānī used the word ta'wīl to describe their interpretative activity.

Al-Nisābūrī divides his commentary Gharā'ib al-Qur'ān into three sections comprised of variant readings (qirā'āt and wuqūf), exoteric commentary (tafsīr), and esoteric commentary (ta'wīl). His understanding of how the last two relate to one another is set forth in his introduction:

Know that the requirement of religion is that the Muslim should not interpret (yū'awwīlu) anything in the Qur'ān or the ḥadīth according to meanings which would invalidate the essentials which the Prophet and the pious first generations (al-salaf al-ṣāliḥ) commented (fassara) on, like the Garden, the Fire, the Path, the Balance, the palaces, the rivers, the trees, etc. Instead, he must affirm these essentials just as they have been set forth.

Then, if he understands from them other realities (ḥaqā'iq), symbols (rumūz), and subtleties (laṭā'if) which have been unveiled to him, there is no harm. For surely God has not created anything in the world of form ('ālam al-ṣūra) that does not have an equal (naẓīr) in the world of meaning ('ālam al-ma'na). And nothing is created in the world of meaning, which is the Hereafter, which does not have a reality (ḥaqīqa) in the world of Truth ('ālam al-ḥaqq), which is the unseen of the unseen (ghayb al-ghayb). And nothing is created in the two worlds that does not have patterns (namādhij) in the world of mankind ('ālam al-insān). But God knows best.³⁰

The essentials (a'yān) that Nisābūrī mentions here are elements of the Afterlife that Islamic philosophers interpreted allegorically, an act of interpretation for which they were strongly criticized. Al-Nisābūrī emphatically states that these elements must be accepted as literal truth. His method of interpretation resembles that described by al-Ghazālī in his Mishkāt al-anwār, in which correspondences are uncovered between the physical and spiritual worlds.

Writing in the same period, al-Kāshānī uses the terms tafsīr and ta'wīl in much the same way as al-Nisābūrī does, although al-Kāshānī writes only ta'wīl. In addition to the term ta'wīl, al-Kāshānī refers to "taṭbīq," a word that means "to make correspondences."³¹ In the introduction to his commentary, al-Kāshānī writes that the process of ta'wīl is unending, while that of tafsīr is limited.

Al-Kāshānī believes that, while it is prohibited to alter the external sense of the Qur'ān, this prohibition does not extend to understanding its additional meanings.

It is said that the one who interprets (fassara) by his own opinion (ra'y) has become an infidel (kafara). As for esoteric interpretation (ta'wīl), it never ceases because it varies according to the states of the listener and his circumstances in the stages of his traveling and his different phases. Whenever he rises from a station, a door of new understanding is opened to him, and he beholds (ittala'a)³² by means of it the subtlety of a ready meaning.³³

Here, al-Kāshānī's view is not without precedent. Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj had also pointed out this difference between exoteric and esoteric commentary:

[The Ṣūfīs] differ in their deductions just as the exotericists (ahl al-zāhir) do. However, the differences of opinion between the exotericists lead to error while this is not so in the science of the inward (ilm al-bāṭin) because the differences [represent] virtues, advantages, noble characteristics, states, morals, stations and degrees. It is said that the differences of opinion among the scholars (ulamā') in the science of exotericism (ilm al-zāhir) is a mercy from God because the one who is right refutes the one who is wrong, thereby making the error of his opponent in religion clear to people so that they turn away from him. If this were not the case, people would leave their religion.

But the differences of opinion between the people of realities is also a mercy from God because each one of them speaks from where he is at the moment (waqtuhu) in response to his state, making allusions from his ecstasy (wajd). There is a benefit in their words for everyone from amongst those who observe acts of obedience and the lords of the hearts, the aspirants and those who are realized, according to their different capacities, characteristics and degrees... [Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj demonstrates his point here with different interpretations of what the "true faqīr" means from ten different Ṣūfīs...] They have all differed in their replies just as they have differed in where they were at the moment (awqāt) and their states, but all are sound (ḥasan). Each reply belongs to the group of people suitable for it, and each is a benefit, blessing, increase and mercy for them.³⁴

Rūzbihān comments on this as well, speaking of the Ṣūfīs in the past:

They spoke according to their stations (maqāmāt) in the presence of His Omnipotence (jabarūt) and according to the extent of their travelling in the open spaces of His Kingdom (malakūt). They spoke by means of convincing allusions (ishārāt) and suitable expressions (ibārāt) from pure hearts, grounded intellects (uqūl rāsikha), passionate spirits, and sanctified innermost secrets. The differences between their perceptions of the allusions of the Qur'ān is like their differences in degrees of what they have seen, the unveilings, states, approaches, visions of unseen things, and that which shines upon their innermost secrets from the lights of preeternal and everlastingly eternal things. What they attained is in what they said. They told of the depth of the sea of the Qur'ān because it is the qualities of the Merciful and all of its realities cannot be perceived by contingent beings.³⁵

Al-Simnānī and commentary on the seven inner senses (tafsīr al-buṭūn al-sab'a)

In the introduction to his Qur'ānic commentary, al-Simnānī explains that the “student of commentary on the seven inner senses” will have to learn special technical terms (iṣṭilāḥāt). The “seven inner senses” is a reference to a ḥadīth which states, “The Qur'ān has an exoteric sense (ẓahr) and an inner sense (batn), and its inner sense has an inner sense up to seven inner senses (buṭūn).”³⁶ The “special technical terms” (iṣṭilāḥāt) refer to spiritual faculties of man called “subtle substances” (laṭā'if), each of which corresponds to a prophet mentioned in the Qur'ān.³⁷

It is a system of correspondences based on Qur'ān 41:53: We will show them Our signs in the horizons (āfāq) and in their souls (anfus) until it becomes manifest to them that this is the truth (41:53).³⁸ Knowledge and deeper understanding of the Qur'ān, as well as the ability to benefit from it, requires the discovery of the connection between the horizons (āfāq) and souls (anfus), between the prophets and the subtle substances (laṭā'if) of man. Man has the potential to develop spiritually from a speaking animal to the bearer of the trust of God. At each level of his development, he becomes the possessor of a new subtle substance (laṭīfa) as shown in Table 4.1.

The reader of the Qur'ān should recognize these correspondences so as to be able to practically apply the lessons of the stories of the prophets to one's own struggle. Al-Simnānī explains this process with examples from each of the seven levels, as in this passage on the bodily subtle substance (laṭīfa qālabīyya) and the prophet Ādam:

Whenever you hear a part of the Book addressing Adam, listen to it with your subtle bodily subtle substance (laṭīfa qālabīyya). Apply your bodily subtle substance practically in what has been commanded and prohibited for it, and take heed in the similitudes struck for it (bi-mā ḍuriba mathal^{an} lahu). Know with certainty that the inner sense (batn) of this Book is connected to you in [the realm of] souls (anfus) just as its external sense is connected to Adam in [the realm of] horizons (āfāq), to enable you to benefit from the Speech of the Truth and so that you may be one of those who read [the Qur'ān] fresh and anew.³⁹

Table 4.1 Al-Simnānī's theory of subtle substances (laṭā'if)

Seven subtle substances (laṭā'if)	Prossessor of the subtle substance	Corresponding prophet subtle bodily substance (al-laṭīfa al-qālabīyya)	man (insān)	Ādam subtle soul substance (al-laṭīfa al-naḥsiyya)	civilized man (al-insān al-madanī)	Nūḥ (Noah)
subtle heart substance (al-laṭīfa al-qalbiyya)	submitter (muslim)	Ibrāhīm (Abraham) subtle innermost substance (al-laṭīfa al-sirriyya)	believer (mu'min)	Mūsā (Moses) subtle spirit substance (al-laṭīfa al-rūhiyya)	friend (walī)	Dāwūd (David) subtle mystery substance (al-laṭīfa al-khaḥfiyya)	prophet (nabī)	ʿĪsā (Jesus)
subtle reality substance (al-laṭīfa al-ḥaqqiyya or al-laṭīfa al-anā'iyya)	seal (khātim)	Muḥammad

On this initial level, the struggle is to respond to the Qur'ānic commands and prohibitions pertaining to the body. On the next level, the level of the subtle soul substance (laṭīfa al-naḥsiyya) and the prophet Nūḥ, the struggle is to contain one's passion and anger which will otherwise be like an overwhelming flood, and so on. When one reads about the communities of each of these prophets, they should recognize its believers, unbelievers, and hypocrites as corresponding to the forces within each of their subtle substances (laṭā'if) which may act in harmonious or harmful ways.⁴⁰

The discovery of these subtle substances and their correspondences with the stories of the prophets is an experiential one. Al-Simnānī explains that no one will believe what he has said until they have witnessed it for themselves. But once this scheme has been understood, the reader will know with certainty that the Qur'ān has seven inner senses. Al-Simnānī gives an example of how these can be discovered in a single verse of the Qur'ān 4:43. He addresses only the first part of it:

O you who believe, do not come to prayers while intoxicated until you are able to know what you are saying; nor in a state of ritual impurity, unless you are traveling, until you have done the major ablution.

The external meaning of this verse is clear, admonishing the believer in a state of drunkenness or impurity to delay saying his prayers until he is sober and ritually pure. In al-Simnānī's commentary on the inner senses of the verse, the states of drunkenness and impurity refer to increasingly subtle forms of forgetfulness and attachment. In the first inner sense of this verse, drunkenness and impurity is the result of preoccupation with the affairs of the world. The ablution for it is the “water” of the traditional remembrance (al-dhikr al-rasmī). In the second inner sense of the verse, the state of drunkenness and impurity is brought about by passion (hawā) and its ablution is accomplished with the “water” of the instructional remembrance (al-dhikr al-ta’līmī). In each of the inner senses that follow, the believer risks intoxication and impurity resulting from the ever-higher states he achieves. The ablution at each level is the “water” of the appropriate remembrance (dhikr). Without a state of sobriety and purity, there can be no prayer or intimate conversation with God.⁴¹

ATTACKING AND DEFENDING ŞŪFĪ QUR'ĀNIC INTERPRETATION

The problem of distinguishing sound exegesis from exegesis by mere personal opinion (tafsīr bi'l-ra'y)

Although there are indications that in the earliest period of Islam some Muslims objected to any kind of commentary on the Qur'ān, the necessity of interpretation was overwhelmingly accepted by the tenth century. Disagreements continued, however, over what constitutes legitimate commentary and exegetes had to justify their endeavors in light of a hadīth on interpretation transmitted from Ibn 'Abbās:

The Prophet said, "Whoever speaks of the Qur'ān from his personal opinion (ra'y), let him take his seat in the Fire."¹

A similar tradition quotes the first caliph Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq as saying,

What earth would carry me, what heaven shelter me, if I were to speak of the Qur'ān from my personal opinion (ra'y) or of what I do not know?²

The question became how to distinguish sound and acceptable interpretation from the prohibited interpretation by personal opinion (tafsīr bi'l-ra'y). In the introduction to his Jāmi' al-bayān, al-Ṭabarī writes that the Qur'ān is comprised of three parts: the part whose interpretation is known only to God; the part whose interpretation is known only to the Prophet and, through his explanation or other indication, to his community; and the part known only to those who possess knowledge of the Arabic language.³ The first part of the Qur'ān should not be interpreted by anyone and the second part can only be understood by means of an explanation of the Prophet; otherwise, it is interpretation by personal opinion (tafsīr bi'l-ra'y).⁴ The best interpreters of the Qur'ān will be those who are clearest in proving their interpretations based on the most authentic traditions of the Prophet and their knowledge of Arabic language. Furthermore, they will not disagree with what has been said by the Companions and Followers of the Prophet, and the men of knowledge in the community.⁵ After al-Ṭabarī there were religious scholars who believed that any commentary that did not base itself entirely on the early interpretative tradition (tafsīr bi'l-ma'thūr) was an interpretation by personal opinion (tafsīr bi'l-ra'y), and therefore prohibited. Al-Ghazālī was one of the first to contest this view.

Al-Ghazālī on tafsīr bi'l-ra'y

Al-Ghazālī addressed the problem of defining what constitutes tafsīr bi'l-ra'y as part of his defense of Šūfī Qur'ānic interpretation in his Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn.

What is intended by [the prohibition on commentary of the Qur'ān] must either be a restriction to what has been transmitted (naql) or heard [from authorities] (masmū'), abandoning any deduction (istinbāṭ) and independent understanding (istiqlāl bi'l-fahm), or what is intended is something else. It is completely wrong to think that what is intended is that one should not speak about the Qur'ān except according to what one has heard, for several reasons.⁶

Al-Ghazālī presents four arguments for not confining commentary to the transmitted tradition. First, the traditions traceable to the Prophet explain only part of the Qur'ān. Most of the transmitted exegetical tradition comes from Companions such as Ibn 'Abbās and Ibn Mas'ūd and represents their own opinions, not what they heard from the Prophet himself. Therefore, these interpretations can be called tafsīr bi'l-ra'y. Second, the Companions and early exegetes had disagreements over the interpretation of Qur'ānic verses. Third, there is a distinction between interpretation and revelation. This is demonstrated in the Prophet's prayer for Ibn 'Abbās, "O God, instruct him in religion and teach him interpretation (ta'wīl)."⁷ Al-Ghazālī asks, "If interpretation was what has been heard [from authorities] (masmū') like what has been revealed (tanzīl), what would be the purpose of granting him that?"⁷ Fourth, the Qur'ān confirms the possibility of deduction (istinbāṭ) independent of transmitted knowledge in Qur'ān 4:83, "Truly, those among them who are able to deduce (the matter) (yastanbiṭūnahu) know it."⁸

Having discussed what the ḥadīth on tafsīr bi'l-ra'y does not mean, al-Ghazālī continues with what he believes is the correct interpretation of the ban on tafsīr bi'l-ra'y.

The prohibition is for one of two reasons: The first is where someone has an opinion (ra'y) regarding something to which he is inclined by his nature (ṭab') and inclination (hawā), so he interprets (yata'awwalu) the Qur'ān in accordance with his opinion and inclination so that he can argue for the authenticity of his own objective (gharaḍ). If he did not have that opinion and inclination, that meaning would not have appeared to him from the Qur'ān.

Sometimes this is done knowingly like the one who argues for the authenticity of his innovation (bida') by means of some verses of the Qur'ān, knowing that that is not what is meant by the verse, but he seeks to deceive his opponent by it.

Other times it may be done unknowingly but, since the verse has a potentiality for more than one meaning, his understanding of it inclines to the sense which agrees with his objective, that view having been preferred because of his opinion and inclination. He has commented by means of his opinion, i.e., his opinion has led him to that commentary. If he did not have that opinion, then he would not have preferred that sense.

Other times he may have a sound objective, and so he seeks some indication (dalīl) for that from the Qur'ān and then proves it with something he knows was not intended for that . . . this is like someone who calls for struggle with the hard heart and says, God says, “Go to Pharoah. Truly, he has transgressed,” (20:24) and he points to his own heart and indicates that that is what was intended by Pharoah. This kind [of interpretation] is what some preachers do with sound intentions of beautifying their talk and attracting the listener, but it is prohibited. The bāṭiniyya have utilized this with corrupt intentions to deceive people and invite them to their false school of thought. In accordance with their opinion (ra'y) and school of thought, they bring the Qur'ān down to matters which they most certainly know are not what was intended by it.

These categories are the first of the two reasons for the prohibition of tafsīr bi'l-ra'y. What is meant [in the ḥadīth] by personal opinion (ra'y) is the false personal opinion that agrees with inclination (hawā) without sound personal effort (al-ijtihād al-ṣaḥīḥ). Personal opinion (ra'y) includes the true and the false. That which agrees with inclination (hawā) can be designated by the term “ra'y.”⁹

Al-Ghazālī is making a distinction between two types of personal opinion (ra'y): sound personal effort (al-ijtihād al-ṣaḥīḥ), which is praiseworthy, and opinion biased by inclination (hawā), which is not. The latter is blameworthy whether the interpreter is aware of his distortion of the meaning of the Qur'ān, and whether his intention is sound, as in the case of the preacher, or unsound, as in the case of the bāṭiniyya. His example of the sound-intentioned but nonetheless blameworthy interpreter who suggests that what is meant by Pharoah is the hard heart is a strange one, given that this is exactly the kind of interpretation practiced by some Şūfīs. Al-Ghazālī himself justifies it in his other works with his theory of correspondences, a theory we will return to shortly. Al-Ghazālī continues with the second reason for the ban on tafsīr bi'l-ra'y.

The second is where someone hastens to comment on the Qur'ān on the basis of the external sense of the Arabic without seeking help from listening [to authorities] (samā') and transmission (naql) regarding the strange words (gharā'ib) of the Qur'ān, its obscure and alternate expressions, its abridgment, elision, ellipsis, and word order. One who does not master the exoteric aspect of commentary and hastens to deduce meaning purely on [his own] understanding of the Arabic language will have made many errors and will have joined the group of those who interpret the Qur'ān by personal opinion (ra'y).

Transmission (naql) and hearing [from authorities] (samā') in the external aspect of commentary (tafsīr) are necessary for him first, so that by means of it, he will be wary of situations of error. After that, understanding (fahm) and deduction (istinbāt) will be expanded. The strange words (gharā'ib) that can be understood only through hearing [from authorities] (samā') are many. We will point out some of them so that one can seek information about words like them and know that it is not permissible to neglect the memorization of exoteric commentary first; there is no hope of reaching the inner sense (bāṭin) before mastering the exoteric sense (ẓāhir). One who claims to understand the secrets of the Qur'ān without mastering exoteric exegesis is like one who claims to have reached the inside of the house before crossing through the door, or the one who claims to understand what Turks mean in their speech without his having understood their language. Truly, exoteric commentary is the same as learning the language that is necessary for understanding, and there are many areas that can only be learned by hearing from [authorities] (samā') and there is no hope in reaching the inner sense (bāṭin) before mastering the external sense (ẓāhir).¹⁰

Al-Ghazālī is stating his belief that understanding the information transmitted from the Companions and Followers of the Prophet is necessary, but only as a first step in interpretation, and he appears to be limiting the usefulness of their commentary primarily to linguistic explanations. Because of the conflicting interpretations found among early exegetes, al-Ghazālī rejects an unquestioning acceptance of their interpretations in areas other than issues of language. Although al-Ghazālī's purpose here is to defend Ṣūfī exegesis in particular, his argument works as well for any exegete wishing to go beyond the interpretations of the first generations of Muslims. His argument was, in fact, adopted by one of the most well-known Qur'ānic commentators, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad al-Qurṭubī (d. 1272),¹¹ who quotes al-Ghazālī without due attribution to him almost word for word in the introduction to his commentary, Al-Jāmi' li-aḥkām al-Qur'ān.¹²

Ibn al-Jawzī and Ibn Taymiyya on the importance of transmitted information

Al-Ghazālī firmly believed that the interpretation of the Qur'ān should not be restricted to the transmitted tradition. He rather bluntly says that, the one who claims that the Qur'ān has no other meaning that what exoteric exegesis has provided should know that he has acknowledged his own limitations and therefore is right with regards to himself, but is wrong in an opinion that brings everyone else down to his level.¹³

A critical response to this view can be found in the Kitāb talbīs Iblīs (The Book of the Devil's Deception) written by Ibn al-Jawzī (d. 1200). Ibn al-Jawzī attempts in this book to identify and correct the errors he sees among his fellow Muslims, devoting approximately half of the book to the errors of Şūfis even though he appears to have been a member of a Şūfī order himself.¹⁴

According to Ibn al-Jawzī, the starting point for all the delusions of the Şūfis is their turning away from seeking transmitted knowledge.¹⁵ The devil deceives them in this matter in several ways. First, he shows them how much work is involved in seeking knowledge while making ease and comfort seem attractive. Some Şūfis have said that preoccupation with transmitted knowledge is idleness but this is only because they have seen the commitment it requires.

Second, he causes them to be content with just a little knowledge, so that they believe that those who seek extensive knowledge of ḥadīth do so only for prestige and their own pleasure. Ibn al-Jawzī concedes this desire for prestige, but compares it to the desire for marriage, a desire that is necessary for the greater goal of procreation.

Third, he causes some of them to believe that the objective is practice (ʿamal) without understanding that devotion to knowledge is the most perfect practice.

Last, the Devil deceives the Şūfis into believing that knowledge is acquired from inner processes (bawāṭin) and inspiration (ilhām), without intermediary (bi-lā wāsiṭa). Ibn al-Jawzī does not deny the possibility of inspiration but insists that it is not knowledge in and of itself, but is rather the fruit of knowledge and piety. He insists that there can be no knowledge without the intermediary of transmitted knowledge; otherwise, there would be no way of knowing whether the inspiration received is sound or merely a Satanic suggestion. Those who belittle transmitted knowledge attack the religious law (sharīʿa), a charge tantamount to infidelity. He notes that this is the case with Abū Yazīd al-Bisṭāmī when he criticized religious scholars, saying, "Poor people! They get their knowledge from the dead, but we get our knowledge from the Living One who never dies."¹⁶

According to Ibn al-Jawzī, there is never a point where one moves beyond the need for transmitted knowledge. He disapprovingly relates a story regarding the Şūfī Aḥmad ibn Abū'l-Hawārī:

Aḥmad ibn Abū'l-Hawārī threw his books into the sea and said, "Yes, you were proof (dalīl), but devotion to proof after attainment (wuṣūl) is absurd." Aḥmad ibn Abū'l-Hawārī had searched out ḥadīth for thirty years. When he attained all he could from them, he carried his books to the sea, submerged them and said, "O knowledge, I have not done this to you out of disdain, nor out of disdain for what is your due. Rather, I used to seek you out in order to be guided by you to my Lord. Now that I have been guided by you, I have no further need of you."¹⁷

Ibn al-Jawzī understands that Ṣūfis justify their position concerning transmitted knowledge by dividing knowledge into the exoteric (ilm al-ẓāhir) and esoteric (ilm al-bāṭin), but it is a distinction he rejects.

Many of the Ṣūfis make a distinction between the law (sharʿa) and the truth (ḥaqīqa) but this is an ignorant thing to say because all of the law is different kinds of truths (ḥaqāʾiq).¹⁸

Despite this criticism, Ibn al-Jawzī notes that there have been many Ṣūfis who do insist upon the necessity and primacy of the law.

Ibn Taymiyya was an admirer of Ibn al-Jawzī, and he demonstrates a similar belief in the primacy of transmitted knowledge. He insists that knowledge can never be received directly without the intermediary of the ḥadīth and Traditions, and he attacks any belief to the contrary as a corrupt influence from philosophy.

What is stated by different groups of the bāṭiniyya – the Shiʿī bāṭiniyya such as the writers of the “Epistles of the Brotherhood of Purity” and the Ṣūfī bāṭiniyya such as Ibn Sabʿīn and Ibn ʿArabī and others, and as also found in the writings of Abū Ḥāmid [al-Ghazālī] and others – that it is possible for men who practice spiritual exercises, purification of the heart, and development of the soul by means of praiseworthy characteristics, to come to know the realities that have been related from the Prophets concerning belief in God, angels, the Book, the prophets and the Last Day, and information about the jinn and devils, without the intermediary of communication from the prophets, is based upon this false premise, which is that when they purify themselves this will descend upon their hearts either through the “Active Intellect” or by some other means.¹⁹

He criticizes Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī in particular for stating this belief frequently in his works and for suggesting that those who practice spiritual disciplines may hear the speech of God just as Mūsā did. According to Ibn Taymiyya this contradicts the correct beliefs held by the founders of the four Schools of Law, ḥadīth scholars and the “real” Ṣūfis (ṣūfiyya muḥaqqiqūn) who follow the Messenger.²⁰ However, Ibn Taymiyya does not deny that there is a connection between knowledge and practice but rather insists that this knowledge will never be received other than by means of the prophets.

Some theologians have criticized what is true in [al-Ghazālī’s writings], claiming that the practice of spiritual disciplines and purification of the heart has no effect whatsoever in obtaining knowledge. They are also wrong in this denial since the truth is that piety and purification of the heart are among the strongest means to acquiring knowledge. However, the Book and the Sunna must be resorted to for knowledge and practice. It is not possible for anyone after the Prophet to know by himself without the intermediary of the Prophet these things from the Unseen. No one can do without that which has come from the messengers in understanding the Unseen. The speech of the Messenger is clear in and of itself. There is no unveiling to anyone nor is any analogy of it equal to it. An “unveiling” or “analogy” of someone is sanctioned only when it is consistent with [the speech of the Messenger]; otherwise it contradicts it. However what is called an “unveiling” (kashf) or an analogy (qiyās) does contradict the Messenger and is therefore a false analogy and false imagination (khayāl). This is what was meant when it was said, “I seek refuge in God from philosophical analogy and Şūfī imagination.”²¹

Ibn Taymiyya affirms a limited role for inspiration in areas where there are inadequate sharʿī indications. In his Sharḥ kalimāt li-ʿAbd al-Qādir, he writes

If the sālik [the person seeking knowledge] has creatively employed his efforts to the external sharʿī indications and sees no clear probability concerning the preferable action, he may feel inspired – along with his goodness of intention and reverent fear of God – to choose one of two actions as superior (to the other). This kind of inspiration is an indication concerning the truth. It may be even a stronger indication than weak analogies, weak ḥadīths, weak literal arguments (ẓawāhir) and weak istiṣḥābs which are employed by many of those who delve into the principles, differences, and systematizing of fiqh.²²

Ibn Taymiyya’s acceptance of a limited place for inspiration, however, does not extend to what Şūfis call the knowledge of states (aḥwāl). A basic error of the Şūfis, according to both Ibn al-Jawzī and Ibn Taymiyya, is their acceptance of the state they call ecstasy (wajd). We have already seen how the Şūfis found a model for Qur’ānic recitation in Ja’far al-Şādiq, who is said to have repeated a verse continually in prayer until he heard it from the Speaker Himself and fainted. Ibn al-Jawzī does not refer to this particular story in his Talbīs Ilbīs, but he states that there are many examples in books on asceticism of men fainting, crying, and even dying upon hearing the Qur’ān recited.²³ Although acknowledging that there may have been some sincere believers amongst them, he nonetheless rejects what he sees as a loss of control without precedence among the Companions of the Prophet. According to Ibn al-Jawzī, the Companions had the purest of hearts but their strong emotion (wajd) did not go beyond weeping and humility (khushūʿ).²⁴

Ibn Taymiyya also makes it clear that those who faint or even die upon hearing a recitation of the Qur’ān are not to be emulated. In his Al-Şūfiyya wa’l-fuqarāʾ he describes three ranks of those who listen to or recite the Qur’ān, knowingly or unknowingly contesting the levels found in the Şūfī versions:

Instead, there are three ranks [to those hearing the Qur’ān]. One of them is the state of those unjust to themselves, those who are hard-hearted, not yielding to the audition [of the Qurʾān] nor to the remembrance [of God], and they are comparable to the Jews...

The [second rank] is the state of the pious believer who is too weak to bear what suddenly afflicts his heart. So he is the one who is struck down, death-struck or swooning, and that is due only to the power of the sudden seizure (al-wārid) and the weakness of the heart to bear it...

But those who retain their reason, in spite of the fact that they acquired from faith that which others acquired, or similar to it or more perfect, they [the former] are more excellent than they [the latter] are. This is the state of the Companions – may God be satisfied with them – and the state of our Prophet – God bless him and give him peace. For he was made to travel by night into the heaven, and God revealed to him what He revealed. Yet, he awoke as he had spent the night; his state did not change. Thus, his state is more excellent than that of Moses – God bless him and give him peace – who fell swooning (Q. 7:143) when his Lord manifested Himself to the mountain. Moses' state is a splendid, exalted, and excellent state, but the state of Muḥammad – God bless him and give him peace – is more splendid, exalted, and excellent.²⁵

Ibn Taymiyya's views on the subject of losing consciousness are more complex than Ibn al-Jawzī's. Whereas Ibn al-Jawzī leans towards a complete condemnation of losing consciousness, Ibn Taymiyya carefully and clearly distinguishes the insincere who seek unconsciousness, even through alcohol and drugs, from the sincere who succumb because they have not yet realized the more perfect state of sobriety. It is a discussion similar to that found in many Ṣūfī texts.²⁶ Ibn al-Jawzī, however, rejects the entire notion of knowledge by means of states and stations, calling al-Qushayrī's description of them a worthless and confused mess (al-takhlīṭ alladhī laysa bi-shayʿ).

ʿAbd al-Karīm b. Hawāzin al-Qushayrī wrote a book, Al-Risāla, for [the Ṣūfis] in which he makes extraordinary remarks on annihilation (fanāʾ) and subsistence (baqāʾ), contraction (qabḍ) and expansion (bast), the moment (waqt) and the state (ḥāl), ecstasy (wajḍ) and existence/finding (wujūd), gathering (jamʿ) and separation (tafriqa), sobriety (ṣaḥw) and intoxication (sukr), tasting (dhawq) and drinking (shurb), obliteration (maḥw) and affirmation (ithbāt), self-disclosure (tajallī), presence of the heart before God's signs (muḥādara) and unveiling (mukāshafa), flashes (lawāʾih), rising stars (ṭawālīʿ) and glimmers (lawāmiʿ), originating (takwīn) and consolidating (tamkīn), the religious law (sharʿa) and the truths (ḥaqāʾiq) and so on – all that from a delirium without any basis, and his tafsīr is even more incredible.²⁷

For both Ibn al-Jawzī and Ibn Taymiyya, valid Qurʾānic exegesis will not deviate in any way from the interpretations of the early Companions and Followers of the Prophet. Ibn al-Jawzī specifically criticizes many of the books we have been mentioned so far and will be discussing in Part II. He mentions Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj's Kitāb al-luma', wherein are mentioned "repugnant beliefs" and "despicable statements." Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī's Qūt al-qulūb contains "false aḥādīth" and "corrupt beliefs." 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Sulamī's Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr contains astonishing examples of Şūfī exegesis "which occur to them without the support of any of the fundamentals of knowledge." Al-Ghazālī's Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn is full of false traditions which al-Ghazālī does not know are false.²⁸

According to Ibn al-Jawzī, the problems in Şūfī interpretation occur as a result of linguistic error or distortion, deviation from the transmitted tafsīr tradition, abandonment of the obvious and clear meaning of a verse, and incorrect belief. He gives examples of these errors, taken primarily from al-Sulamī's Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr, and then ends with these dismissive words:

The entire book is like this. I had intended to show quite a bit of it here but I see that time will be wasted in recording something which borders between infidelity (kufr), error (khaṭa) and drivel (hadhayān). It is like what we have related from the bāṭiniyya. These are examples for anyone who wants to know what the book is like; if anyone wants to know more, let him look at this book.²⁹

Ibn Taymiyya on sound interpretation of the Qur'ān

Ibn Taymiyya's *Muqaddima fī uṣūl al-tafsīr*³⁰ can be seen as a point-by-point rebuttal of al-Ghazālī's arguments for not confining Qur'ānic commentary to the transmitted tradition. Al-Ghazālī, as we have seen, asserted that the Prophet explained only part of the Qur'ān, and that most of the transmitted exegetical tradition comes from the Companions of the Prophet and represents their own opinions, not what they heard from the Prophet himself. According to al-Ghazālī, this material is contradictory and should not be considered as authoritative as the revealed text. Instead, al-Ghazālī views the interpretative tradition from the first generations of Muslims (salaf) as a model for the independent exercise of judgment (ijtihād), not as conclusive proof (ḥujja) that demands acceptance.³¹

Ibn Taymiyya's approach, on the other hand, is to create a hierarchy of sources that are to be consulted in descending order until the explanation of a Qur'ānic verse is clear: the Qur'ān, the Sunnah of the Prophet, the statements of the Companions of the Prophet (ṣaḥāba), and the statements of the Followers of the Companions of the Prophet (tābi'ūn).³² Ibn Taymiyya supports his methodology and rebuts the points made by al-Ghazālī by making two assertions. The first is that the Prophet completely explained the meaning of the entire Qur'ān to his Companions.³³ The second is that the Companions and the Followers have greater authority in interpreting the Qur'ān than any generation of Muslims after them, to the point where their consensus is conclusive proof (ḥujja).³⁴ Ibn Taymiyya differs from other Sunnī Muslim commentators, not so much in his degree of reverence for the Prophet and the pious predecessors (salaf), but in his confidence in the comprehensiveness, accuracy, and unity of the material transmitted from them.³⁵ He does not accept the assertion that the Companions or the Prophet and the early exegetes disagreed over interpretation of Qur'ānic verses. Instead, he gives examples proving that their differences amount to variation rather than contradiction.

According to Ibn Taymiyya, errors in interpretation are the result of error in one of two areas. He states that knowledge is either the result of authentic transmission (naql muṣaddaq) or verifiable deduction (istidlāl muḥaqqaq) and that, therefore, commentators make errors either through their imperfect knowledge of aḥādīth or by faulty thinking. Mostly these errors are the result of either preconceived ideas that are read into the Qur'an, or attention paid only to the words and not to the context of the revelation. Like al-Ghazālī, Ibn Taymiyya divides those who make these errors into those who know full well that they are distorting the message of the Qur'an and those whose intention is good. According to Ibn Taymiyya, the second type includes many Ṣūfis, preachers, jurists, and others who have the correct meanings but the wrong Qur'ānic verses to support those meanings. Ibn Taymiyya tells us that this is the case for much of what the Ṣūfī Abū 'Abd al-Raḥman al-Sulamī (d. 1021) includes in his commentary, Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr.³⁶ Ibn Taymiyya is not opposed to Ṣūfī exegesis per se, but rather considers it as falling into the category of tafsīr bīl-ra'y if it does not agree with the interpretations of the earliest exegetes.

Al-Ghazālī's defense of ta'wīl

The fact that al-Ghazālī was criticized well before Ibn Taymiyya for defending Qur'ānic exegesis that goes beyond the transmitted interpretative tradition can be seen in his work Fayṣal al-tafriqa.³⁷ It is a book that calls for careful discrimination in evaluating the beliefs of other Muslims before charging them with disbelief (taḳfīr). It was apparently written to console an unnamed colleague upset by attacks on al-Ghazālī himself. Al-Ghazālī states that the problem of excessive taḳfīr stems from a lack of differentiation between those who deny the message of the Prophet and those who have different interpretations of that message. Al-Ghazālī agrees that those who deny the message of the Prophet are guilty of disbelief (kufīr), a legal category in Islamic societies with serious consequences. But those who accept that message, differing only in their interpretations of it, are guilty only of innovation (bida') or error (khaṭa') if they are wrong in their interpretations, both lesser charges than disbelief.

Al-Ghazālī begins his argument with the statement that interpretation is essential for those verses of the Qur'an and aḥādīth whose meaning, if taken literally, would be absurd. According to him, this interpretation is incumbent on every Muslim, however literal-minded, if they are not to prove themselves completely stupid and ignorant.³⁸ However, since al-Ghazālī agrees that some interpretations do constitute disbelief, he provides a system for evaluating interpretative activity.

The system is based on a conception of existence (wujūd) as comprised of five degrees (marātib), each of which has a different relationship to interpretation.³⁹ The first degree is essential (dhatī) or absolutely real existence (al-wujūd al-muṭlaq al-ḥaqīqī), which is made up of the heavens and the earth, the animals and the plants that exist whether or not we perceive them. Al-Ghazālī asserts that there is no need for interpretation (ta'wīl) of this degree of existence because it entails what is manifest (al-zāhir). Significantly, al-Ghazālī includes in this category the Throne, the Footstool and the Seven Heavens mentioned in the Qur'ān and the Traditions of the Prophet, elements of the Unseen world which he insists are solid, real things, and therefore not subject to interpretation.

The second degree of existence is sensible (ḥissī), that which we see but which has no existence outside of our perceptions. Included in it are the dreams and hallucinations of ordinary people and the visions of prophets and saints. An example of a ḥadīth which corresponds to this level of existence is the one in which the Prophet says, "The Garden was shown to me in the breadth of this wall." The person who has proof (burhān) that physical bodies do not intermingle and that the small cannot contain the large, knows that this means that the likeness of the Garden appeared (tamaththala) to the senses (al-ḥiss), so that it was as if the Prophet was witnessing it.

The third degree of existence is the imaginary (khayālī), referring to things that we create in our imaginations that are absent from our senses, for example, the likeness of an elephant that exists in our brain but not outside of it. The ḥadīth used to illustrate this degree of existence is one which begins with the Prophet saying, "It was as if I were looking at Yūnus (Jonah)..." Al-Ghazālī interprets this to mean that the Prophet was not really seeing (lam yakūn ḥaqīqa'l-nazar), but it was like seeing (ka'l-nazar). However, he seems unsure of his own example, saying that it would not be farfetched to say he was really seeing it, as described in the sensible degree of existence.

The fourth degree of existence is mental ('aqlī) existence, based on the difference between a thing's meaning (ma'nā) and its form (ṣūra). The hand is the form (ṣūra) for the meaning (ma'nā) "the ability to strike." When the Qur'ān or ḥadīth speak of God's hand, the person who has proof (burhān) of the absurdity of God's having a sensible or imaginable hand attests to God's having the power to strike, give, and withhold, which is the meaning or reality of "hand."

The fifth degree of existence is analogical (shabahī) and refers to something which does not exist in any of the prior degrees of existence, and can only be understood by its resemblance (ishbāh or munāsaba) to the attributes or qualities of something else. The examples al-Ghazālī gives are the qualities such as anger, longing, joy, and patience, when they are attributed to God. The person who has proof (burhān) knows that God cannot possess qualities that imply imperfection, so he understands anger, for example, as the will to punish.

It is the last two degrees of existence that produce the most radical interpretations through the use of metaphor (majāz) and figurative speech (isti'āra). Al-Ghazālī insists that this kind of metaphorical interpretation is unavoidable, supporting his claim by stating that even Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, the man most opposed to this form of interpretation, found himself unable to avoid it completely.⁴⁰ Having established the necessity of metaphorical interpretation, al-Ghazālī sets forth a rule of interpretation (qanūn al-ta'wīl) so as to define the parameters of its permissibility. In any given text of the Qur'ān or ḥadīth, the interpreter must accept the literal sense (zāhir) based on its essential existence (al-wujūd al-dhātī) unless he has proof (burhān) of its absurdity. If it is absurd, he looks to the next degree of existence for its meaning, unless this too is absurd. The metaphorical interpretation required by the mental and analogical degrees will only be permissible if the interpreter has proof of the absurdity of interpretation based on all the other levels.

Al-Ghazālī concludes that disagreements over interpretation are based on the matter of proof, with the Ḥanbalī declaring there is nothing inconceivable about God's being described by the direction "above," and the Ash'arī declaring there is nothing inconceivable about the ocular vision of God. To avoid internal strife in the Muslim community, al-Ghazālī has two different recommendations, one for the common man untroubled by doubts in his faith, and one for intellectuals whose faith needs more proof. For the common man, he recommends the unquestioning acceptance of the literal meanings of the Qur'ān, ḥadīth, and the interpretations of the Companions of the Prophet. Speculative thinkers whose beliefs are more troubled may cautiously use this method of going beyond the literal sense in order to strengthen their faith. They should not, however, charge others with disbelief, unless there is denial of one of the roots of the faith (belief in God, in His Messenger, and in the Last Day), or one of its branches when based on the soundest Traditions.⁴¹

One of the examples al-Ghazālī gives to illustrate those who deny the fundamental tenets of Islam, and therefore deny the message as a whole, are the philosophers who deny God's knowledge of particulars or the physical reality of the Garden and the Fire in the Afterlife. He charges them with having abandoned the literal meaning of the Qur'ān and the soundest ḥadīth on these matters without any valid proof of the inconceivability of these concepts. What is particularly damning to them is their belief that the physical Afterlife is merely a fiction devised for those unable to grasp the intellectual Afterlife. This belief implies that the Prophet engaged in a kind of lie, however well meaning. This, according to al-Ghazālī, is what places them at the first degree of atheism (zandaqa).⁴²

As for those who interpret matters that do not pertain to Islam's most basic beliefs, al-Ghazālī advises against accusations of disbelief, although one may still make accusations of innovation and error. Al-Ghazālī uses a Ṣūfī interpretation as an example. He states that a certain Ṣūfī found it inconceivable that the Prophet Ibrāhīm (Abraham) could have believed that a star, the moon, or the sun could be God (Qur'ān 6:76–9). Instead, al-Ghazālī explains, the Ṣūfī took this as an indication that the celestial bodies mentioned represent something non-physical, which he then understood to mean the angelic luminous substances (jawāhir malakiyya nūrāniyya). Al-Ghazālī is critical, saying that this rejection of the literal sense is not based on proofs (barāhīn) but on conjectural indications (dalālāt ḡanniyya). Nonetheless, he insists that the Şūfî should not be charged with disbelief as this matter is not one of the fundamental beliefs of Islam.⁴³ The interpretation referred to here is, in fact, al-Ghazālî's own, or at least one he quotes at length in other works. Versions of it can be found in both his *Ihyā' 'ulūm al-dīn*⁴⁴ and Mishkāt al-anwār.⁴⁵

Al-Ghazālî does not even identify himself as a Şūfî here, but rather says, "This is their kind of interpretation." He then refers to two other Şūfî interpretations, one of which is also discussed in his Mishkāt al-anwār.⁴⁶

They have interpreted (ta'awwalū) "the staff" and "the shoes" in God's words, "Take off your shoes" (20:12) and "Throw down what is in your right hand" (20:69). Perhaps conjecture (ḡann) in matters such as these that do not relate to the fundamentals of belief is analogous to proof (burhān) regarding the fundamentals, so there should be no accusations of disbelief or innovation. To be sure, if the opening of this door were to lead to confusing the hearts of the common people, then the author should be particularly charged with innovation in everything whose mention has not been related on the authority of the first generations (salaf).⁴⁷

Al-Ghazālî advocates tolerance for this kind of Şūfî interpretation so long as it does not confuse people and so long as the Şūfî does not claim to be released from the obligations of religious law. Al-Ghazālî recommends that such a Şūfî be killed because, even if he were still a believer, his actions would open a door to licentiousness (ibāḥa) that cannot be closed, thereby causing great harm to religion.⁴⁸

Problems with al-Ghazālî's defense of ta'wīl

Al-Ghazālî's uses the word ta'wīl in his Fayṣal al-tafriqa to refer to the interpretation of verses in the Qur'ān whose literal meaning can be definitively shown to be absurd. Ta'wīl used in this way is a concept that can be traced back to the theologian al-Ash'arî who strove to find a defensible exegetical stance between pure literalism and the type of metaphorical interpretation practiced by the Mu'tazila.⁴⁹ Ḥanbalî scholars felt that God should be described only as He described Himself, or as the Prophet described Him. They therefore felt that the anthropomorphic verses of the Qur'ān should not be interpreted as the Mu'tazila interpreted them, but rather should be understood bi-lā kayfa, without asking "how" or "why". The classic definition of the bi-lā kayfa doctrine goes back to a tradition from Mālik b. Anas,⁵⁰ quoted here from Tahrīm al-naẓar fī kutub ahl al-kalām (Censure of Speculative Theology), written by the Ḥanbalî scholar Muwaffaq al-Dīn ibn Qudāma (d. 1146):

Has he not heard the story of Mālik b. Anas when he was asked with regard to the Koranic verse, "The Merciful on the throne sits firm,"⁵¹

“how ‘sits firm’?”? Mālik inclined his head and was silent until the sweat of fever covered his brow; then he looked up and said: “The attribute *istawā*⁵² is unknown, the modality of it is not rational; but belief in it is obligatory, and inquiring about it is a heretical innovation.”⁵³

Al-Ash‘arī also relied on the bi-lā kayfa doctrine, but opened the door to some degree of interpretation if there was any proof (hujja) that the literal sense should be abandoned. The way that the later Ash‘arite theologian Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī understood this was to divide the verses of the Qur‘ān into three parts. The first are the clear verses (muḥkamāt) whose apparent sense (ẓāhir) can be confirmed by rational indicators (al-dalā’il al-‘aqliyya). The second type of verses are those whose apparent sense (ẓāhir) has been shown to be impossible by definitive indicators (al-dalā’il al-qāṭi‘a). The third type of verses are ambiguous in meaning (mutashābih) and indicators like these cannot be found to either affirm or deny [one meaning or another].⁵⁴ The sound exegete, according to al-Rāzī, will know how to discover the truth concerning the first two types of verses, and will know to entrust the meaning of the third type to God.

When al-Ghazālī brings up examples of Ṣūfī interpretation in his Fayṣal al-tafrīqa, he expands the definition of verses open to ta’wīl beyond the anthropomorphic verses that are usually the subject matter of this debate, verses whose literal meaning was generally accepted by Muslims as being absurd. In discussing the story of the Prophet Ibrāhīm and the celestial bodies, al-Ghazālī acknowledges that the rejection of the literal sense of this story is not based on proofs (barāhīn) but on conjectural indications (dalālāt ẓanniya). What al-Ghazālī is most likely referring to here are theological arguments objecting to the idea that the Prophet Ibrāhīm could have mistaken the celestial bodies for God. However, when al-Ghazālī proceeds from his comments on the story of Ibrāhīm to Ṣūfī interpretations of Mūsā’s “staff” and “the two shoes,” he is now addressing another kind of verse altogether, verses whose literal sense is not at all in question. Clearly, Mūsā’s staff and shoes can be accepted as existing literally and therefore do not have to be interpreted metaphorically. Al-Ghazālī, however, seems unaware that he has violated his own hermeneutic principle. The weakness of al-Ghazālī’s defense of Ṣūfī interpretation in his Fayṣal al-tafrīqa is that his argument only works for the interpretation of Qur’ānic verses whose literal meaning is problematic, verses that constitute only a small portion of Ṣūfī exegesis.

Al-Ghazālī’s final defense of Ṣūfī interpretation

Whether al-Ghazālī recognized the problem with his argument, his later writings address it nonetheless in two ways.⁵⁵ The first concerns defining who is qualified to interpret the ambiguous verses of the Qur‘ān. In his Fayṣal al-tafrīqa, al-Ghazālī had recommended that the common people (‘awāmm) accept the ambiguous parts of the Qur‘ān, such as the anthropomorphic verses, without interpretation. The rule of interpretation he suggests in this book is only for those people whose faith has become troubled. However, by the end of his life, as we have already seen, al-Ghazālī had expanded the definition of the common people in his Iljām al-'awāmm to include Qur'ānic exegetes, jurists, ḥadīth scholars and theologians, all of whom he believed should not go beyond the literal sense of Qur'ānic verses. Instead of confining ta'wīl to those whose faith has become troubled, al-Ghazālī now confined the right to interpret ambiguous verses to “those firmly rooted in knowledge” (al-rāsikhūn fī'l-'ilm), defined by al-Ghazālī as individuals of high spiritual attainment. Al-Ghazālī shifts from using rational criteria for defining acceptable ta'wīl to criteria based on the interpreter's spiritual practice and divine grace.⁵⁶

The second area in which a change can be seen in al-Ghazālī's exegetical thinking is in how he distinguishes Şūfī interpretations from bāṭinī interpretations. In his early writing on the subject in the Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn, al-Ghazālī, he mentions the allegorization of the Qur'ānic figure Pharoah as an example of blameworthy interpretation in his discussion of tafsīr bi'l-ra'y:

This is like one who calls for struggle with the hard heart and says, God says, “Go to Pharoah. Truly, he has transgressed.” (20:24), and he points to his own heart and indicates that that is what was intended by Pharoah. This is what some preachers do with sound intentions of beautifying their talk and attracting the listener, but it is prohibited. The bāṭiniyya have utilized this with corrupt intentions to deceive people and invite them to their false school of thought.⁵⁷

The problem here is that equating Pharoah with the hard heart is exactly the kind of symbolic or allegorical commentary that Şūfīs do.⁵⁸ If one follows the rule of interpretation which al-Ghazālī proposes in his Fayṣal al-tafrīqā, any interpretation that goes beyond the literal sense of a Qur'ānic verse is unacceptable unless the literal sense can be shown to be absurd. Al-Ghazālī revises his defense of Şūfī interpretations in the Mishkāt al-anwār,⁵⁹ now relying upon the Ibn Ma'sūd ḥadīth to insist that all the different levels of meaning in the Qur'ān must be accepted as valid. Unacceptable interpretation would be like saying that Mūsā did not have any shoes, or that he did not hear the words, “Take off your shoes.” Equally unacceptable is the denial of other levels of meaning.

God forbid! Surely the annulment of the literal meanings (ẓawāhir) is the view of the bāṭiniyya who have looked one-eyed towards one of the worlds, not knowing the parallelism (muwāzana) between the two worlds, nor understanding this aspect. Likewise, the annulment of secrets (asrār) is the teaching of the ḥashawīyya.⁶⁰ Whoever looks only to the external sense (ẓāhir) is a ḥashawī, and whoever looks only to the inner sense (bāṭin) is a bāṭinī, and whoever joins the two is perfect (kāmil). Because of that [the Prophet] said, “The Qur'ān has an exoteric sense (ẓāhir) and an inner sense (bāṭin), a limit (ḥadd) and a point of ascent (muṭṭalaʿ). It may be that this is transmitted from ʿAlī and stops with him (mawqūf ʿalayhi).⁶¹

Rather, I say that Mūsā understood from the command to take off his shoes the removal of the two engendered worlds, so he followed (imtathala)⁶² the command externally by taking off his shoes and inwardly by the removal of both worlds. This is “taking heed” (iʿtibār), i.e., the crossing over (ʿubūr) from one thing to another, from the external sense (ẓāhir) to the secret (sirr).⁶³

Although it is questionable whether the Ismāʿīlīs would have denied the reality of Mūsā’s shoes, al-Ghazālī argument here is, nonetheless, his most effective defense of Ṣūfī interpretation. In adopting it, however, he abandons the condition contained within the Ashʿarī defense which allows for taʾwīl only when the apparent sense of a verse can be shown to be absurd.

The success of al-Ghazālī’s argument can be seen in the fact that al-Simnānī adopts it, with a few modifications, in the introduction to his tafsīr:

Know with certainty that anyone who rejects commentary on the exoteric sense (ẓāhir) of the Qurʾān regarding the human world of horizons (al-ʿālam al-āfāq al-nāsūtī) is a stubborn bāṭinī apostate. Anyone who rejects commentary on the inner sense (batn) of the Qurʾān regarding the kingly world of souls (al-ʿālam al-anfus al-malakūtī) after having affirmed its external sense is a stupid and anthropomorphic idiot. But the one who combines the external and the inner sense is a happy Sunnī muslim. The one who knows the limit (ḥadd) of the Qurʾān in the World of Dominion (ʿālam al-jabarūt) is a rightly guided gnostic believer (muʾmin). The one who ascends to the lookout point (muṭṭalaʿ) of the Qurʾān in the World of Divinity (ʿālam al-lāhūt) is a perfectly virtuous man (muḥsin kāmil), witness for communities, looking out (muṭṭaliʿ) over unseen things, praiseworthy and noble.⁶⁴

Al-Simnānī adds an interesting interpretation of the ḥadīth on tafsīr biʿl raʾy, suggesting that the definition of unacceptable interpretation changes according to the level of meaning of the Qurʾān.

The one who interprets the external sense (ẓāhir) of the Qurʾān by his own opinion (raʾy), without hearing from a commentator whose authority derives from the Companions, has become a disbeliever because of his ignorance of most of its precepts (aḥkām), causes of revelation (asbāb al-nuzūl), and parables (amthāl).

The one who interprets the inner sense of the Qurʾān by his own opinion (raʾy), without secret, spiritual, hidden or real inspiration (ilhām sirrī aw rūḥī aw khafī aw ḥaqqī), has become a disbeliever in all the allusions (ishārāt) coming from the presence of Lordship through the particulars of the powers (al-daqqā'iq al-quwā) and the kingly subtleties (al-laṭā'if al-malakūtiyya).

The one who interprets the limit (ḥadd) of the Qur'an by his own opinion (ra'y), without the permission emanating from the Ka'ba of Divinity, has become a disbeliever in the gnosis of the tenuousness of the qualities pertaining to the Dominion (ma'ārif raqqā'iq al-ṣifāt al-jabarūtiyya).

The one who interprets the lookout point of the Qur'an by his own opinion (ra'y), before His permission to enter into the exalted presence and before obtaining great purity and comprehension of the core of the real subtle substance (al-laṭīfa al-ḥaqqiyya) which nurtures the subtle "I" substance (al-laṭīfa al-anā'iyya), has become a disbeliever in the realities of the Qur'an.⁶⁵

Al-Simnānī's definitions of the different types of prohibited tafsīr bi'l ra'y can be compared to the restrictions which al-Ghazālī applies as to who may interpret the Qur'an in non-literal ways. Determining the legitimacy of interpretations that go beyond the literal sense of the Qur'anic text becomes far more difficult here because there are no external formulas to follow. There is a possibility of error at every level, and al-Simnānī therefore makes suggestions on how to combat them. Just as a healthy and sound ear is a requirement for hearing the external sense of the Qur'an and learning its exoteric commentary, a healthy and sound "ear" of the heart is a requirement for hearing the inner sense of the Qur'an and learning its esoteric commentary. Each higher level of comprehension requires a correspondingly healthy and sound "ear." Just as there are remedies for ailments of the physical ear, there are remedies for these inner ailments, consisting of the abandonment of attachments and various forms of remembrance (dhikr), for which al-Simnānī suggests several examples.⁶⁶

The defense of Şūfī exegesis that al-Ghazālī ends up with is the one that most Şūfīs seem to have quietly adopted. As detailed in the ḥadīth transmitted from Ibn Mas'ūd, the Qur'an has many levels of meaning, and therefore it would be wrong to limit its meaning to only those meanings transmitted in the interpretative tradition. The literal or exoteric aspect of its message must be accepted wholeheartedly along with these other levels of meaning. The interpretations of other levels of meaning correspond to the different states experienced by individual Şūfīs, and are the result of their spiritual practices and divine grace. Their validity cannot be verified by external means, and communicating them will not necessarily be of larger benefit to the community of Muslims.

Part II

COMMENTARY

ŞÜFÎ COMMENTATORS ON THE QUR'ĀN

In a religion as firmly based on a book as Islam, almost any writing which emerges can conceivably be classified as commentary on the Qur'ān, leaving us with the difficult task of deciding which works should be included in the genre of exegesis. The task of identifying the formal characteristics of tafsīr has been tackled with great skill by Calder.¹ He suggests that, first and foremost, a work of tafsīr must follow a “canon and segmentation, lemma and comment” format that sequentially addresses the complete, or nearly complete, text of the Qur'ān.”² Second, the tafsīr must allow for polyvalent readings through the citation of named authorities, a polyvalence that may, however, be limited by the selection of material included and the statement of preferred interpretations. Last, a tafsīr must measure the Qur'ānic text by use of outside disciplines, both linguistic (instrumental) and theological (ideological).³ Given these defined characteristics, Calder does not include Şūfī works within the genre of tafsīr, although he accepts the use of Şūfī ideas as an ideological structure against which to measure the Qur'ān.⁴

As we have already seen, the Şūfīs themselves often reserved the term “tafsīr” for the types of commentaries following the characteristics that Calder describes, and used different terms like “allusion” (ishāra) and “interpretation” (ta'wīl), or more rarely, “understanding” (fahm), or “striking similitudes” (ḍarb al-mithāl), for their commentaries. What holds these writings together as a genre, however, is the fact that they follow the lemma and comment format of tafsīr, and address the Qur'ān in a sequential, even if in a more selective manner.⁵ Works such as Jalāluddīn Rūmī's Mathnawī and Ibn 'Arabī's Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam are examples of Şūfī works that present a large amount of Şūfī interpretations of the Qur'ān, but are not generally considered as part of the commentary genre because they do not follow this format.

Şūfī commentaries on the Qur'ān differ from the tafsīr genre described by Calder in another way, in the area of style. These works have been described as “allegorical”⁶ and “symbolic,”⁷ but these are terms that do not adequately convey their varied forms of discourse. As part of their interpretation of Qur'ānic verses, Şūfīs displayed literary characteristics that are not often found in work of tafsīr, creating their own metaphors, wordplay, narratives, and poetry as an integral part of their exegesis, and it is this use of language and style as much as specific Šūfī doctrines and beliefs that gives Šūfī commentary its distinctive character.

The commentaries chosen here to represent Šūfī exegesis consist of a variety of influential works, but it should be noted that many important Šūfī commentaries remain in manuscript form. Because the exegetical works included in this study will be excerpted as part of an analysis of selected Qur'ānic passages, the unique style of each of the commentaries may not be obvious. What follows, then, is a chronological introduction to each of the commentators, with biographical notes, and comments on the style and method of each.

Al-Tustarī

Abū Muḥammad Sahl b. 'Abd Allāh al-Tustarī was born in the Persian province of Khūzistān and died in Basra in 896.⁸ He became involved with Šūfism early in life under the influence of his uncle, a ḥadīth scholar and disciple of the Šūfī Ma'rūf al-Kharkhī (d. 815). His teachings are preserved in writings that reflect his own hand as well as the disciples who took oral instruction from him.

Al-Tustarī's tafsīr is the oldest continuous Šūfī commentary on the Qur'ān. Exegesis attributed to other early Šūfī figures exists in the compilation of al-Sulamī (d. 937 or 942), Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr, but al-Tustarī's commentary is the earliest work to survive independently. Although there is yet no critical edition of the commentary, which comprises a small volume, Böwering has made a thorough study of it on the basis of six extant manuscripts.⁹ He describes it as a disjointed work, which "resembles a collection of jottings, noted down in loose sequence and linked to each other without any apparent principle of logical order."¹⁰ These jottings appear to come from three different sources: al-Tustarī's exoteric and esoteric interpretations of Qur'ānic verses, his aphorisms and stories taken from other works no longer extant, and additions and glosses inserted into the text, either by disciples of al-Tustarī or later Šūfīs.¹¹

Given the nature of the compilation of this work, its rather eclectic content is not surprising. According to Böwering,

There are literal and metaphorical interpretations of the Qur'ānic phrases: illustrations from the Prophet's normative and customary behavior; examples from the legends of the prophets of old; traces of mystical views shared by earlier Šūfīs and anecdotes concerning their practical conduct; fragments of Tustarī's mystical themes, his religious thought, and ascetic practice; exhortations and guidelines for disciples and answers to their questions; and finally, episodes about Tustarī's life, glosses and explanatory insertions into the text.¹²

Al-Tustarī's tafsīr hints at the possibilities but leaves to others the task of a more conscious and comprehensive presentation of Šūfī exegesis.

Al-Sulamî

Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn al-Sulamî was born in the city of Nisābūr (Nishapur in Persian).¹³ Although he traveled extensively to study ḥadīth and perform the pilgrimage, most of his life was spent in his home city, where he died in 1021. Like the grandfather who educated him and the Şūfî teacher who initiated him, al-Sulamî was a Shāfi'î scholar of ḥadīth. He was a prolific writer, with more than 100 books to his name, about 30 of which are extant. His Ṭabaqāt al-Sūfiyya, the oldest extant Şūfî hagiographical collection, and his two compilations of Şūfî exegesis, the Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr and the Ziyādāt ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr are invaluable because they preserve oral teachings and written works from Şūfis of the eighth to tenth centuries.

The Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr comprises two volumes in a recently published edition.¹⁴ Portions of the work were previously published by Massignon and Nywia.¹⁵ The Ziyādāt ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr is an appendix to the Ḥaqā'iq recently discovered and published by Bowering in one volume.¹⁶ According to Bowering, al-Sulamî gathered the material for his commentaries from both written and oral sources. The only written sources which al-Sulamî mentions explicitly are those attributed to Abū'l-'Abbās Aḥmad al-Adamî, known as Ibn 'Aṭā' (d. 921) and Ja'far al-Şādiq (d. 765).¹⁷ The most frequently cited authorities in the Ḥaqā'iq are Ibn 'Aṭā', Abū Bakr al-Wāsiṭī, known as Ibn al-Farghānī (d. 932), Sahl al-Tustarī, Abū Sa'īd al-Kharrāz (d. 899), al-Junayd (d. 910) and Abū Bakr al-Shiblī.¹⁸ In the Ziyādāt, the most frequently cited authorities are Sahl al-Tustarī, Ja'far al-Şādiq, and Ibn 'Aṭā'.¹⁹ Both books include anonymous quotations as well.

In the introduction to his tafsīr, al-Sulamî states that he included two types of quotations in his compilation. The first he calls āyāt, by which he means interpretations of specific verses, and the second he calls aqwāl, which are Şūfî sayings related to key Qur'ānic terms. Noting the wealth of commentaries based upon the exoteric sciences and the relative lack of the same for Şūfî exegesis, al-Sulamî writes that he has deliberately confined himself to the latter. Bowering remarks that, in preserving the earliest Şūfis' exegetical comments, al-Sulamî performed a function similar to that of al-Tabarī in his Jāmi' al-bayān, and in doing so established Şūfî commentary by allusion (ishāra) as a distinct genre within the tafsīr tradition.²⁰

The style of al-Sulamî's commentaries reflects their structure as a compilation. Because there is no unifying voice behind the many citations that follow one another, linked only by the verse being interpreted, themes remain underdeveloped and terms unexplained. Without a larger context, many of these comments are somewhat cryptic. The focus is on key Qur'ānic words, rather than on larger segments of the verse and its context. Bowering understands the interpretations as encounters between key Qur'ānic words and mystical experience.

These allusions are the result of the merger between Qur'ānic keynotes and the matrix of the Şūfî world of ideas. The keynotes, Qur'ānic words or phrases striking the Ṣūfī's mind, may be taken up in total isolation from the actual context or, less frequently, presuppose familiarity with a wider frame of Qur'ānic reference. It is significant to realize that these keynotes are not studied as a text, but aurally perceived by men experienced in listening attentively to Qur'ān recital and intent on hearing God, the actual speaker of the Qur'ānic word. Listening to the Qur'ānic word, the Ṣūfī is captured by a keynote, a fleeting touch of meaning communicated to him by the divine speaker. This keynote signals to the Ṣūfī the breakthrough to God, revealing himself in His divine speech and opening a way to Himself through and beyond His divine word.

With these keynotes the listener associates a cluster of images emerging from the content of his personal experience. These images merge with the Qur'ānic keynotes and find their expression in the allusions that are jotted down in the commentary in a condensed, abbreviated form. These jottings thus reflect the gist of the listener's encounter with the divine word merging inextricably with the matrix of the Ṣūfī world of ideas. In this process the allusions achieve a synthesis that makes it impossible to discern where "exegesis" ends and "eisegesis" begins, and where the discovery of man's own existence disappears in the revelation of the divine word.²¹

This interaction between the Qur'ānic text and Ṣūfī experience in Ṣūfī commentary was first noted by Nwyia. One of the most distinctive examples of this is found in what Nwyia calls the "intérieurisation des figures prophétiques." He writes,

In their meditation on the Qur'ān, the figures of the prophets become prototypes of mystic experience or figures of religious consciousness. That which they read in the stories of the ancients (akhbār al-awwālin) are not "histories" but a lesson (ibrā), a doctrine on the relationships between God and man. In this way Abraham becomes the figure of suffering but faithful consciousness or the prototype of friendship with God, Moses, the figure of spiritual experience as dialogue with God, etc.²²

While many of these comments can be obscure because of their use of esoteric symbolism or technical Ṣūfī terminology that is left unexplained, other comments cited in the Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr could be characterized as homiletic, especially when compared to the reticence in this area of other types of commentaries that confine themselves to the interpretative tradition.

The Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr was recognized almost immediately as representing a very different approach to understanding the Qur'ān, an approach deemed unacceptable by some. Al-Sulamī's near contemporary, the Qur'ānic scholar al-Wāḥidī (d. 1076), said, "If al-Sulamī thinks that this is a tafsīr, he is an infidel."²³ In his Talbīs iblis, Ibn al-Jawzī wrote that 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī's Ḥaqā'iq al-tafsīr contains astonishing examples of Ṣūfī exegesis "which occur to them without the supports of any of the fundamentals of knowledge,”²⁴ and he quotes numerous examples from it in order to point out the errors of Şüfî exegesis. Critical judgments of the Haqā'iq al-tafsîr were also made by such later scholars such as Ibn Taymiyya, Shams al-Dîn al-Dhahabî (d. 1348), and Abû'l Faḍl 'Abd al-Raḥmân al-Suyûtî (d. 1505).²⁵

Al-Qushayrî

Abû'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Karîm b. Hawāzin al-Qushayrî (d. 1074) was an Arab from Northeastern Iran who studied with al-Sulamî after his primary spiritual teacher and father-in-law, Abû 'Alî al-Daqqāq, died.²⁶ Upon meeting his first teacher, al-Qushayrî abandoned his life as a wealthy landowner, and, at the urging of his teacher, adopted the life of a scholar of ḥadīth and Ash'arî theology. This quiet life was interrupted when the Saljūqs began to persecute al-Qushayrî and other prominent and vocal Shāfi'î-Ash'arîs. Al-Qushayrî was imprisoned for a short time before escaping to live in exile, returning to Nīsābūr only when the political situation became more amenable to Ash'arîs.

Although al-Qushayrî wrote theological works and an exoteric Qur'ānic commentary, his fame rests upon his Şüfî works. The most famous of these is Al-risāla fî 'ilm al-taṣawwuf, considered by Şüfîs to be the classic formulation of their doctrine. His expressed purpose in writing the book was to reconfirm the orthodoxy of Şüfism against those Şüfîs who no longer observed the religious law (sharī'a). Al-Qushayrî was a cautious writer, avoiding the type of excessive statements attributed to al-Ḥallāj and other Şüfis; consequently, his Şüfî commentary, the Laṭā'if al-ishārāt, has never been attacked in the manner of the commentaries of al-Sulamî and al-Kāshānî.

The Laṭā'if al-ishārāt consists of al-Qushayrî's own comments on Qur'ānic verses as well as anonymous Şüfî sayings. According to Basyūnî, the editor of a critical six-volume edition,²⁷ al-Qushayrî's goal in writing this tafsîr was to help his fellow Şüfîs and, as such, is a better example of his school of thought than the Risāla.²⁸ Although many of the elements found in al-Sulamî's Haqā'iq al-tafsîr are present here, al-Qushayrî avoids the extensive use of Şüfî terminology and far-reaching wordplay and allegory, instead adopting a consistently homiletical style. Al-Qushayrî searches Qur'ānic verses for something to inspire the reader whether those verses are parts of narratives or religious legislation. The qualities of the prophets become lessons for the aspiring mystic. A verse on the distribution of booty prompts al-Qushayrî to comment on the booty to be enjoyed when one succeeds in capturing the soul from the enemies of passion and Satan.²⁹ Foreshadowing al-Ghazālî's Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dîn, al-Qushayrî continually stresses the importance of the inner aspect of acts of worship, the need to go beyond mere bodily compliance to discover layers of meaning in these acts.³⁰

As Basyūnî points out, al-Qushayrî's method is more literary than intellectual, a fact which he attributes to the Şüfî emphasis on “tasting” (dhawq) and an appreciation for the inimitability ('ijāz) of the Qur'ān. This method is apparent in the attention al-Qushayrī pays to individual words and phrases, drawing upon the roots of the language, etymology, inflections and rhetoric.³¹ In addition to showing his appreciation for the literary subtleties of the Qur'ānic text, al-Qushayrī responds himself to the text in a literary manner by the use of elegant prose, metaphors, and poetry.³²

Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī

Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Ṭūsī al-Ghazālī was born in Ṭūs near present day Mashhad in Iran.³³ His studies brought him to Nīsābūr as a young man where he studied with the prominent Shāfi'ī jurist and Ash'arī theologian Imām al-Ḥaramayn al-Juwaynī (d. 1085), a colleague of al-Qushayrī. Al-Ghazālī resided in the court of the Saljūq vizier Nizām al-Mulk until he was appointed as rector and professor at the Nizāmīya madrasa in Baghdad. Four years later he resigned from this prestigious position as the result of a personal crisis that he later described in his intellectual autobiography, Al-Munqidh min al-Ḍalāl, which also details al-Ghazālī's disenchantment with theology, philosophy and Ismā'ilism, and his consequent adoption of Sūfism. Al-Ghazālī spent the next ten years in practicing and studying Sūfism in Damascus, Mecca and Medina before returning to his hometown. He taught once again in Nīsābūr before he died in Ṭūs in 1111.

Al-Ghazālī is said to have written over 400 works, of which about 70 are extant manuscripts. His writings cover a broad range of the intellectual sciences of the classical Islamic world. Among his early works is an exposition of Islamic philosophers entitled Maqāṣid al-falāsifa, which was followed by a criticism of the same in the Tahāfut al-falāsifa. Among his juridical works is Al-Mustasfā min 'ilm al-uṣūl al-fiqh, a work which is still used as a textbook on the sources of Islamic law today. The Fayṣal al-tafriqa bayn al-Islām wa'l-zandaqa deals with the specific issue of taxing others with disbelief. The Iljām al-'awāmm 'an 'ilm al-kalām, written at the very end of al-Ghazālī's life, expresses his reservations about the study of theology. Among al-Ghazālī's Sūfī works is the Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn, a four-volume book that attempts, as its title announces, "the revivification of the religious sciences." Borrowing extensively from Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī's Qūt al-qulūb, al-Ghazālī reorganized and amplified this material into a systematic work written in a clear and lucid style, addressing the topics of knowledge, worship, and behavior from a pietistic and mystical standpoint. His shorter works include Al-Risāla al-laduniyya, a treatise dealing with the distinctive epistemology of Sūfism, the Jawāhir al-Qur'ān containing various theories regarding the Qur'ān and its interpretation, and the Mishkāt al-anwār, a short hermeneutical and exegetical work concerning the Light Verse of the Qur'ān and the Veils ḥadīth. Al-Ghazālī is said to have written a forty-volume commentary on the Qur'ān as well, but an extant copy has yet to be found.³⁴

Al-Ghazālī's commentary on the Light Verse in the Mishkāt al-anwār is, unique among the Sūfīs studied here in the extent to which it combines theory and exegesis.³⁵ If al-Ghazālī abandoned philosophy and theology as a means for attaining truth, he nonetheless continued to employ their analytical and logical tools in his writing. We need not go so far as Ibn Taymiyya in saying, “Ghazālî went into the belly of the philosophers (falāsifa) and when he wished to come out he was unable to do so,”³⁶ but it could be said that al-Ghazālî’s contribution to Şūfî exegesis is more intellectual than poetic and literary, as it is with al-Qushayrî and al-Maybudî. However, he writes in a very accessible and non-obscure manner, and therefore functions quite effectively as an apologist for Şūfî theory. The style of the commentary is consistently allegorical, although, as we have seen, al-Ghazālî had distinctive ideas regarding the use of metaphors in the Qur’ân.

Rashîd al-Dîn al-Maybudî

We know very little of the life of Rashîd al-Dîn Abû’l-Faḍl Aḥmad al-Maybudî (fl. 1135), the author of the ten-volume commentary Kashf al-asrâr wa-uddat al-abrâr.³⁷ From his name we know he was from Maybud, a small town near Yazd in central Iran. On the basis of the contents of his commentary, Rokni has concluded that al-Maybudî was a Shāfi’î Sunnî ḥadīth scholar who showed his respect for the Shī’î tradition by quoting ‘Alī 185 times and other Shī’î imams 68 times.³⁸

Al-Maybudî explained the purpose of his writing the Kashf al-asrâr in his introduction. He had read and been greatly impressed by the tafsîr of ‘Abd Allāh al-Anṣarî al-Harawî (d. 1089) but was disappointed by its brevity, and so set out to expand it.³⁹ Although al-Anṣarî’s commentary was purely mystical, al-Maybudî decided to add other dimensions of tafsîr as well. He divided the Qur’ân into reading sections (majlishā), and then divided each of these sections into three parts. The first part in each section is a literal Persian paraphrase of the Qur’ānic Arabic verses. The second part, the largest of the three parts, is exoteric tafsîr written in both Persian and Arabic which addresses philological, narrative, juridical, and theological issues as found in the transmitted salafî and post-salafî exegetical tradition. The third part, also written in both Persian and Arabic, contains what al-Maybudî calls “symbols” (rumûz), “allusions” (ishārât) and “subtleties” (laṭā’if),⁴⁰ and it is this part that makes his tafsîr distinctive.

The Kashf al-asrâr has sometimes been called the tafsîr of Khwājā ‘Abd Allāh al-Anṣarî, but, in fact, al-Anṣarî is only one of the sources al-Maybudî used in the third part of his tafsîr. When al-Maybudî quotes al-Anṣarî, he sometimes refers to him by name and sometimes calls him “the spiritual guide of the way” (pîr-i ṭarīqat), or “the learned one of the way” (‘ālim-i ṭarīqat). Al-Maybudî’s other primary source for this part of his tafsîr is the Laṭā’if al-ishārât of al-Qushayrî who is quoted or paraphrased anonymously in Arabic or in Persian translation. Other sources must have been used as well for the sayings and interpretations attributed to early Şūfîs which he includes. Böwering states that, at least in the case of those sayings attributed to Sahl al-Tustarî, the material appears to have been taken from Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj’s Kitāb al-luma’, Abū Ṭālib al-Makkî’s Qūt al-qulūb, and the hagiographical work, Hilyat al-awliyā wa-ṭabaqāt al-asfiyā of Abū Nu’aym al-Iṣfahānî (d. 1038).⁴¹

Rokni has identified three different types of interpretation within this third part of al-Maybudī's Kashf al-asrār.⁴² The first kind he calls ta'wīl, by which he means interpretation that uncovers Ṣūfī doctrines and beliefs in Qur'ānic verses. Rokni illustrates this with al-Maybudī's commentary on verses 2:67–71, in which Mūsā commands his people, on God's behalf, to sacrifice a heifer and they question him regarding what kind of cow this might be. The qualities of the cow to be sacrificed are taken as an allusion to the qualities needed for the mystical aspirant. Another kind of ta'wīl, according to Rokni, is the juxtaposition of Ṣūfī terminology with Qur'ānic verses. His example is the commentary on Qur'ān 3:31. Al-Maybudī compares the first part of this verse, Say, "If you love God," to the Ṣūfī concept of dispersion (tafriqa) and the second part, "God will love you," to the concept of union (jam').

The second kind of interpretation that Rokni identifies in al-Maybudī's Ṣūfī exegesis is homiletic elucidation (tawdīḥ... bi-ravish-i majlis-i ghūyān va khuṭabā). Adopting the style of preachers, al-Maybudī uses rhymed prose, poetry, puns, stories, similes, and metaphors to exhort and inspire the believer. The subject matter might be the inward qualities and outward practices of the believer, the stations of the prophets, or God's glory. It is in this kind of interpretation that al-Maybudī's literary skills are most apparent, and as Rokni points out, the value of the Kashf al-asrār lies in its mystical and literary aspects, its Ṣūfī ta'wīl, and its homilies.

Rokni's third type of interpretation occurs less frequently. He calls it tashqīq, by which he means the way in which al-Maybudī breaks apart a Qur'ānic verse and then expands these various parts by means of related verses, ḥadīth, or poetry. As an example he cites al-Maybudī's commentary on Qur'ān 3:191, those who remember God standing, sitting and on their sides, in which al-Maybudī identifies three different types of people who remember God. The first type remembers God with the tongue while forgetting Him in the heart. This is the remembrance (dhikr) of the unjust. The second type remembers God with the tongue and a present heart. Yet he seeks reward, so this is the remembrance of those who adopt a middle way. The third type remembers God with a heart full of Him, while his tongue has become silent as one who knows God. This is the remembrance of those who have outdistanced all others (ṣābiqūn).⁴³

Rūzbihān al-Baqlī

Abū Muḥammad Rūzbihān b. Abī Naṣr al-Baqlī began his life in the Persian town of Fasā (Pasā in Persian), where he was born, as he put it in his autobiography, "to ignorant folk who were a prey to drunkenness and error, gross and vulgar men like unto 'startled asses fleeing before a lion' (Koran 74:50–1)."⁴⁴ He claims to have experienced mystical states beginning in childhood, states which increased in intensity until he fled into the desert as a young man, and was overwhelmed daily by visions in which he perceived the heavens and the earth as pure light. Following this period, he lived with Ṣūfīs and began to balance his extraordinary experiences by studying the exoteric sciences of Islam as a Shāfi'ī and an Ash'arī. Most of his life was spent in Shīrāz, where he established a Şūfī lodge and a following, and died in 1209.

Rūzbihān wrote over forty works in Arabic and Persian dealing with both exoteric and Şūfī topics, many of which are no longer extant or exist only in fragmentary form. Among those which have been published in critical editions, at least in part, are the aforementioned autobiography, Kashf al-asrār,⁴⁵ the 'Abhar al-āshiqīn'⁴⁶ which presents Rūzbihān's theories on love and beauty, the *Sharḥ-i shatḥiyāt*⁴⁷ containing the ecstatic sayings of al-Hallāj and other Şūfīs, and the 'Ar'āis al-bayān fi haqā'iq al-Qur'ān', his Şūfī commentary on the Qur'ān.

The 'Ar'āis al-bayān' has been published so far only in lithographic form, comprising two large volumes in the edition used for this study.⁴⁸ Alan Godlas is currently working on a critical edition and English translation of this work.⁴⁹ The commentary on each Qur'ānic verse begins with Rūzbihān's own exegesis, followed by quotations from al-Sulamī's Haqā'iq al-tafsīr and Ziyādāt haqā'iq al-tafsīr, and al-Qushayrī's Latā'if al-ishārāt. The style of Rūzbihān's comments is quite distinct from the Şūfīs he quotes. Jāmī (d. 1492) remarked on its difficulty, saying, "he has sayings that have poured forth from him in the state of overpowering and ecstasy, which not everyone can understand."⁵⁰ The Moghul prince Dārā Shikūh (d. 1659) was impressed enough with Rūzbihān's writings to have written an abridgement and update of his Sharḥ-i shatḥiyāt, and to have had Rūzbihān's Qur'ānic commentary translated into Persian, yet he found his style "fatiguing."⁵¹ On the other hand, modern scholars have noted the literary merits of Rūzbihān's writings. Mu'in writes,

His speech is like a rose that flutters apart once grasped in the hand, or like an alchemical substance that turns into vapor when barely heated. His language is the language of perceptions; he praises the beautiful and beauty, and loves them both.⁵²

Similarly, Schimmel writes,

What so profoundly impresses the reader in Rūzbihān's writings, both in his commentary on the Shatḥiyāt and his 'Abhar al-āshiqīn' – "Le Jasmin des fidèles d'amour," as Henri Corbin translates its title – is his style, which is at times as hard to translate as that of Aḥmad Ghazzālī and possesses a stronger and deeper instrumentation. It is no longer the scholastic language of the early exponents of Sufism, who tried to classify stages and stations, though Baqlī surely knew these theories and the technical terms. It is the language refined by the poets of Iran during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, filled with roses and nightingales, pliable and colorful.⁵³

In his Qur'ānic commentary, however, Rūzbihān's role changes from creator of symbols and metaphors to interpreter of those he locates in the Qur'ān, and in these interpretations the influence of Šūfī theories and technical terms is more evident, and above all, mystical experience. Unlike the popular homiletical and didactic style of the commentaries of al-Qushayrī or al-Maybudī, Rūzbihān's is visionary and esoteric.

Al-Kāshānī

Other than the fact that 'Abd al-Razzāq Kamāl al-Dīn b. Abī'l-Ghanā'im al-Kāshānī (or Qāshānī, Kāshī or Kāsānī) came from the province of Kāshān in Iran and died in 1329, we know little of his life.⁵⁴ He studied logic and philosophy as a young man before turning to Šūfism, where his philosophical bent found new expression in the school of Ibn 'Arabī.⁵⁵ Al-Kāshānī became one of the most widely read of the early interpreters of Ibn 'Arabī, having studied with Mu'ayyid al-Dīn al-Jandī (d. 1291), himself a student of Ibn 'Arabī's stepson, Šadr al-Dīn al-Qūnawī (d. 1274). Al-Kāshānī wrote an influential commentary on Ibn 'Arabī's Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam, a commentary on al-Anṣārī's Al-Sā'irīn, and a dictionary of technical terms, the Iṣṭilāḥāt al-Šūfīyya, which explains the terms found in his own and other Šūfis' writings. His Qur'ānic commentary, the Tāwīlāt al-Qur'ān has been published several times in two large volumes inaccurately attributed to Ibn 'Arabī.⁵⁶

It has been shown that, in fact, al-Kāshānī had an attitude towards exegesis very different from Ibn 'Arabī. The school of Ibn 'Arabī, beginning with al-Qūnawī, focused on the more philosophical and abstract areas of Ibn 'Arabī's thought, reducing if not eliminating Ibn 'Arabī's strong emphasis on the role of imagination and Islamic practice.⁵⁷ Al-Kāshānī was no exception here. As Morris writes,

Kāshānī's Koranic commentaries, like his other books, are all clearly distinguished by a thoroughgoing pedagogical concern and didactic procedure that is manifested in such interrelated characteristics as their rigorous systematization, the clarification and simplification of vocabulary (especially if compared with Ibn 'Arabī), and the conceptualization (often in an openly reductionistic manner) of what were originally multivalent symbols. These tendencies are not merely stylistic particularities; they also reflect a shift in the content and underlying intentions of Kāshānī's writing (when compared with Ibn 'Arabī) that brought him very close to the prevailing systems of Avicennan philosophy (especially in their interpretations of the phenomena and claims of Sufism) and related schools of kalam – to such a degree that their verbal formulations are sometimes virtually indistinguishable.⁵⁸

Morris judges al-Kāshānī's commentary as an aberration from the usual norms of Šūfī exegesis, replacing personal spiritual realization with "the application to the Koran of a coherent metaphysical system."⁵⁹ Whereas Ibn 'Arabī emphasized the primacy of knowledge by unveiling (kashf) over reason ('aql), Morris suggests that al-Kāshānī alters or even reverses this perspective. The result is “a sort of allegorical reduction of the complex symbolism of the Koran and ḥadīth to a single (or at most twofold) plane of reference.”⁶⁰

What Morris is responding to here is al-Kāshānī's primary methodology, which is that of finding correspondences between Qur'ānic verses and spiritual psychology and the stages of an individual's spiritual path. According to Lory, this is the methodology al-Kāshānī calls taṭbīq.⁶¹ Al-Kāshānī is not the first commentator to use this technique, but he is the first to use it so extensively and exclusively, and the first to apply it to entire passages of the Qur'ān. It is this method that invites the charge of allegorical reductionism, and yet, however one judges the results, this does not appear to have been al-Kāshānī's intention. We have already seen how he characterizes the Qur'ān in the introduction to his commentary as a sea containing endless treasures to be found and ta'wīl as a process of ever changing interpretation related to the ever changing states of the reader.⁶²

Al-Nisābūrī

Nizām al-Dīn b. al-Ḥasan al-Khurāsānī al-Nisābūrī (d. 1327), known as Nizām the lame, was born and lived in Nisābūr.⁶³ He was a renowned scholar who wrote on subjects ranging from astronomy and mathematics to morphology and Qur'ānic recitation. His most important work was his Qur'ānic commentary, Gharā'ib al-Qur'ān wa ragḥā'ib al-furqān, printed in thirty parts in twelve volumes.⁶⁴ The Gharā'ib al-Qur'ān, like al-Maybudī's Kashf al-asrār, divides the Qur'ān into sections made up of both exoteric and Şūfī commentary. After quoting a group of Qur'ānic verses, al-Nisābūrī gives different readings (qir'āt) and recitation pauses and stops (wuqūf). This is followed by commentary (tafsīr) primarily derived from al-Rāzī's Al-Tafsīr al-kabīr, as well as al-Zamakhsharī's Al-Kashshāf 'an ḥaqā'iq al-tanzīl and other commentaries. These sources are quoted without attribution throughout most of the commentary, although al-Nisābūrī acknowledges his debt to al-Rāzī and al-Zamakhsharī in the introduction and names a few additional sources in a postscript. He also states in his postscript that the final part of each section, entitled ta'wīl, was taken mostly from the tafsīr of the Şūfī Najm al-Dīn al-Rāzī Dāya (d. 1256).⁶⁵

Dāya was a disciple of the founder of the Kubrawī order, Najm al-Dīn al-Kubrā, who is said to have begun a commentary on the Qur'ān that he was unable to complete before his death, a commentary that ends in sūra 51. A number of manuscripts credit Dāya with the work, and it is therefore unclear to what degree this commentary was co-authored or revised by him. The commentary of 'Alā al-Dawla al-Simnānī (d. 1336), also from the Kubrawī order, contains an introduction and commentary on the first sūra followed by commentary from sūra 52 to the end of the Qur'ān. It exists independently and as a work appended to the tafsīr of Kubrā and Dāya. This collective work of the Kubrawī order is sometimes called Al-Ta'wīlāt al-najmiyya. Dāya may have written a different, independent tafsīr as well.⁶⁶ Because these tafsīrs exist only in manuscripts it is difficult to ascertain at this point in time which tafsīr al-Nīsābūrī used for his ta'wīl, and the extent to which his material is indebted to it.

In some ways al-Nīsābūrī's ta'wīl resembles that of al-Kāshānī in that al-Nīsābūrī frequently establishes correspondences between elements of Qur'ānic verses and the spiritual psychology and states of man. In general however, al-Nīsābūrī is less philosophical and theoretical than al-Kāshānī and often demonstrates a more lyrical response to the Qur'ānic text. In the introduction to his commentary, al-Nīsābūrī provides a context to understand ta'wīl as part of the methodology of "extracting many issues from brief expressions" (istinbāṭ al-masā'il al-kathīra min al-alfāz al-qalīla). These issues pertain to either topics of wording or content. Included in the first are matters related to recitation (qirā'a), lexicology (lugha), etymology ('ilm al-ishtiqāq), morphology ('ilm al-ḥarf), grammar ('ilm al-naḥw), and rhetoric ('ilm al-badī'). Included in the second are matters related to meanings (ma'ānī), explanation (bayān), deduction (istidlāl), the fundamentals of religion (uṣūl al-dīn), the fundamentals of jurisprudence (uṣūl al-fiqh), jurisprudence (fiqh), and the science of mystical states ('ilm al-aḥwāl). It is the science of mystical states that forms the basis for ta'wīl interpretations.⁶⁷

QUR'ĀNIC VERSES 18:60–82

The story of Mūsā and al-Khaḍīr

And when Mūsā (Moses) said to his boy, "I will continue until I reach the junction of the two seas or spend years and years traveling. But when they reached the junction, they forgot their fish, which took its way through the sea as in a tunnel. When they had gone on, [Mūsā] said to his boy, "Give us our meal. Truly, fatigue has overwhelmed us on our journey." [The boy] said, "Did you see when we betook ourselves to the rock? I forgot the fish and what caused me to forget to mention it was none other than Satan. It took its way through the sea in an amazing way!" [Mūsā] said, "That is what we were seeking." So they retraced their steps.

They found one of Our servants to whom We had given mercy from Ourselves and to whom We had taught knowledge from Our very presence (min ladunnā). Musa said to him, "May I follow you so that you can teach me something of that which you have been taught – right judgement?" He said, "You will not be able to be patient with me. How can you be patient with what you do not fully understand?" [Mūsā] said, "You will find me patient, God willing, and I will not disobey you in anything." He said, "If you follow me, do not ask me anything until I myself mention it to you."

So they proceeded until they embarked on the ship and he made a hole in it. [Mūsā] said, "Did you put a hole in it in order to drown its people? You have done a terrible thing!" He said, "Didn't I say to you that you would not be able to be patient with me?" [Mūsā] said, "Do not call me to account for what I forgot and do not be hard on me for what I did." They proceeded until they met a young man and he killed him. [Mūsā] said "Have you killed an innocent soul who has killed no one? You have indeed done an awful thing!" He said, "Didn't I say to you that you would not be able to be patient with me?" [Mūsā] said, "If I ask you anything after this, do not keep me in your company. You have had enough excuses from me." Then they proceeded until they came upon a people of a village. They asked them for food but they refused them hospitality. They found a wall in it that was almost falling down, so he fixed it. [Mūsā] said, "If you had wished, you could have been paid for it."

He said, "This is the parting between you and me. I will tell you the interpretation (ta'wīl) of that which you were unable to bear patiently.

As for the ship, it belonged to some poor people who worked in the sea. I wanted to make it unusable because a king was behind them seizing every boat by force. As for the young man, his parents were believers and we feared that he would be hard on them on account of his insolence and ingratitude. We wanted that their Lord would give to them in exchange one better than he in purity and closeness of affection. As for the wall, it belonged to two young men who were orphans in the town. Underneath it was a buried treasure that was theirs. Their father had been a righteous man so your Lord wanted them to mature and reach their full strength and take out their treasure as a mercy from your Lord. I did not do it for myself. That is the interpretation (ta'wīl) of that which you were unable to bear patiently.

Many stories are related in the Qur'ān in this elliptical manner, suggesting that the first Muslims hearing these verses were already familiar with these tales, or that they received further narrative detail or explanation from the Prophet himself. In this case there is an evidence for the latter in a ḥadīth transmitted on the authority of the Jewish convert Ubayy b. Ka'b (d. 642), a ḥadīth which identifies the servant of God mentioned in these verses as al-Khaḍīr (or al-Khiḍr), "the green man." Early Western scholars attempted to identify external sources for the Qur'ānic story and found common features in the Gilgamesh epic, the Alexander romance, and the Jewish legend of Elijah and Rabbi Joshua ben Levi.¹ While Wensinck claimed that the Qur'ānic story is derived from Jewish legend,² Wheeler has demonstrated more recently that it is, in fact, the Jewish legend that can be traced to Arabic sources.³ He states that the common narrative elements isolated by Wensinck and earlier scholars conflate the Qur'ānic version with material from later Qur'ānic commentaries. For example, the theme of the water of eternal life, common to the Gilgamesh epic and the Alexander romance, is mentioned explicitly in the story of Mūsā and Khahīr only in the commentaries and not in the Qur'ān itself. Wheeler views the appropriation of themes from earlier sources as part of a purposeful interpretative strategy for uncovering meaning rather than as an attempt to "get the story straight." It should be pointed out, however, that while Wheeler attributes these narrative elements to Qur'ānic commentators, the classical commentators themselves attribute details such as the water of eternal life and the salted fish that comes to life to the Prophet himself through the ḥadīth attributed to Ubayy b. Ka'b, giving them a near canonical status.

The ḥadīth related from Ubayy b. Ka'b contextualizes the Qur'ānic narrative by explaining the reason for Mūsā's journey. Mūsā is looking for a man whom he has been told has more knowledge than he does.

Mūsā stood up amongst the people of Israel in order to preach. Someone asked, "Which person is the most knowledgeable?" Mūsā said, "I am."

God rebuked him since he did not attribute his knowledge to Him. [God] said, “Nay, I have a servant at the junction of the two seas.” Mūsā said, “O Lord, what is the way to him?” It was said, “You will take a fish and place it in a basket ...”⁴

Al-Ṭabarī quotes an embellishment of this dialogue transmitted from Ibn ‘Abbās:

Mūsā asked his Lord, “Lord, which of your servants is most beloved to you? He said, “The one who remembers Me and does not forget Me.” Mūsā said, “And which of your servants is most judicious?” He said, “The one who judges by the truth and does not follow his own inclination (hawā). Mūsā said, “O Lord, which of your servants is the most knowledgeable?” He said, “The one to whose knowledge the knowledge of the people aspire, that perhaps they might receive a word that would lead them to guidance or save them from ruin.” Mūsā said, “Lord, is there such a one on earth?” He said, “Yes.” Mūsā said, “Lord, who is he?” He said, “Al-Khaḍir.” Mūsā said, “Where shall I look for him?” He said, “Upon the shore by the rock where the fish will slip away.”⁵

Although al-Khaḍir is presented as being more knowledgeable than Mūsā, al-Khaḍir emphasizes the complementary nature of their knowledge, saying, “O Mūsā, I have knowledge from God that He has taught me that you do not know, and you have knowledge from His knowledge that He has taught you that I do not know.”⁶ Al-Ṭabarī quotes an interpretation from Ibn ‘Abbās on the nature of their respective knowledge stating that al-Khaḍir practised the knowledge of the Unseen (‘ilm al-ghayb) while Mūsā only understood external standards of justice⁷ and he characterizes al-Khaḍir’s knowledge as inward (bāṭin) and Mūsā’s as external (ẓāhir).⁸ Al-Khaḍir, however, points out the relative insignificance of the knowledge they both possess as he and Mūsā proceed on their journey; when the two of them board a boat they see a small bird pecking at the water, causing al-Khaḍir to remark that their combined knowledge takes from God’s knowledge an amount equal to what the bird has taken from the sea.⁹

As mentioned earlier, the ḥadīth of Ubayy b. Ka’b contains details common to other stories of late antiquity that do not occur in the Qur’ānic verses. These details are explicit in only one of the versions of the ḥadīth.

Mūsā set out with his boy and a salted fish. It had been said to him, “When this fish comes to life in a certain place, your companion will be there and you will have found what you are looking for.” So Mūsā set out with his boy and the fish that they carried. He traveled until the journey wore him out and he reached the rock and the water, the water of life (mā’ al-ḥayāt). Anyone who drank from it became immortal and nothing that was dead could approach it without coming to life. When they had stopped and the water touched the fish, it came to life and took its way through the sea, as in a tunnel.¹⁰

In the Alexandrian romance, Alexander's cook Andreas follows the fish, jumping into the spring of life after him, thereby attaining an immortality that he does not know what to do with. A similar narrative appears in an account attributed to Ibn 'Abbās, but it is unclear upon whose authority he speaks.

Ibn 'Abbās was asked, "Why don't we hear any mention of a ḥadīth concerning Mūsā's boy even though he was with him?" Regarding this, Ibn 'Abbās said, "The boy drank from the water and became immortal. The wise man took him, found him a suitable boat, and sent him out into the sea. It will rock in the waves with him until the Day of Resurrection and that is because it was not for him to drink from it but he did."¹¹

As for al-Khaḍīr's immortality, it is not mentioned in al-Ṭabarī's tafsīr, but can be found in his Tārīkh al-rusul wa'l-mulūk where he mentions reports that al-Khaḍīr drank from the water of life and became immortal and that he meets the Prophet Ilyās (Elijah) every year in Mecca during the pilgrimage season.¹² Al-Qurṭubī spends three and half pages discussing the matter of al-Khaḍīr's immortality in his tafsīr. He writes that most people believe that al-Khaḍīr died on the basis of a ḥadīth that states that not a soul living at the time of the Prophet would be alive 100 years after his death. Al-Qurṭubī, however, sides with those who interpret this as a general statement for which there are exceptions, including al-Khaḍīr, 'Īsā (Jesus), Ilyās, and the Dajjāl (Antichrist). Although the ḥadīth states that "no one will remain on the earth (arḍ)," al-Qurṭubī argues that arḍ here refers only to the Arab world. He finds additional support for al-Khaḍīr's immortality in traditions that mention the yearly pilgrimage of al-Khaḍīr and Ilyās to Mecca, and a treatise attributed to al-Qushayrī that contains many reports from pious men and women who have seen and met al-Khaḍīr. Additionally, 'Alī is said to have received a private prayer (du'ā') directly from al-Khaḍīr. A ḥadīth in the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim tells of the Dajjāl's meeting with the best of men at the end of time, and al-Qurṭubī cites those who identify this man as al-Khaḍīr and who say that the Dajjāl will finally end al-Khaḍīr's long life. As always, though, he admits that "God knows best."¹³

Although al-Khaḍīr's immortality is often mentioned in other Ṣūfī works, especially in his role as a spiritual initiator,¹⁴ this idea is not mentioned in the Ṣūfī commentaries studied here. Instead, the focus on al-Khaḍīr concerns the knowledge which he is said to have possessed, knowledge received directly from God ('ilm ladunī).

'Ilm ladunī

In non-Ṣūfī commentaries, exegetes attempt to clarify ambiguous or difficult words and phrases and to explain variant readings of the text. When Ṣūfīs address a word or phrase, as they do in the story of Mūsā and al-Khaḍīr with the phrase 'ilm ladunī, their writings often raise more questions than they resolve. Ernst has suggested that these definitions are best understood as teaching tools. In discussing a passage from al-Qushayrī's al-Risāla that lists various definitions for the term Sufism, Ernst writes

[the definitions] accomplish a powerful rhetorical transaction; the person who listens to or reads these definitions is forced to imagine the spiritual or ethical quality that is invoked by the definition, even when it is paradoxical.¹⁵

The definitions in Sūfī commentaries for 'ilm ladunī serve this function, being didactic rather than descriptive or explanatory. In commenting on the knowledge that God taught al-Khaḍīr from Our very presence (ladunnā), al-Ṭabarī, as we have seen, compares the inner and outer aspects of the knowledge possessed by al-Khaḍīr and Mūsā. Sūfīs commentators provide much more extended definitions and meditations on this type of knowledge.

Al-Tustarī defines al-Khaḍīr's special knowledge as inspiration (ilhām), understood as a kind of revelation (wahy) that is not restricted to prophets:

Inspiration (ilhām) acts as a substitute for revelation (wahy), just as He said, and your Lord revealed (awḥā) to the bees (16:68)¹⁶ and We revealed to the mother of Mūsā (28:7).¹⁷ Both of these were inspiration (ilhām).¹⁸

After al-Tustarī, numerous tenth-century Sūfīs are quoted in the commentaries of al-Sulamī and Rūzbihān al-Baqlī with different definitions of 'ilm ladunī. According to Ibn 'Atā, 'ilm ladunī is not book learning, but knowledge from the Unseen:

[It is] knowledge by unveilings (kushūf), not by the dictation of letters. Rather, the place to encounter it is in witnessing (mushāhada) the spirits (arwāḥ).¹⁹

For al-Qāsim (d. 953–4),²⁰ 'ilm ladunī is bestowed rather than acquired knowledge.

The knowledge of deduction (istinbāt) comes with exertion (kulfa) and intermediaries but 'ilm ladunī comes without these.²¹

Not only is this knowledge not from this world, it distracts one from anything other than its source in the Unseen, bringing about a total absorption in God.

Al-Shiblī said, “[and to whom We had taught] knowledge that made him preoccupied with Us from anything other than Us.” It is said, “it directs him to Us and cuts him off from created things or anything concerning them.”²²

This early material is confirmed and expanded upon in the eleventh-century commentary of al-Qushayrī. He adds that this is knowledge reserved for God's elite, but as a benefit for all believers. Al-Qushayrī's definitions also illustrate the inherent tension between Ṣūfī beliefs and traditional theology, since 'ilm ladunī takes precedence over the proofs of rational thought.

It is said that knowledge from the very presence (min ladun) of God is something that is obtained by means of inspiration (ilhām) without being burdened by seeking (taṭallub).

One can say that it is that which God (al-ḥaqq) teaches the elite (khawāṣṣ) among His servants.

One can also say that it is something that God (al-ḥaqq) teaches His friends (awliyā') according to what is appropriate in it for His servants.

It is said that it is something whose benefit does not belong to its possessor, but rather that which is in it from the truth of God belongs to His servants.

One can also say that it is something that its possessor cannot find a way to deny. Evidence (dalīl) of soundness would be what one finds definitively, but if you were to ask him about his proof (burhān) he will not be able to produce any evidence (dalīl), for the most powerful kinds of knowledge are those which are farthest from evidence (dalīl).²³

Although several of these definitions seek to define 'ilm ladunī in relation to other types of knowledge, none do so systematically. This task was taken up by al-Rāzī in his commentary on the verse, beginning with a rebuttal to those who believed that 'ilm ladunī could only be bestowed on a prophet. For the exegetes who believe al-Khaḍir was a prophet, the fact that God describes him as one to whom We taught knowledge from Our very presence (ladunnā) requires that God taught him without the intermediary of the instruction of a teacher and the spiritual guidance (irshād) of a spiritual guide (murshid). Any person whom God teaches without the intermediary of a human being must be a prophet who knows things by means of revelation (waḥy).²⁴

We have already seen that this issue is a contentious one, with those like Ibn al-Jawzī and Ibn Taymiyya insisting that only prophets can receive knowledge directly from God. Al-Rāzī disagrees, claiming that there are many types of knowledge that come to man directly without an intermediary.

This deduction (istidlāl) is weak because different types of necessary knowledge (al-'ulūm al-ḍarūriyya) are obtained initially from God, but that does not indicate prophecy.²⁵

The term “necessary or self-evident knowledge” ('ilm ḍarūrī) refers to sensory (ḥissī) knowledge from both internal and external sensory perceptions; intuitive (badīḥī) knowledge of self-evident truths such as the fact of one's existence and the fact that one half of two is one; and information established by multiple reports (mutawātir). It is usually contrasted with acquired knowledge (‘ilm muktasab or kasbī), which consists of rational (‘aqlī) and religious (shar‘ī) knowledge.²⁶ Although al-Rāzī compares ‘ilm ladunī to ‘ilm qarurī for the sake of his argument here, he classifies ‘ilm ladunī among the types of knowledge that are acquired (‘ulūm kasbiyya). Al-Rāzī mentions that al-Ghazālī has a treatise concerning God-given types of knowledge (‘ulūm al-laduniyya), and al-Rāzī proceeds to “verify what has been said regarding this matter.”²⁷ He begins by saying that we become aware of things either by conceptualization (taṣawwūr) or assent (taṣdīq). Each of these types of perception, in turn, are either considerative (naẓarī) or acquired (kasbī).²⁸

Considerative types of knowledge (al-‘ulūm al-naẓariyya) are obtained in the soul (nafs) and intellect (‘aql) without acquisition (kasb) or study (ṭalab), like our conceptualization (taṣawwūr) of pain and pleasure, and existence and nonexistence; and our assent (taṣdīq) that negation and affirmation cannot coexist nor be mutually eliminated, and that one is half of two.

Acquired types of knowledge (al-‘ulūm al-kasbiyya) are those that cannot be initially obtained in the substance of the soul (jawhar al-nafs) but rather their acquisition must be arrived at by means of some path. This path has two parts. One of them is where man combines these considerative and intuitive types of knowledge (al-‘ulūm al-badhiyya al-naẓariyya) until he reaches knowledge of unknown things. This way is called consideration (naẓar), reflection (tafakkur), pondering (tadabbur), contemplation (ta‘ammul), deliberation (tarawwin), and deduction (istidlāl). This mode of obtaining different types of knowledge is the path that can only be completed by effort and study.

The second mode [of obtaining types of knowledge] is when man strives by means of spiritual disciplines (riyāḍāt) and efforts (mujāhadāt) in which the sensual and imaginative faculties (al-quwwat al-ḥissiyya wa’l-khayāliyya) become weak. When they become weak the power of the rational faculty (al-quwwat al-‘aqliyya) becomes strong and the divine lights shine in the substance of the intellect (jawhar al-‘aql). Gnostic sciences (ma‘ārif) are obtained and different types of knowledge (‘ulūm) are perfected without the intermediary of effort or study in reflecting and contemplation. These are what are called the God-given types of knowledge (al-‘ulūm al-laduniyya).²⁹

If the treatise written by al-Ghazālī that al-Rāzī refers to is, in fact, Al-Risālat al-laduniyya that has come down to us,³⁰ al-Rāzī has stripped al-Ghazālī’s description of ‘ilm ladunī of its Neoplatonic terminology.

In al-Ghazālī’s work, the acquisition of knowledge is said to be achieved either by human (insānī) or divine (rabbānī) teaching.³¹ When it is the latter, it may be either an internal or an external process. The internal process is the process of reflection (tafakkur). Reflection (tafakkur) differs from knowledge gained by human teaching because reflection is what one gains from the Universal Soul (al-nafs al-kullī), while learning from another human being is confined to what one gains from a particular individual. When the divine (rabbānī) teaching involves an external process, this will either be revelation (wahy) or inspiration (ilhām). When it is revelation, the teacher is the Universal Intellect (al-ʿaql al-kullī)³² and knowledge is inscribed within the sanctified soul (al-nafs al-qudsiyya) without learning or reflection. According to al-Ghazālī, revelation (wahy) is reserved for prophets alone.

Revelation (wahy) is engendered from the emanation (ifāda) of the Universal mind (al-ʿaql al-kullī), while inspiration (ilhām) is engendered from the illumination (ishrāq) of the Universal Soul (al-nafs al-kullī).³³ Inspiration is the awakening of the individual human soul by the Universal Soul according to the degree of its purity and receptivity (qabūl), and the strength of its preparedness (istiʿdād). The knowledge received from this process, which occurs in both prophets and saints, is called God-given knowledge (ʿilm ladunī), and is the type of knowledge that al-Khaḍīr received.

What is common to the theories presented by al-Rāzī and al-Ghazālī here is the way in which they seek to confirm the possibility of individuals who are not prophets acquiring God-given types of knowledge (al-ʿulūm al-laduniyya); this validation is accomplished by incorporating ʿilm ladunī into existing philosophical and theological epistemological frameworks. Using the verse on al-Khaḍīr's knowledge as a proof-text, al-Rāzī and al-Ghazālī provide a theoretical framework for the Šūfī's belief in knowledge through inspiration (ilhām). It is an expositional and apologetic approach that differs from Šūfī commentaries that take this form of knowledge as a given. Although all of the Šūfī commentators studied here understood ʿilm ladunī as a kind of knowledge that might be received by the rare individual, none of them addressed the issue of whether these individuals, like al-Khaḍīr, are entitled or even obliged to follow a different set of rules than the common believer. But apparently there were those who did propose such an argument, and al-Qurṭubī attacks them in his tafsīr not only for believing that they could receive knowledge by any means other than the prophets, but especially for claiming that this special knowledge frees them from the need to follow the religious law.³⁴

Our shaykh, Imām Abū'l-ʿAbbās said that the esotericist heretics (zanādiqa al-bāṭiniyya) are of the opinion that traveling a path requires these religious precepts but they say, "These general religious precepts are only imposed upon the stupid and the common. As for the friends of god (awliyāʾ) and elect (ahl al-khuṣṣ), they don't need these texts; the only thing meant for them is what happens in their hearts and they are ruled by whatever seizes them in their thoughts." They say, "That is because of the purity of their hearts from all kinds of turbidity and the freedom of their hearts from all others, so that the divine kinds of knowledge (al-'ulūm al-ilāhiyya) and lordly realities (ḥaqā'iq al-rabbāniyya) are disclosed to them and they understand the secrets of created things. They know the principles of individual things and by means of them they are able to dispense with universal religious principles just as happened with al-Khaḍir. Because of what was disclosed to him from different types of knowledge, he was able to dispense with the understanding Mūsā had of these things.” Included in what they have transmitted is, “Seek the legal opinion of your heart even if the Muftis give a legal opinion for you.”

Regarding that, our shaykh said that this is the talk of heresy (zandaqa) and infidelity (kufṛ), the proponent of which should be killed without being given a chance to seek repentance, because it is a denial of what is known from the religious laws. Truly God has imposed his practice (sunna) and implemented his wisdom through his precepts which can only be known by means of His messengers who mediate between Him and His creation. They convey His message and word from Him explaining His religious laws and precepts. They have been chosen for that just as He said, God chooses messengers from angels and from men. Truly, He is Hearing, Seeing (22:75). He also said, God well knows where to place His message (6:124), and Mankind was a single community and God sent prophets to give glad tidings and warn (2:213) in addition to other verses.

In sum, definitive knowledge (al-'ilm al-qaṭ'i), necessary certainty (al-yaqīn al-darūrī) and the consensus (ijmā') of the pious predecessors and descendants all agree on the fact that there is no way that anyone can have knowledge of the precepts of God referring to His command and prohibition except by way of the messengers. And the one who says, “Here is another way by which to know His command and prohibition without the messengers,” so that he dispenses with them, is an infidel (kāfir) who should be killed. His repentance should not be sought and there is no need for questions and answers from him. It is a belief in the perpetuation of prophets after our Prophet whom God has made the seal of His prophets and messengers. There is no prophet or messenger after him.³⁵

Al-Qurṭubī would seem to be denying the possibility of what al-Rāzī and al-Ghazālī defended, 'ilm ladunī received by those who are not prophets, at least with regards to knowledge of God's commands and prohibitions. But al-Qurṭubī does not deny the possibility of there being friends of God (awliyā') to whom charismatic acts (karāmāt) occur. Although he agrees with other exegetes who say that al-Khaḍir was a prophet, al-Qurṭubī nonetheless uses him as a starting point for discussing charismatic acts (karāmāt) occurring in individuals who are not prophets, and the question of whether it is permissible for a friend of God (walī) to know that he is a friend of God.³⁶ In the latter discussion, al-Qurṭubī quotes

Şūfī hagiographical material approvingly,³⁷ demonstrating that his criticism of some Şūfīs should not be taken as a general condemnation of Şūfism.

The journeys of Mūsā

The fact that al-Rāzī describes ‘ilm ladunī as acquired knowledge that requires spiritual disciplines (riyāḍāt) and efforts (mujāhadāt) on the part of those seeking it does not contradict the Şūfīs who say that it comes without exertion or seeking. Their comments refer to the actual bestowal of the knowledge from God, whereas al-Rāzī’s comments refer to the preparation needed to receive this knowledge. According to the Şūfīs, the difficulties that Mūsā underwent in his journey to and with al-Khaḍīr, were part of the process of learning proper behavior (ta’dīb). Their comments in this area demonstrate another distinctive characteristic of Şūfī exegesis, one that seeks to uncover the edifying potential of the characters and events described in the Qur’ān in a manner similar to that of preachers. They place Mūsā’s journey with al-Khaḍīr in the context of the other journeys in his life, and compare this to the different states (aḥwāl) and stations (maqāmāt) through which a spiritual seeker continually moves. The fact that al-Khaḍīr possessed ‘ilm ladunī, while Mūsā did not, at least not at that point in his life, relates to their different stations.

Fāris³⁸ said: Mūsā said, “God willing” about himself in “You will find me patient, God willing,” but al-Khaḍīr did not do the same when he said, “You will not be able to be patient with me,” because the knowledge of Mūsā at that time was the knowledge of what religious law has prescribed and deduction (istidlāl), but the knowledge of al-Khaḍīr was God-given knowledge (‘ilm ladunī) from one unseen to another. Mūsā was in the station (maqām) of learning proper behavior (ta’dīb) while al-Khaḍīr was in the station (maqām) of unveiling (kashf) and witnessing (mushāhada).³⁹

Mūsā’s task in this journey, however, was not to learn about states, but rather to learn about proper behavior, and this could not be achieved by asking questions. In response to al-Khaḍīr’s request to Mūsā, If you follow me, do not ask me anything until I myself mention it to you, al-Ḥuşrī⁴⁰ is said to have said,

There was no way to learn the knowledge of al-Khaḍīr from a place of questioning. Mūsā came to him to learn proper behavior (ta’dīb), not for instruction regarding any particular state (ḥāl).⁴¹

While the purpose of the journey with al-Khaḍīr was to learn proper behavior, al-Qushayrī points out that this was not the case in the journey of Mūsā to Mount Sinai, nor when he set out into the desert fleeing from Pharaoh.

In this journey Mūsā was the one who carried a burden (mutaḥammil). It was a journey to learn proper behavior (ta’dīb) and to endure difficulty because he had gone to ask for greater knowledge, and the state (ḥāl) of seeking knowledge is the state (ḥāl) of learning proper behavior (ta'dīb) and a time for bearing difficulty. Because of this he was overwhelmed by hunger and said, “Truly fatigue has overwhelmed us on our journey.” When he fasted at the time of waiting to hear the Word of God he was patient for thirty days and neither hunger nor difficulty overcame him, because his journey was to God and so he was the one who was carried (maḥmūl).⁴² One can say that this was a journey for learning proper behavior (ta'dīb) and he had been sent back to endure the difficulty. This is not as it was when he watered [the animals] for the daughters of Shu'ayb, for the toil and hunger that afflicted him [in the search for al-Khaḍir] was greater. In that time he was the one who was carried (maḥc mūl) while this time he was the carrier of the burden (mutaḥammil).⁴³

Al-Qushayrī's analysis here of the different journeys of Mūsā is not original. In 'Arā'is al-majālis fī qīṣaṣ al-anbiyā', a book on the stories of the prophets, Aḥmad Abū Ishāq al-Tha'labī (d. 1036) states that wise men (ḥukamā') have said that Mūsā had a total of five journeys. The first of these was the journey of escape (harab) after killing a man in Egypt (Qur'ān 26:21). The second was the journey to Ṭūr where Mūsā saw a fire and heard a voice (Qur'ān 27:8 and 28:30). The third was the journey of seeking (ṭalab) when he left Egypt with his people (Qur'ān 20:77). The fourth was the journey of war (ḥarb) when he exhorted his people to enter the Holy Land (Qur'ān 5:27). The fifth was the journey of hardship (naṣab) and this was his journey to find al-Khaḍir.⁴⁴

While the stories found in the genre of qīṣaṣ al-anbiyā' were viewed with some suspicion, their engaging details and style led some commentators to loosen their standards of authenticity so as to include excerpts from them.⁴⁵ Al-Qurṭubī was one such commentator whose critical comments on isrā'īliyyat material did not keep him from including some of the more amusing anecdotes from al-Tha'labī's tafsīr.⁴⁶ However, the homiletic and literary style considered acceptable and even praiseworthy in preaching was not generally accepted within the genre of tafsīr, except when it could be shown to be transmitted from traditions whose authenticity was unquestioned. In contrast, Ṣūfī exegesis incorporates isrā'īliyyāt material and original homiletic and literary material into a style most fully developed in the commentary of Rashīd al-Dīn al-Maybudī. As we have already mentioned, al-Maybudī incorporates a good deal of al-Qushayrī's work in his own tafsīr, without attribution, but displays his originality in the way he weaves al-Qushayrī's comments into a decidedly literary format. In al-Maybudī's version of the journeys of Mūsā, there are four journeys and four rhyming words used to describe them: harab, ṭalab, ṭarab, and ta'ab.

Mūsā had four journeys. The first was the journey of escape (harab) just as God told in the story of Mūsā, “So I fled from you when I feared you” (26:21). The second was the journey of the search (ṭalab) at night for fire: When he came to it, a voice cried from the right shore of the wādi (28:30). The third was the journey of rapture (ṭarab) when Mūsā came to Our appointed time (7:143). The fourth was the journey of toil (ta'ab): Truly fatigue has overwhelmed us on our journey (18:60).

As for the journey of flight (harab), it was the affair in the desert when he had fled from the enemy and had turned his face towards Madyan. He had killed the Copt, just as the Lord said, Mūsā struck him and killed him (28:15). How remarkable was the salvation and victory in God's solicitude in forgiving him that killing! Mūsā said, "The hand of him who has struck reaps the harvest," but He said to Mūsā, "There was no sin in that. The sin belonged to the devil and that act was from him." He said, "This is the work of Satan" (28:15). Thus the believing servant is excused by His grace and receives His pardon. He said, Satan made them slip in some of what they earned but indeed God has forgiven them (3:155). God overlooked their sin because that was the whispering of Satan and the work of the devil.

After this there was the journey of searching (ṭalab), the night when Mūsā went in search of fire, a fire that was such that the entire world would be extinguished by it. The entire world falls in love with every place where the tale of the fire of Mūsā has gone. Mūsā went in search of fire and found light while the brave youth (javānmard) went in search of light and found fire. If Mūsā received the sweetness of hearing the word of God (ḥaqq) without intermediary, how amazing is it that the smell of that reaches His friends (dustān)? If the fire of Mūsā was manifested publicly, the fire of these brave youths is hidden. And if the fire of Mūsā was in the bush, the fire of these brave youths is in the soul (jān). He who has this fire knows that it is such. All of the fires of the body burn and the fire of the friendship of the soul cannot endure the soul-burning fire.

As for the journey of rapture (ṭarab), it has been mentioned previously in [the commentary on] His words when Mūsā came to Our appointed time (7:143).

The fourth journey of Mūsā was a journey of toil (ta'ab). It is an allusion (ishāra) to the journey of aspirants (murīdān) in the beginning of their desires (irādāt),⁴⁷ the journey of discipline (riyāda), bearing difficulty, and the polishing of three things: the soul (nafs), the disposition (khūy) and the heart (dil).

Polishing the soul (nafs) consists of three things: replacing complaining with giving thanks, forgetfulness with wakefulness, and extravagance with sobriety. Polishing the disposition (khūy) also consists of three things: replacing irritation with patience, niggardliness with generosity, and vengefulness with forgiveness. Polishing the heart (dil) also consists of three things: replacing the danger of security with fear, the misfortune of despair with the blessing of hope, and the tribulation of the distraction in the heart with thanksgiving of the heart.

The substance of this polishing consists of three things: pursuing knowledge, [eating] permissible food, and persistence in litany (wird). The fruit of it consists of three things: an innermost heart (sirr) which has become adorned with knowledge of the Lord, a soul (jān) set ablaze by the sun of eternity, and God-given knowledge (‘ilm ladunī) found without intermediary.⁴⁸

As part of his effort to extract lessons from the story of Mūsā and al-Khaḍīr for the individual believer, al-Maybudī uses the characters, details and events of the story as symbolic indicators of the stages of the soul in its progress towards attaining knowledge of higher realities. The boat which al-Khaḍīr ruins represents the poverty that one must embrace in order to escape the notice of Satan who is attracted to prosperity and the outward display of one's religion.⁴⁹ The boy he kills is an allusion (ishāra) to the desires and opinions that shoot up in the field of spiritual discipline (riyāda), and struggle (mujāhada) that must be cut off because this "offspring" will become a disbeliever as it grows.⁵⁰ Finally, the wall which al-Khaḍīr rebuilds is an allusion (ishāra) to the soul at peace (nafs muṭma'inna)⁵¹ that must not be destroyed. The purpose of spiritual effort is to purify the soul, not annihilate it, for the Prophet said, "Your soul has a right over you."

The treasures of the secrets of eternity have been placed underneath it. If the wall of the soul becomes ruined, the treasure of the lordly secrets will fall upon the desert and any feeble idiot will covet it. The secret of these words is that the treasure of reality has been placed in the human qualities and the natural manners of dervishes have been built upon this partition. This is the very thing that brave youth (javānmard) has said:

Religion for dervishes is searching (ṭalab) for it is the custom of kings to bury treasures in deserted places.⁵²

In contrast to al-Maybudī's very readable and didactic style, Rūzbihān's commentary on the story of Mūsā and al-Khaḍīr is mostly a commentary on the commentary of his predecessors, written in a difficult style made all the more obscure by unexplained terminology and concepts. The interpretation of Mūsā's journey to al-Khaḍīr as a journey of toil, mentioned in al-Qushayrī, is used by al-Maybudī to address the practical aspects of the spiritual path that must be undertaken before mystical knowledge can be attained. Rūzbihān refers to al-Qushayrī's interpretation as well, and even quotes it in full, but his own interpretation is less practical than esoteric.

When [Mūsā and his boy] mistook their way, they did not proceed with the heart (qalb) and fatigue affected them. That was God's way of teaching them that they had disregarded intuition (hads) and the heart (qalb).

Perhaps he knew the order (ḥukm) of the Unseen, but the heart and intellect (‘aql) did not so the soul (naḥs) suffered on account of ignorance. If the heart (qalb) and the soul (naḥs) had known just as the innermost heart (sirr) knew, the effects of fatigue would not have overcome them. The fatigue overcoming them was because of their being in the station (maqām) of struggle (mujāhada) and trial (imtiḥān).

If Mūsā had been the one who was carried (maḥmūl)⁵³ there by the good fortune of witnessing (mushāhada), then he would have been as he was on Mount Sinai when he did not eat food for forty days, and yet weariness did not overcome him. This is the state (ḥāl) of the people of intimacy (uns) while the first is the state of the people of desire (irāda) . . . When he was seeking an intermediary he was veiled from the station (maqām) of witnessing (mushāhada), and he was tested with struggle (mujāhada) by means of which God taught him proper behavior (addabahu) until nothing of the different types of knowledge of realities entered into his mind, for God is jealous of the one whom He entrusts with reaching the secret of secrets, for the sake of which he draws him out to learn the knowledge of the Unseen.⁵⁴

Just as al-Rāzī’s tafsīr requires a background in theology and its terminology, Rūzbihān’s tafsīr is best understood by those who have read other Ṣūfī commentaries and are familiar with their special vocabulary.

What distinguishes the commentaries of al-Kāshānī and al-Nīsābūrī from earlier Ṣūfī exegetes is their almost exclusive use of allegoresis as a method of interpretation. Al-Kāshānī explicitly refers to such in his initial comments on the narrative of Mūsā and al-Khaḍir. It is the kind of interpretation that al-Ghazālī called “striking similitudes” (ḍarb al-mithāl) in his Mishkāṭ al-anwār.

And when Mūsā said to his boy. The external sense (ẓāhir) of it is in accordance with what has been mentioned in the stories and there is no way to deny the miracles. As for its inner sense (bāṭin), it can be said: “when Mūsā, the heart, said to his boy, the soul, at the time of the attachment to the body, “I will not stop,” i.e., I will keep on travelling and journeying “until I reach the junction of the two seas,” i.e. the intersection of the two worlds, the world of the spirit (‘ālam al-rūḥ) and the world of body (jism). They are the sweet and the bitter⁵⁵ in human form and the station (maqām) of the heart (qalb).⁵⁶

Whereas al-Maybudī used allegoresis sparingly in his commentary, in his interpretation of the three actions of al-Khaḍir, al-Kāshānī applies it consistently and extensively throughout his exegesis of the Qur’anic narrative. Also distinctive is the way in which he combines terminology and concepts taken from the writings of Ibn Sīnā with that of the Ṣūfīs.⁵⁷ Mūsā’s search for al-Khaḍir, according to al-Kāshānī, is a search for the holy intellect (al-‘aql al-quḍī) necessary to achieve perfection.⁵⁸ Mūsā's saying, "God willing, you will find me patient," testifies to his own aptitude or preparedness (istīdād) and perseverance in searching. The path to perfection requires devotion to spiritual exercises until the soul is disengaged (mujarrad) from the body. Only then can one become acquainted with deeper realities.

*If you follow me in travelling the path of perfection do not ask me anything, i.e., you must practice emulation (iqtidā') and following the path by works (a'māl), spiritual disciplines (riyāqāt), moral traits (akhlāq), and struggles (mujāhadāt). Do not seek realities (ḥaqā'iq) and meanings (ma'ānī) until the time comes and I myself mention it to you, i.e., I tell you that knowledge of unseen realities upon your disengagement (tajarrud) by means of transactions (mu'āmalāt) of the body and heart.*⁵⁹

The ship which al-Khaḍir scuttles represents the body (badan) in the sea of matter (hayūlā) travelling to God. The poor people who own it are the animal and vegetable faculties (al-quwā'l-ḥayawāniyya wa'l-nabātiyya).⁶⁰ The ten brothers mentioned in tradition represent the five external and five internal senses (al-ḥawāss al-zāhira wa'l-bāṭina). The boat of the body must be ruined by spiritual discipline (riyāqā) so that the king of the commanding soul (al-nafs al-ammāra) will not seize it and use it for his passions and demands.⁶¹

The youth which al-Khaḍir kills also represents the commanding soul (al-nafs al-ammāra) whose qualities of anger and passion veil the heart. His parents, the spirit (rūḥ) and the corporeal nature (al-ṭabī'a al-jismāniyya), will be consoled with the birth of a new child, the soul at peace (al-nafs al-muṭma'inna).⁶² The wall that is about to fall down represents the soul at peace as well.

The wall that was about to fall is the soul at peace (al-nafs al-muṭma'inna). It is expressed as a wall because it came into being after the killing of the commanding soul (al-nafs al-ammāra) whose death was by means of spiritual discipline (riyāqā). It became like an inanimate object without movement in its soul or desire (irāda). Because of the intensity of its weakness, it was almost destroyed, so its state is expressed as being about to fall. His fixing it is its being altered by moral perfections and beautiful virtues by the light of the faculty of rationality (al-quwwat al-nuṭqiyya) until the virtues take the place of its vices.⁶³

The two orphans are the possessors of the theoretical and practical intellects (al-'āqil al-naẓariyya wa'l-'amaliyya) cut off from their father whom al-Kāshānī identifies as either the Holy Spirit (rūḥ al-quḍus) or the heart (qalb).⁶⁴ The treasure is knowledge that can only be obtained in the station (maqām) of the heart (qalb) because it is here where all of the particulars and universals are combined in actuality when perfection is achieved.⁶⁵

Although there are similarities between the interpretations of al-Kāshānī and al-Nisābūrī, the latter is far more careful to emphasize the role of the Ṣūfī shaykh in the process of attaining perfection.

And when Mūsā said to his boy. In this is the fact that the traveller must have a companion on the path. There is also the condition that one of them must be a commander and the other the one who is commanded. The companion must know his resolve and intention so that he understands the [nature of] his companionship and does not become fed up with the hardships of the journey before he succeeds in his goal. His intention should be to seek a shaykh to emulate, for seeking a shaykh, in truth, is seeking God (al-ḥaqq).

The junction of the two seas is the junction of the sanctity (walāya) of the saint and the sanctity of the aspirant (murīd). There is the real spring of life. When a drop of it fell upon the fish, the heart (qalb) of the aspirant, it came to life and took its way in the sea of sanctity (walāya) as in a tunnel.

When they had gone on. There is an allusion (ishāra) in this to the fact that if the aspirant becomes weary in the course of his travels, his heart will succumb to exhaustion and he will allow himself to be seduced into relinquishing the companionship of the shaykh, thinking that his goal can be obtained by other means. What an idea! This is false and worthless thinking if the divine solicitude does not reach him and return the sincerity of desire (irāda) to him.⁶⁶

The knowledge which al-Khaḍīr possesses is knowledge of the inner nature of things (bawāṭin al-ashyā) and their realities (ḥaqāʾiq), a knowledge which cannot be taught but can only be obtained by the purification (tasfiya) of the soul and the disengagement (tajrīd) of the heart from corporeal attachments. This process is illustrated by the allegorical interpretation of al-Khaḍīr's actions.

The scuttling of the ship represents the destruction of one's outward reputation and one's pride in devotional acts, for only devotional acts performed in a spirit of brokenness and humility are safe from Satan. The youth killed by al-Khaḍīr is the commanding soul (al-naḥs al-ammāra) killed with the knife of spiritual discipline (riyāda) and the sword of struggle (mujāhada). His parents are the heart (qalb) and spirit (rūḥ) who will receive a better child in his stead, the soul at peace (al-naḥs al-muṭmaʾinna). The wall is the attachment (taʾalluq) that acts as a barrier between the rational soul (al-naḥs al-nāṭiq) and the world of disengaged things (ʿālam al-mujarradāt). Al-Khaḍīr's fixing the wall is the strengthening of the body and kindness shown to the different faculties (quwā) and senses (hawāss), just as it is said, "Your soul is your mount, so be kind to it." The two orphans are the soul at peace and the inspired soul (al-naḥs al-muṭmaʾinna waʾl-mulhama) and the treasure waiting for them is the obtainment of theoretical and practical perfections (al-kamālāt al-naẓariyya waʾl-ʿamaliyya). Their father is the discerning intellect (al-'aql al-fāriqa) who wanted to protect this treasure until they matured under the instruction of the shaykh and his kindly and indulgent guidance.⁶⁷

Although the content of al-Nīsābūrī's interpretation remains more faithful to the terminology and concepts of Ṣūfīsm rather than philosophy, the style is very much like al-Kāshānī's, a kind of allegoresis that involves finding one-to-one equivalences between each element of the Qur'ānic text and a Ṣūfī or philosophical concept. The common objective of all these commentaries, despite their different styles and methods with regards to the story of Mūsā and al-Khaḍīr, is what al-Ghazālī calls applying the Qur'ānic text to oneself (takhṣīṣ) and what al-Simnānī calls recognizing the correspondences between the prophets and the subtle substances (laṭā'if) of man.

“I wanted,” “we wanted,” and “your Lord wanted”

When al-Khaḍīr finally explains his mysterious actions to the frustrated Mūsā before their parting, there is a shift in pronouns in his words from “I wanted” to “we wanted” to “your Lord wanted.” This narrative oddity was understood by Ṣūfīs as a reference to the ambiguous nature of human volition.

Ibn 'Aṭā said: When al-Khaḍīr said, “I wanted,” it was revealed to him in the innermost heart (sirr), “Who are you that volition (irāda) should belong to you?” Then, in the second situation he said, “We wanted,” and it was revealed to him in the innermost heart, “Who are you and Mūsā that volition (irāda) should belong to you?” They he came back and said, “Your Lord wanted.”⁶⁸

Al-Ḥallāj explains these as different stations.

The first station (maqām) is the total mastery (isnā'ā) of God (al-ḥaqq). The second station is conversation with the servant. The third station is a return to the inner understanding (bāṭin) of [God's] supremacy in the outer world (al-zāhir) . . . because to get closer to something by means of egos (nufūs) is to get farther away while to approach [the supremacy] by means of [the supremacy] itself is to draw near.⁶⁹

What al-Ḥallāj seems to be describing here is a change in awareness as the mystic draws nearer to God. Initially, al-Khaḍīr said, “I wanted,” because he perceived the distance between himself and the all-powerful Creator and therefore judged himself as a separate entity acting on his own volition. When he said, “We wanted,” he judged the intimate conversation between himself and his Lord as indicating a kind of partnership in action, but this was also an illusion which kept him from true nearness.⁷⁰ Finally, when he said, “Your Lord wanted,” he returned to the awareness of God's Omnipotence, achieving true intimacy by recognizing the secret of His pervasive agency and allowing his own ego to be eclipsed.⁷¹

As we have already seen, Rūzbihān often builds his meditations on the ideas of his Ṣūfī predecessors, and his comments here are followed by the interpretations attributed to Ibn ‘Aṭā and al-Ḥallāj.

These expressions of volition (irādāt) are in different forms but in truth they are one because volition (irāda) is the volition of God since desires (irādāt) emanate (ṣadarat) in their various types from His volition. His words, “I wanted” tell of the source of gathering (‘ayn al-jam’) and unity (ittiḥād).⁷² His words, “We wanted” tell of taking on the attributes (ittiṣāf) and becoming expanded (inbiṣāt). His words, “Your Lord wanted” tell of the separation of eternity (qidam) from the temporally originated (muḥdath), and the obliteration of temporality (ḥadath) and the annihilation of the one who declares God one (muwahḥid) in the unified (muwahḥad).

In its quality (wasf), this volition (irāda) is the inward dimension (bāṭin) of will (mashr’a) and the inward dimension of will is that which is the unseen of the attribute (ṣifa). That which is the unseen of the attribute is the secret (sirr) of the essence (dhāt) and the secret of the essence is that which is the unseen of all Unseen things. When al-Khaḍīr moved from the quality (wasf) of unity (ittiḥād), jealousy (ghayra) cut him off from pure unity to the source of gathering (‘ayn al-jam’), and cut him off from the gathering (jam’) to taking on the attributes (ittiṣāf), and from taking on the attributes to becoming expanded (inbiṣāt). Then it drowned him in the sea of divinity and annihilated him in its depths from any vision (ru’ya), knowledge (‘ilm), volition (irāda), act (fi’l), and allusion (ishāra). By his act (fi’l) God (al-ḥaqq) spoke in the first, second, and third case and nothing remained in the explanation except God.⁷³

The switch in pronouns from “I wanted” to “we wanted” to “your Lord wanted” is something which is only minimally addressed in non-Ṣūfī commentaries. By carefully focusing on the exact wording, Ṣūfī interpretations demonstrate something like the phenomenon Chodkiewicz notes in Ibn ‘Arabī’s writings, which he calls “rigorous fidelity” to the Qur’ānic text.⁷⁴

QUR'ĀNIC VERSES ON MARYAM

Maryam (Mary), the mother of 'Īsā (Jesus), occupies a significant position in the Qur'ān, being set forth as an example to believers (66:12) and, with her son, as a sign to the worlds (21:91 and 23:50). Extended references to Maryam occur in the Qur'ān 3:35–3:47, 19:16–29, and 66:12; other verses containing brief references to Maryam are 4:156, 4:171, 5:17, 5:75, and 5:116. In addition, Maryam's name is mentioned twenty-three times as part of 'Īsā's name, "the son of Maryam." Only three other persons are mentioned more frequently in the Qur'ān and she is the only woman mentioned by name.¹ Maryam has been referred to as the prototype of the mystic in Islam,² a characterization that certainly holds true for the Šūfī commentaries studied here. Even more so than the figures of Mūsā and al-Khaḍīr, the figure of Maryam illustrates the way in which Šūfīs adopt a Qur'ānic figure as a prescriptive model for themselves. The fact that she is a woman only makes this all the more striking.

What interests Šūfīs is Maryam's unusual relationship with the world and the divine, especially as seen through her detachment from the world, her special relationship with prayer, and the virginal conception of her son. Her detachment from the world is tied to the special vow and prayer made by Maryam's mother for her unborn child and Maryam's resulting service in the temple as a child. As in the passages quoted on the concept of 'ilm ladunī in the previous chapter, Šūfī commentary here is distinguished by its focus on an unusual Qur'ānic word, whose meaning is explored in a consciously didactic manner.

Muḥarrar

When a woman of 'Imran said, "O my Lord, I have vowed to you what is in my womb in consecration (muḥarrar^{an}). So accept it from me, for you are the Hearing, the Knowing." When she gave birth she said, "My Lord, I have given birth to a female!" God knows best what she gave birth to and the male is not like the female. "I have named her Maryam and I seek refuge for her and her offspring in You from the accursed Satan."

(Qur'ān 3:35–36)

Ibn Ishāq (d. c.767), an early source for explanatory details on the narratives in the Qur'ān, is quoted in al-Ṭabarī as saying that the woman of Imrān mentioned here was a woman named Ḥannā who had been barren for many years. One day she was sitting beneath a tree and saw a mother bird feeding her young. She so longed for a child that she prayed to God and He answered her prayer. When she realized that she was pregnant, she vowed to give the child up to be a servant in the temple. Although this was an accepted practice of the Jewish people in her time, only boys could serve. In light of her vow, Ḥannā was dismayed when she gave birth to a girl, Maryam. Nonetheless, Her Lord accepted her with a gracious acceptance (3:37), and she grew up in the temple.³

The word muḥarrar in this passage is explained by al-Ṭabarī and others⁴ as referring to this practice of giving up one's children for service in the temple. It is a passive participle of the verb ḥarrar, a verb which occurs five times in the Qur'ān, always with the meaning of setting free a slave, and it is this sense of emancipation that Ṣūfī commentators focused on. Ja'far al-Ṣādiq is said to have said that muḥarrar means:

in emancipation from the bondage of the world (dunyā) and its people. Muḥarrar^{an} means, I have vowed to you what is in my womb as a sincere servant ('abd) to You, not in servitude to any created being.⁵

Al-Tustarī writes that it means:

[the child's] being freed and emancipated from the bondage of the world (dunyā), the following of its personal inclination (hawā), and the desired objects of its self (naḥs). She made [the child] a servant to the worshippers of the temple in exclusive dedication to God.⁶

Al-Qushayrī adds,

God (al-ḥaqq), glory be to Him in His preeminent wisdom, has emancipated this one from the bondage of being preoccupied with all appearances (wujūh) and states (aḥwāl).⁷

The references here are brief definitions of a concept developed more fully in other Ṣūfī works. In his Risāla, al-Qushayrī explains the relationship of freedom (ḥurriyya) to servitude ('ubūdiyya), devoting one chapter to each. He writes, "Let it be known to you that the real meaning of freedom lies in the perfection of slavery ('ubūdiyya)."⁸ The relationship of the human being toward God is always that of a slave subject to His commands and prohibitions; those who have achieved the difficult and rare station of freedom experience it in relation to the world, not God. Al-Qushayrī suggests the importance of such people for others in quoting Abū'l-ʿAbbās al-Sayyārī (d. 953–4):

If a prayer could be performed at all properly without recitation of the Qur'ān, it would be with the recitation of this verse:

“I wish something to happen that is completely impossible for [this time], namely, for my eyes to behold the face of a free man (*hur*r).⁹

To be a free man is to be subject only to God and no one and nothing else, and to serve others from this state of nobility for His sake. Maryam's freedom (hurriyya) was in her servitude (ʿubūdiyya). She was not subject to the tumult of the world, its people and its objects of desire and was freed from preoccupation with all transitory things. Al-Maybudī writes,

The following is an example of freedom. They tell of that gem of his time, Bū Bakr Qaḥṭubī,¹⁰ that he had a son who rejected all rules and regulations and kept company with foolish, corrupt and impure youths. One of the Pīrs of the Way passed by this boy sitting in one of his wanton and forbidden assemblies, holding hands with those lawless ones. People began criticizing him behind him back. That Pīr was sympathizing with Bū Bakr Qaḥṭubī, thinking of the consequences of all this, and that the prattle of people about his son would follow him to the end of his days. With these thoughts, he went to Qaḥṭubī and found him in such a state that he was beside himself and unaware of that tale and condition! Clearly, he knew neither relatives nor strangers. Clearly, he knew neither the world nor people. The Shaykh was astonished by this state and said, “I'd give my life for one who is unaffected by the soaring mountains!” He asked Qaḥṭubī about the state that so astonished him and he replied, “Indeed, we were freed from slavery to things from beginningless eternity (azal).”¹¹

According to Ṣūfī commentaries, it is this quality of servanthood that warrants the special status granted to Maryam in Qur'ānic verse 3:42, And when the angels said, “O Maryam, truly God has chosen you and purified you, chosen you above the women of the world.” In al-Ṭabarī, the verse prompts a discussion of the hierarchy of the four perfect women in the world, namely, Āsiya (the wife of Pharaoh), Maryam, Khadīja (the wife of Muḥammad), and Fāṭima (the daughter of Muḥammad);¹² and the question of whether Maryam is preferred over all women for all time or just the time in which she was living.¹³ Al-Qurṭubī states that some interpret this verse to mean that Maryam is a prophet, an opinion he agrees with, on the grounds that God spoke to her by the intermediaries of the angels.¹⁴ Ṣūfī commentators, however, consider Maryam's state to be one that is more broadly attainable by saints and the elect who possess this same quality of servanthood. Commenting on Qur'ān 3:43, "O Maryam, be obedient to your Lord, and prostrate and bow with those who bow," Rūzbihān writes,

"and bow with those who bow," that is to say, draw near with your humility with those who are humble among the saints, prophets, and the elect of the people of My love so as to attain the blessings of unification (jam'), because the companionship of the saints is firmly rooted in servanthood ('ubūdiyya) and purification from the bondage of human nature (bashariyya).¹⁵

In commentary on Qur'ān 66:12, Rūzbihān adds an element of consciousness to this quality: Maryam chooses servanthood with full knowledge of its value.

And Maryam, the daughter of 'Imrān, who guarded her chastity, so We breathed into her Our Spirit and she testified to the words of her Lord and His books and was one of the devout (qānitūn).

Rūzbihān writes,

She testified to the words of her Lord. When the lights of Holiness and the spirit of intimacy (uns) appeared, her soul almost inclined to intoxication in the (divine) solicitude, since she had experienced the solicitude before and had negated it in the stage of servanthood ('ubūdiyya) so as not to fall by intoxication from the station of sobriety. Don't you see how He said, and His books and was one of the devout (qānitūn), that is to say one of the righteous in her knowledge of her Lord and her knowledge of the worth of her soul subservient (musakhkhar) and powerless to its Lord.¹⁶

Maryam has knowledge that a human being's value lies in his or her utter subservience to God, a concept perhaps better understood if one looks at the ways in which the words "subservient" (musakhkhar) and "to make subservient" (sakhkhara) are used in the Qur'ān. Do they not see the birds held subservient (musakhkhar) in mid-air? Nothing holds them up but God! (16:79). The sun, moon, stars, and clouds have all been made subservient, by God's command, and all that is in the heavens and the earth, held in this divine thrall, has been made subservient to man.¹⁷ The perfect man or woman remains in a state of constant servitude towards God and in doing so, becomes His representative before creation. Maryam is one of the obedient (qānitūn), a word that the Qur'ān applies to both believing men and women, and the cosmos.¹⁸ It is because Maryam represents the soul in complete submission and receptivity towards the divine that she is sometimes referred to as the soul at peace (al-nafs al-muṭma'inna).¹⁹

Prayer

If the portrayal of Maryam were to be confined to her consecration to God from the world (muḥarrar), she would remain an ascetic but ideal attainable by only a few. But the Ṣūfī commentaries studied here look to other, more visceral elements in the Qur'ānic and extra-Qur'ānic narratives, creating evocative meditations on the meaning of prayer as an expression of human longing and pain, and hope for God's response. The story of Maryam's uncle, the prophet Zakariyyā, and his awakening to the possibilities of prayer occurs in Ṣūfī comments on Qur'an 3:37–9.

Her Lord accepted her graciously and caused her to grow in a beautiful manner and He made Zakariyya her guardian. Whenever Zakariyya went into the miḥrab to (see) her, he found her with food. He said, "O Maryam, how does this come to you?" She said, "It is from God. Truly God provides to whom He pleases without measure." Zakariyya prayed there to his Lord, saying, "Lord, grant me from Yourself goodly offspring. Truly You are the hearer of prayer." So the angels called to him as he stood praying in the miḥrab. "God gives you the good news of Yahya who shall confirm a word from God, noble, chaste, and a prophet from among the righteous."

Al-Ṭabarī tells us that it was Zakariyyā who built Maryam a special chamber in the temple (miḥrāb) and took care of her needs. According to numerous traditions reported from the Companions and Followers of the Prophet, the food mentioned here refers to fruits miraculously sent to Maryam, winter fruits in the summer and summer fruits in the winter. When Zakariyyā saw this miraculous provision given to Maryam, he desired a similar miracle for himself, to have a son even though he was old and his wife was barren.²⁰

Ṣūfī commentaries on these verses note the importance of Zakariyyā serving Maryam, quoting an inspiration said to have been sent to the prophet Dāwūd (David), "If you see someone seeking me, be a servant to him."²¹ Rūzbihān says that He made Zakariyyā her guardian (3:37) because only a saint (walī) can serve a saint.²² Zakariyyā's desire to serve Maryam is such that he is concerned when he finds her in the miḥrāb already provided with food, since he did not initially believe that this food was the result of a miracle. According to al-Qushayrī, "He was afraid that someone other than him would seize the opportunity of serving her and beat him to performing these duties,"²³ but it was one of the signs of the "gracious acceptance" that she was not entrusted to Zakariyyā entirely but received provision from God directly "so that the worlds might know that God does not burden others with the concerns of His saints."²⁴ Rūzbihān writes that Zakariyyā was initially afraid that Maryam's charismatic gifts (karāmāt) were the result of a ruse of Satan but was reassured that this was not the case after questioning her.²⁵

Al-Kāshānī suggests that the food described here may also refer to special knowledge given to Maryam.

He found her with (indahā) food. It is possible that what is meant here is the spiritual food (al-rizq al-rūḥānī) from the gnostic sciences (ma'ārif), realities (ḥaqā'iq), sciences (ulūm) and abundant wisdom bestowed upon her from God, since the specification of “withness” (indiyya) indicates their being provisions divinely bestowed (laduniyya).²⁶

Similarly, al-Nīsābūrī writes,

He found her with food, that is to say from the openings of the unseen (futūḥāt al-ghayb) that God feeds the elect of His servants who spend the night with Him, not with themselves nor creation, just as the Prophet said, “I spend the night with (inda) my Lord feeding me and giving me to drink.”²⁷

Al-Nīsābūrī also describes the foods as “teachings directly from God (al-'ulūm al-laduniyya) without an intermediary.”²⁸ But whether it was food or knowledge being given to Maryam, Zakariyyā is portrayed as having had difficulty believing that her position was so high as to warrant charismatic gifts (karāmāt). Ja'far al-Sādiq is quoted as having said,

Her Lord accepted her until the prophets were amazed, in spite of the grandeur of their own fates, at the exaltedness of her situation with God. Don't you see that Zakariyyā said to her, “How does this come to You?” She said, “It is from God,” that is to say, from the one who has accepted me.²⁹

Although surprised and even jealous of Maryam's spiritual states and gifts, Zakariyyā is consoled by being able to observe Maryam in her states and by his continued service to her.

Maryam said, “It is from God, not from any created being,” and in that were two things to relieve Zakariyyā: one of them was in the witnessing of her station (maqām) and her charismatic gift (karāma) from God and the second was that no one had beaten him to serving her. When He says, Whenever (kullamā) Zakariyyā went into the miḥrāb to [see] her, the word kullamā means “repeatedly” and this is an allusion to the fact that Zakariyyā did not cease serving her even though he found her with provision, but rather every day and at every moment he was studying her state (ḥāl) because the charismatic gifts (karāmāt) of the saints do not necessarily remain absolutely. It is possible that God will make something appear in them indefinitely or He might not, so Zakariyyā did not rely on that nor neglect to study her state. Then he began to question her again by saying, “O Maryam, how did this come to you?” because of the possibility that that which exists today is not how it was yesterday, since this is not incumbent on God.³⁰

It is this witnessing of Maryam’s states and gifts that inspires Zakariyyā to pray himself.

Zakariyya prayed there to his Lord, saying, “Lord, grant me from Yourself goodly offspring. Truly You are the Hearer of prayer,” (3:38) that is to say when he saw the charismatic gift (karāma) of God with her, he grew more certain and more hopeful, so he asked for a son in spite of his advanced age and the fact that his request was granted was contrary to ordinary reality (naqḍ^{am}l-il-‘āda).³¹

Rūzbihān describes Zakariyyā’s desire for a miracle as the jealousy (ghayra) of prophecy.

Zakariyyā prayed there to his Lord. When Zakariyyā went to [see] Maryam, he found her with all kinds of fruits, knowledge given to her from the precious charismatic gifts (karāmāt) of God. The jealousy (ghayra) of prophecy was aroused in him and he dwelt there in retreat (khalwa) and asked God for a son and God gave him what he asked for.³²

God answers Zakariyyā’s prayer out of compassion for this jealousy³³ and because the request is a worthy one. Both al-Qushayrī and Rūzbihān write that Zakariyyā asked for a son to help him in obeying God and to be a successor to him in carrying out the message and guiding the community. Al-Qushayrī extends the meaning beyond Zakariyyā to include all such prayer.

It was a request that deserved to be granted, for when a request is for the sake of God (al-ḥaqq) and not for the pleasure of the self (nafs), then He will not refuse it.³⁴

Zakariyyā’s jealousy and longing are seen as positive so long as the object of his desire is not one of mundane gratification. There is a tension here between this desire and supplication, and the acceptance of God’s will. In commenting on Qur’ān 3:39, So the angels called to him as he stood praying in the miḥrāb, al-Qushayrī writes,

In this is an allusion to the fact that one who needs something from kings should stay at the door incessantly until the request is granted. It is said that the wisdom of God is such that He only consents to the request of one who embraces His service and throws the one who rejects obedience into the humiliation of loneliness.³⁵

The right to petition God is a boldness that is tempered by the reminder that Truly God provides to whom He pleases without measure (3:37) and God does what He wills (3:40). Al-Maybudī tells us that when Zakariyyā received news from the angels that his prayer for a son would be answered, he said, “By what merit of mine do I deserve this reply, if not by Your will and grace?”³⁶ Furthermore, if man desires this grace, he should know that even his desire is the result of God’s act. In a beautiful passage describing how God creates man’s desires, al-Nīsābūrī writes,

There are secrets belonging to God in every single atom of all existing things and in every one of their movements (ḥarakāt) and God has secrets that only God knows. Look at what secrets God expresses through the bird’s feeding its young [before Ḥannā] and what signs and miracles He reveals from this moment to the Day of Resurrection through Maryam and ‘Īsā. Just as God made the bird feeding its young the cause of movement (taḥarraka) of Hannah’s heart (qalb) to seek a child, so did He make the state of Maryam and the food miraculously given to her the cause of the movement of Zakariyyā’s heart.³⁷

The theme of human longing and supplication is further developed in commentary that compares Maryam’s contemplative prayer in the miḥrāb to the prayer she makes in the pain and distress of childbirth.

So she conceived him and withdrew with him to a remote place. Labor pains drove her to the trunk of a palm tree. She said, “O would that I had died before this, and had been completely forgotten.” But the one that was below her called to her, “Do not grieve, your Lord has placed a brook below you. Shake the trunk of the palm tree towards you and fresh dates will fall down to you.”

(Qur’ān 19:22–25)

When Maryam received the food in her miḥrāb, it was a miracle of pure grace occurring without any effort on her part. The dates she is provided with here are also considered to be a miracle, since the tree is said to have been dried up and without fruit until she shook its trunk.³⁸ Several Ṣūfī commentators point out that in this second miracle, Maryam is required to act. Al-Qushayrī writes,

It is said that when she was isolated (mujarrad) and without attachment (‘alāqa), Zakariyyā would find her with food without her having been instructed to exert herself. When the attachment to the child occurred, she was instructed to shake the dried palm tree and this was in her weakest state as the time of the birth of the child became closer, in order to know that attachment necessitates pain and hardship.³⁹

Ja'far al-Šādiq writes: "O would that I had died before" seeing my heart (qalb) attached to something other than God.⁴⁰ Rūzbihān quotes Abū Bakr. b. Ṭāhir as saying,

"O would that I had died" in the days of trusting in God alone before being reduced to the pain of petitioning as referred to in His words, "Shake the trunk of the palmtree towards you."⁴¹

But al-Maybudī would have us know that this "pain of petitioning" is itself a blessing:

Maryam rose up in her weakness and seized the dry tree. When her hand touched the dry tree, it turned green, moist and fresh, bearing fruit, and in its freshness bent towards her. A divine voice came saying, "We had the power so that even without your touching the tree it would have become green and bent towards you, but We wanted by your shaking it to bring forth two miracles; first was that in childbirth, weakness and illness, We gave you power to shake the tree, which was to verify the miracle for you. The other was that We wanted the blessing of your hand to reach the tree so that it would bear fruit. Then the people of the world would understand that whoever is sad and grieved for Us, their hand is a remedy for pains."⁴²

The pleading quality of the prayers of Ḥannā, Zakariyyā and Maryam, and God's responsiveness to them appealingly demonstrates the significance and value of human suffering and supplication. Maryam's contemplative life ends with her pregnancy, the pain of childbirth, and being slandered, making her a model for Šūfīs in balancing the concerns of the world with worship and trust in God.

The virgin Maryam

We have already seen in Šūfī interpretations of the story of Mūsā and al-Khaḍīr the type of allegoresis that finds one-to-one correspondences between philosophical concepts and Qur'ānic references. In the commentary of al-Kāshānī, which makes use of the approach more than any other, the results of this interpretative approach can seem reductionistic or rich, depending on the passage. Al-Kāshānī's comments on Maryam's chastity display him at his best. In two passages of the Qur'ān, Maryam is described as she who guarded her chastity (21:91, 66:12). The Arabic phrase used is aḥṣanat farjahā, which literally means she guarded her private parts. Commenting on verse 21:91, al-Kāshānī writes,

And she who guarded, that is to say the chaste (zakiyya) and pure (ṣafiyya), prepared (musta'idda) and worshipping soul (naḥs), which guarded the private parts of its preparedness (isti'dād), and the locus (maḥall) of the effects of the spirit (rūḥ) belonging to its inward dimension by protecting it from the fornicators of the physical forces within it.⁴³

The idea of the preparedness (isti'dād) of the soul refers to the different capabilities of souls to receive light from the Divine manifestation, a receptivity that can be damaged.⁴⁴ Commenting on the Qur'ānic verse in which Ādam and Hawwā (Eve) say, “Lord, we have wronged ourselves and if You do not forgive us we will surely be among the lost” (7:23), al-Kāshānī writes that the lost are those who waste their original preparedness (isti'dād), which is the substance of felicity and subsistence, by employing it in the abode of annihilation. Thereby they would be deprived of reaching perfection through becoming disengaged because they kept on clinging to the imperfections of nature.⁴⁵

Similarly, Najm al-Din Rāzī (d. 1256), a Ṣūfī of the Kubrawī order, uses the concept of preparedness in his Mirṣād al-ibād:

Wretched is the person who is deprived of his own perfection and looks upon himself with the eye of disdain! He employs preparedness (isti'dād) of the human level, which is the noblest of existent things, in acquiring the objects of animal appetite, while animals are the meanest of existent things! He fails to recognize his own worth!⁴⁶

Human beings are the most perfect form of creation because they have the potential for becoming the locus in which the Divine manifestation occurs most fully, but this is a potential that can be squandered if the soul clings to the pleasures of the temporary and corporeal world. Maryam protected herself from these “fornicators of the physical forces within [the soul]”⁴⁷ and thereby protected her potentiality for perfection. Commenting on Qur'ānic verse 66:12, al-Kāshānī writes,

What is taken into account in worthiness for the charismatic gift (karāma) from God is good work and true belief, such as the chastity (iḥṣān) of Maryam, her believing the words of her Lord, and her obedience, which prepared her for the acceptance (qabūl) of the breath of the spirit of God to her . . . The soul adorned by the excellence of abstinence and the aforementioned chastity is a receptacle (qābila) for the effusion (fayḍ) of the holy spirit and the pregnancy of 'Īsā, the heart (qalb), illuminated by the light of the spirit, believing in the words of the Lord, the wise tenants, and the divinely revealed religions, obeying god absolutely with knowledge and deed, secretly and openly, participating in the unity in everything large and small, inwardly and outwardly, and God knows best.⁴⁸

Because Maryam guarded the preparedness of her soul, her soul was able to become a receptacle (qābila) for the effusion of the holy spirit and the pregnancy of 'Īsā, described most fully in Qur'ānic verses 19:16–22:

Mention Maryam in the book when she withdrew from her family to an eastern place and veiled herself from them. Then We sent to her Our Spirit and it appeared to her as a well-proportioned man. She said, "I seek refuge in the Merciful from you if you fear God. He said, "I am only a messenger from your Lord, to grant you a pure son." She said, "How can I have a son when no man has touched me nor have I been unchaste!" He said, "Thus said your Lord: It is easy for Me and (We give him to you) so that We may make him a sign to men and a mercy from Us. It is a matter decreed." So she conceived him and withdrew with him to a remote place.

The complexity of Şūfī symbolic interpretation is amply illustrated in Rūzbihān's commentary on these verses. He begins by equating Maryam's essential nature with the very nature of holiness itself. Her withdrawal to the eastern place, the source of divine lights (ma'dīn al-anwār al-ulūhiyya),⁴⁹ refers to her profound mystical experiences and intimacy with the unseen world.

The real allusion here is that the essential substance (jawhar) of Maryam is itself the primordial substance of holiness (qudus). Raised by God (al-ḥaqq) in the light of intimacy, with every one of her breaths she was drawn by the quality of nearness (qurb) and intimacy (uns) to the source of divine lights. She became watchful at every moment for the appearance of the sun of omnipotence (jabarūt) from the place in the east of dominion (malakūt). She withdrew from created things by her high aspiration characterized by the light of the unseen. She turned towards the places of the east of the suns of the Essence and the Attributes, inhaling the breezes of union (wiṣāl) from the world of eternity without beginning (azal).⁵⁰

"The places of the East" and the suns that can be witnessed rising there are symbols for the different levels of reality or worlds of the Unseen, with the first referring to the unseen intermediary world of jinn and angels (the malakūt) and the second to the divine world of God's names and attributes. In his commentary on 19:16, al-Kāshānī calls the eastern place the holy world (al-'ālam al-qudsī) and the western place from which Maryam withdrew and to which she returns the world of nature (al-'ālam al-ṭabī'a) and the horizon of corporeality (al-uḥūq al-jismānī), or the dwelling place of the soul (nafs). In describing what happens to Maryam in this eastern place, Rūzbihān uses two concepts to describe the meeting of the divine and human: divine self-disclosure (tajallī) and clothing (libās).

When we have finished describing the holiness (qudus) of the divinity (lāhūt) from human nature (nāsūt) and that human nature is incapable of reaching the divinity, far removed is the Majesty of God (ḥaqq) from mixing with creation, and eternity is segregated from contingency, exalted is His beauty and the grandeur of His beginninglessness (azal) above likeness and resemblance), we can say regarding God (haqq) sending His spirit to her that the Spirit is the visible manifestation (tajallī) of the holiness of the essence (dhāt) in the light of qualities (ṣifāt); and the light of qualities is in the clothing (libās) of the acts (af'āl) in accordance with the beautiful form made desirable to her, which draws every spirit to it through the attribute of yearning (shawq), and that was the spirit of the act (fi'l), the spirit of the quality (ṣifa) and the spirit of the essence (dhāt) in the clothing of His light according to the capacity of her intellect ('aql). Because of that, He said, and it appeared to her as a well-proportioned man. This is the usual way of the appearance of the God (haqq) in the beginning of the passionate love ('ishq) of the lovers, so that their spirits and hearts may be attracted by it to the treasure of being granted knowledge of the qualities and the essence, turning away after separating the truth (haqiqā) from creation (khalīqā). The Prophet, peace be upon him, said about that, "I see my Lord in the most beautiful form."⁵¹

Elsewhere in his Qur'ānic commentary, Rūzbihān quotes al-Tustarī as defining the divine self-disclosure (tajallī) as one of the ways in which God gives knowledge to His servants, the others being revelation (waḥy), and knowledge with (al-'indī) and from (al-ladunī) God, all of these being subsumed within the category of knowledge by unveiling (mukāshafa).⁵² The verb tajalla occurs in Qur'ānic verse 7:143, in which Mūsā asks to see God. God replies, "You will never see Me, but look at the mountain. If it remains in its place, then you will see Me." When His Lord manifested Himself (tajalla) to the mountain, He made it as dust and Mūsā fell down in a swoon.

Like Mūsā, Maryam does not perceive God directly. The holiness (qudus) of the essence (dhāt) descends in the light of the qualities (ṣifāt), which are "clothed" in the acts (af'āl), the level of reality visible to her. The acts function as a mirror for the manifestation (tajallī) of the essence and the qualities. The divine self-disclosure (tajallī) is always clothed or made ambiguous (iltibās) in this manner and is therefore hidden from those who are unaware of the secret. As evidence for his statements, Rūzbihān quotes the ḥadīth, "I saw my Lord in the most beautiful form." A more complete version of this ḥadīth, called the ḥadīth of vision (ḥadīth al-ru'yā), reads,

I saw my Lord in a form of the greatest beauty, as a youth with abundant hair, seated on the throne of grace: he was clad in a garment of gold; on his hair a golden mitre; on his feet golden sandals.⁵³

It is a ḥadīth whose authenticity was mostly rejected outside of Sūfism and caused some problems within Sūfism itself from those who saw in it license for the practice of gazing at youths.⁵⁴ The ḥadīth plays a central role in the thought of Rūzbihān because he believed the form of human beauty is the most perfect locus for the divine self-disclosure (tajallī) and that love of the form can lead to love of God.⁵⁵ It is not only the form of the well-proportioned man that acts as a mirror in which the tajallī occurs, but also Maryam.

A breath of the union of eternity (azal) came to her and the sun of witnessing of holiness rose upon her. When she witnessed the rising of the manifestation (tajallī) of the eternal (azal), its lights shown and its secrets reached her spirit (rūḥ) and her spirit was impregnated by the breath of the unseen (ghayb). She became pregnant with the great Word and the light of the highest Spirit. When her state became exalted by the reflection in her beauty of the manifestation of the eternal, she veiled herself from created beings and became intimate with the bridegroom of reality (ḥaqīqa).⁵⁶

If Rūzbihān seems to be suggesting a union of the human and divine here, elsewhere in his writings he qualifies this. Commenting on verses of al-Ḥallāj that would seem to describe union with the divine, Rūzbihān writes that this is a fancy (wahm) born of human weakness as it contemplates God, and he notes that “the intoxicated speak in this way frequently, even though they know that the essence of divinity is unattainable by the created.”⁵⁷ But if Rūzbihān is careful to stress God’s distance from created things, nonetheless his description of the intimacy Maryam enjoys with the “bridegroom of reality” is a provocative one that includes desire, yearning, and passion; the erotic imagery would be even more apparent if Rūzbihān’s writing style was not so dense and his terminology so technical.

QUR'ĀN 24:35 (THE LIGHT VERSE)

God is the light of the heavens and the earth. The similitude of His/his light is as a niche in which is a lamp and the lamp is in a glass, and the glass is like a glittering star lit from a blessed olive tree neither of the east nor the west, whose oil would well-nigh shine even if no fire touched it. Light upon light. God guides whom He wills to His light and strikes similitudes for mankind, and God has knowledge of all things.

The Light Verse has often been closely associated with Ṣūfī thought, primarily because of al-Ghazālī's well-known and influential commentary on it. Goldziher somewhat questionably stated that the verse is one of the few in the Qur'ān amenable to mystical thought.¹ It has been selected for discussion here because of the questions it raises concerning literal and metaphorical language, and how one can speak of God and His attributes.

God is the light of the heavens and the earth

The majority of non-Ṣūfī classical commentators considered the expression God is the light of the heavens and the earth to be a metaphor or idiom which must be understood in such a way as to avoid equating God with the phenomenon of light. In his Jāmi' al-bayān, al-Ṭabarī states that the Ibn 'Abbās' interpretation, "God is the guide (hādī) of the people of the heavens and the earth," is the best of the interpretations from the Companions and Followers because it is the logical continuation of the preceding verse, We have sent down to you signs making things clear, as a similitude of those who passed away before you, and as an admonition for those who are Godfearing (24:34).² Another interpretation al-Ṭabarī cites suggests that the phrase means that God "governs (yudabbiru) the affair (amr) with regards to [the heavens and the earth], their stars, sun and moon," an expression taken from Qur'ānic verses 10:3, 13:2, and 32:5.³ Other commentators quote additional interpretations traced back to the Companions and Followers, which make God the agent of illumination rather than light itself; that is, God is the illuminator (munawwir) or ornamentor (muzayyin) of the heavens and the earth.⁴

Only one interpretation cited in al-Ṭabarī retains the original wording of the phrase by suggesting a synonym for “light” (nūr), i.e., “light” (ḍiyā).⁵

Al-Zamakhsharī’s commentary is one of the first to reject the literal reading of the phrase and to insist upon its being interpreted. Like other Mu’tazila, al-Zamakhsharī was intent upon protecting the unity of God by denying that there could be a plurality of eternals, that is, a power, a knowledge, or a light that have existed independently with Him for all eternity. Their preferred manner of expressing the relationship between God and His attributes was to say that God is powerful, knowing, etc., by His very essence. In other words, the attributes are not distinct from His essence, but neither are they equivalent to it. One can say, “God is powerful,” but not “God is Power,” because this would be likening God to a created thing. Therefore, Qur’ānic phrases such as God is the light of the heavens and the earth must be interpreted because God is not like anything created, in this case light. Al-Zamakhsharī suggests that the phrase God is the light is like our saying, “Zayd is generous and munificent” (Zayd^{um} karam^{um} wa jūd^{um}) and then saying, “He revives men with his generosity and munificence” (yun’ashu al-nās bi-karamihi wa jūdihi). The first sentence does not mean that Zayd is generosity and munificence per se, but rather that Zayd possesses these attributes. Similarly, the meaning of the phrase God is the light of the heavens and the earth, according to al-Zamakhsharī, is that

He is the possessor of the light of the heavens and the owner of the light of the heavens. The light of the heavens and the earth is the truth (al-ḥaqq), which can be compared to light in its manifestation and clarification, just as He says, God is the friend of those who believe; He brings them forth from the shadows to the light (2:257), i.e., from the false to the true (al-ḥaqq).⁶

The Mu’tazilī doctrine concerning the attributes of God was one of the most significant differences setting them apart from their Ash’arī counterparts who labeled them “deniers” (mu’aṭṭila) for supposedly denying the existence of the attributes of God, leaving God as an abstract symbol of unity.⁷ In his commentary on this verse, however, the Ash’arī theologian al-Rāzī has more in common with al-Zamakhsharī than differences. Like al-Zamakhsharī, al-Rāzī insists that the phrase God is the light must be interpreted. As we saw in the discussion of Qur’ān 3:7, al-Rāzī believes that the abandonment of the probable meaning of any expression in the Qur’ān requires a clear-cut indicator (dalīl munfaṣil) that demonstrates the absurdity of the apparent sense (ẓāhir).⁸ Al-Rāzī applies the methodology to this verse, setting forth argument after argument for proving the absurdity of calling God “light.” He begins by explaining various definitions of the word “light” (in its physical sense), and then demonstrates the absurdity of applying any of these definitions to God.

Further evidence to support his rational arguments is drawn from three Qur’ānic verses, one of which is the Light Verse itself. Al-Rāzī finds a contradiction between the phrase God is the light of the heavens and the earth and the phrases the similitude of His/his light and God guides whom He wills to His light, since the first phrase appears to equate light with God's essence while the other phrases imply that light is attributed (muḍāf) to God. One of the ways in which al-Rāzī attempts to resolve this seeming contradiction is by referring to common usage of the Arabic language. He quotes the same sentences found in al-Zamakhsharī, although he does not mention al-Zamakhsharī by name.⁹ Like al-Zamakhsharī, al-Rāzī understands the verse as meaning that God is not "light" per se but rather the possessor and creator of light, since Qur'ān 42:11 states There is nothing like Him. According to al-Rāzī, if God were a light, this verse would be false because all lights resemble one another. Nothing resembles Him and therefore He cannot be called light. Another verse al-Rāzī quotes to support his view is Qur'ān 6:1, He made the shadows and the light. This verse proves that the quiddity (māhiyya) of light was created by God, making it impossible that the divine being could be a light.¹⁰

Based on this rational and Qur'ānic evidence, al-Rāzī insists that the phrase God is the light of the heavens and the earth must be interpreted (la budda min al-ta'wīl). His preferred interpretation is the one attributed to Ibn 'Abbās and "the majority," which states that the verse means, "God is the Guide of the heavens and the earth." Al-Rāzī mentions several Qur'ānic verses that support this interpretation.¹¹ He considers it the best interpretation because the last part of the Light Verse, God guides whom He wills to His light, "indicates that what is meant is the light of guidance to knowledge and action." Al-Rāzī briefly mentions other traditional interpretations such as God as governor (mudabbir), arranger (nāzim), and illuminator (munawwir).¹²

This discussion of traditional interpretations is followed by an extensive summary and expansion of the first part of al-Ghazālī's Mishkāṭ al-anwār, a commentary on the Light Verse that will be discussed in greater depth in what follows. For now however, we can state that al-Ghazālī's basic premise is that light is a word used for many different types of phenomena. The relationship between these different kinds of phenomena is a hierarchical one, and lights that are higher are more worthy of the term "light" than lights that are lower. The light of the physical eye is inferior to that of the intellect (aql), a fact that al-Ghazālī proves by listing seven imperfections of physical sight when compared to rational insight; al-Rāzī expands this list to a total of twenty imperfections. Even higher than the light of rational insight is the light of God. According to al-Ghazālī, the perfection of His light is such that He alone is worthy of the term "light." God is light in reality (ḥaqīqa) while all other light is metaphorical (majāz) in relationship to His light; in truth there is no light but He.¹³

At first glance this view would seem to be antithetical to that of al-Rāzī, who began his own exegesis by arguing that God cannot be called light. Nonetheless, al-Rāzī concludes after his long summary of al-Ghazālī's work that no contradiction exists between al-Ghazālī's interpretation and the traditional interpretation of light as "Guide," al-Rāzī's preferred interpretation.¹⁴ Al-Rāzī's acceptance of al-Ghazālī's interpretation makes more sense when seen in the context of other discussions of God's attributes. A precedent for al-Ghazālī's statement that God is light in reality (ḥaqīqa) while all other light is metaphor (majāz) can be found in the work of the Mu'tazilī theologian al-Nāshī' al-Akbar (d. 906), who attempted to solve the problem of anthropomorphic descriptions of God in the Qur'ān by the theory that the attributes of God, when applied to God are "true" (ḥaqīqa) but when applied to men are "metaphor" (majāz). The more common way to solve anthropomorphic problems was to say the opposite, that attributes are majāz with regards to God but ḥaqīqa with regards to mankind. But, as Heinrichs has pointed out, either theory works well to solve the problem of anthropomorphism. The first theory, however, raises an additional issue, which is whether Nāshī' al-Akbar understands the distinction between the real (ḥaqīqa) and metaphor (majāz) to be on an ontological or a linguistic level.¹⁵ Nāshī' al-Akbar's view is ambiguous, but al-Ghazālī's is not. He clearly asserts that God's light, like His existence, is the only real Light and Existence. Al-Rāzī's position is less clear; while he repeats al-Ghazālī's emphatic phrase, "There is no light but He," he omits key passages explaining what al-Ghazālī means by this. Al-Rāzī's main concern is the theological problem of eliminating any possibility of equating God with the physical phenomenon that we call light.

Ibn Taymiyya wrote a commentary on the Light Verse that is structured as a rebuttal to an unnamed adversary. Many of the arguments quoted from this adversary are arguments found in al-Rāzī's Tafsīr al-kabīr and the section on God's name "light" (nūr) in his Sharḥ asmā' Allāh ta'ālā wa'l-ṣifāt.¹⁶ The wording is similar enough to suspect that Ibn Taymiyya's opponent is, in fact, al-Rāzī, but the fact that some of the arguments quoted are not found in either of the two works of al-Rāzī, at least not in the passages studied here, makes it difficult to definitively identify him as such. Ibn Taymiyya's commentary is highly polemical; he accuses his opponent of distorting the Qur'ān (tahrīf), apostasy (ilhād) with regards to God's signs and names, lying (kidhb), iniquity (ẓulm), and enmity towards the rights of God.¹⁷ Ibn Taymiyya attempts to highlight, point by point, what he deems to be the contradictions in his opponent's arguments and their pervertedness (fasād). For our purposes the most important material pertains to Ibn Taymiyya's response to the claim that the phrase God is the light of the heavens and the earth must be interpreted. Ibn Taymiyya not only rejects the necessity of interpreting this phrase, he insists that the majority of Muslims do not interpret it, this being the view of the first generations (salaf), the Attributionists (ṣifātiyya)¹⁸ among the theologians, jurists, Sūfīs, and others. The interpretation of God's attribute "light," according to Ibn Taymiyya goes back to the *jahmiyya*¹⁹ and the Mu'tazila.

Ibn Taymiyya's opponent claims that the phrase God is the light of the heavens and the earth must be interpreted because "light is a mode of being (kayfiyya) existing in corporeality, which is the opposite of darkness, and far be it from God (al-ḥaqq) to have an opposite"²⁰ Ibn Taymiyya understands the term "light" as possessing different meanings appropriate to different contexts. He disagrees with the definition of light as a mode of being existing in corporeality, stating that created light can be either an essence (ʿayn) or an accident (ʿarāḍ). An example of the first is fire while the second would be the reflective light of the fire on a wall. Only the second can be said to be a “mode of being existing by means of a body.” In other words, sometimes the word light refers to a substance (jawhar) and sometimes to a quality (ṣifa). Similarly, the names of God sometimes refer to His essence and sometimes to His attributes. As an example of this, Ibn Taymiyya quotes a ḥadīth, “You are the real (ḥaqq), Your speech is the real (ḥaqq), the Garden is real (ḥaqq), the prophets are real (ḥaqq) and Muḥammad is real (ḥaqq).”²¹

Similarly, Ibn Taymiyya understands the phrase God is the light of the heavens and the earth as meaning that light is part of God’s essence as well as being one of His attributes; that is to say God is both light and possesses light. Therefore, there is no contradiction between the first phrase, God is the light of the heavens and the earth and the second phrase the similitude of His/his light, and it would be wrong to interpret the first phrase to mean “God is the possessor of light,” as do al-Zamakhsharī and al-Rāzī. Ibn Taymiyya finds further proof for accepting the exact Qur’ānic wording as it is in the ḥadīth, “O God, praise be to You, light of the heavens and the earth and what is in them,” and the Prophet’s reply to the question of how he saw his Lord, “I see a light.”²²

Ibn Taymiyya’s insistence that God is light, however, does not mean that he rejects the metaphorical interpretations of the first generations (salaf) regarding this light, comments that he does not call ta’wīl but rather tafsīr. According to Ibn Taymiyya, saying that “God is the guide of the heavens and the earth” does not negate the fact of God being Himself a light. Using many of the same examples that he uses in his book on Qur’ānic methodology, Muqaddima fī uṣūl al-tafsīr, Ibn Taymiyya explains that the custom of the first generations was to use different expressions and examples to explain the meaning of the Qur’ān. When they said, “God is the guide of the heavens and the earth,” they were making a statement regarding one of the meanings of God is the light of the heavens and the earth, a statement that does not invalidate its other meanings. Likewise, when they said, “God is the illuminator (munawwir) of the heavens and the earth,” they were not contradicting the fact of His being a light, because part of the definition of light is being something that illuminates something else.²³ Ibn Taymiyya, then, accepts both the interpretation that God is the light of the heavens and the earth as “God is the guide of the heavens and the earth” and the interpretation that insists upon the literal meaning. However, he does not explore the implications of accepting the literal meaning.²⁴

Ṣūfī interpretations of God is the light of the heavens and the earth

It is the literal understanding of the phrase God is light that interests al-Ghazālī in his Mishkāṭ al-anwār, although the conclusions he draws regarding it are not ones that Ibn Taymiyya would have accepted. He explains that the various interpretations of the Light Verse are due to the different definitions of light they presuppose. He judges the understanding of light found amongst the Ṣūfīs to be superior to that of other interpretations, but suggests that it is not an interpretation that should be widely broadcast. As we saw in the commentaries on Qur'ān 3:7, the Ṣūfīs asserted that the Qur'ān contains both public knowledge that should be disseminated and private knowledge that is made deliberately obscure except to those few intended to receive it. Al-Ghazālī refers to this principle in the introduction to his Mishkāt al-anwār and explains why, then, he is revealing some of this private information:

What is more, not every mystery is to be unveiled and divulged, and not every reality (ḥaqīqa) is to be presented and disclosed. Indeed, “the breasts of the free (aḥrār) are the graves of the mysteries.”²⁵ One of the gnostics has said, “To divulge the mystery of Lordship is unbelief (kufīr).” Indeed, the Master of the First and the Last [the Prophet] said, “There is a kind of knowledge like the guise of the hidden; none knows it except the knowers of God. When they speak of it, none denies it except those who are arrogantly deluded by God.” And when the people of arrogant delusion become many, it becomes necessary to preserve the coverings upon the face of the mysteries. But I see you as one whose breast has been opened up by God through light and whose innermost consciousness (sirr) has been kept free of the darknesses of delusion. Hence, in this discipline I will not be niggardly toward you in alluding (ishāra) to sparks and flashes or giving symbols of realities and subtleties, for the fear of holding back knowledge from those who are worthy of it is not less than that in disseminating it to those who are not worthy of it.

He who bestows (manaḥa) knowledge on the ignorant wastes it,
And he who withholds (mana'a) it from the worthy has done them wrong.²⁶

With this said, al-Ghazālī proceeds to the first section of his treatise on the definition of different types of light, and his interpretation of the phrase God is the light of the heavens and the earth.

Al-Ghazālī asserts that the term “light” is understood in three different ways. The first usage (waḍ') is that of ordinary people (āmmī) and indicates manifestation (ẓuhūr) to visual perception. “Light” here is “an expression for what can be seen in itself and through which other things can be seen, like the sun.” The Arabic language, however, also includes the possibility of using the word “light” to refer to the organ of perception involved, the eye, as in the phrase “the light of the eyesight of the bat is weak (fi'l-khuffāsh inna nūr 'aynihi ḍa'if).”²⁷ Al-Ghazālī suggests that this second definition of the term “light” is more appropriate than the first definition because the eye perceives and through it perception takes place, whereas seen light is merely the place where perception takes place. An even more perfect organ of perception is the “eye” of the intellect (‘aql) and so this too can be referred to as a “light.” It is in this sense that “light” can be used to refer to the Prophet and, to a lesser degree, the other prophets and religious scholars.²⁸

While this second definition of “light” occurs among the elect (khawāṣṣ), the elect of the elect (khawāṣṣ al-khawāṣṣ) have a third definition, which defines “light” as “the first light” (al-nūr al-awwal) and “the real light” (al-nūr al-ḥaqq) because it is the only light that does not borrow its luminosity from something else. The use of the term “light” for anything other than this real light is metaphor (majāz). God is light, there is no light but He, and He is the totality of lights and the universal light. God is hidden from us because He is pure light. In everything other than God light is mixed with darkness, allowing us to see, but God has no opposite, no darkness mixed with His light and He is therefore veiled from His creation by the very intensity of His manifestation. He is everywhere but cannot be seen.

Just as the real light (al-nūr al-ḥaqq) is God, the real existent (al-mawjūd al-ḥaqq) is God. And just as our light is “borrowed,” so is our existence “borrowed (isti‘āra).” Once one has recognized what is real and what is metaphor, one will understand that “there is nothing in existence except God,” and Everything is being annihilated except His face (28:88). The state (ḥāl) of seeing this is attained either by cognitive gnosis (‘irfān ‘ilmī) or “tasting (dhawq).” In the latter case there is an intoxication that overcomes the intellect and gives rise to such statements as those made by al-Ḥallāj and Abū Yazīd al-Bisṭāmī (d. 875), but when the state ends the intellect knows that it was a state that was not the reality of unification (ḥaqīqat al-ittiḥād) but the ambiguity of unification (shubḥa’l-ittiḥād). The possessor of this state has been annihilated (faniya) from himself and annihilated from his annihilation (faniya ‘an fanā’ihi) because he has lost all consciousness of himself.

In relationship to the one immersed in it, this state is called “unification” (ittiḥād), according to the language of metaphor (majāz), or is called “declaring God’s unity” (tawḥīd) in the language of reality (ḥaqīqa).²⁹

Al-Ghazālī quotes a poem here attributed to Ṣāḥib b. ‘Abbād (d. 995):

The glass is clear, the wine is clear,
the two are similar, the affair confused,
As if there is wine and no glass, or glass and no wine.³⁰

And he adds, “There is a difference between saying, ‘The wine is the cup’ and ‘It is as if the wine is the cup.’”³¹ It was just this kind of ambiguous statement which troubled critics like Ibn Taymiyya who rejected the distinction between the reality and the metaphor of unification (ittiḥād) and therefore could only see these ideas as heresies, a denial of God's complete transcendence. Ibn Taymiyya believed that this denial was at the root of both the ecstatic utterances of the early Ṣūfīs and their philosophizing successors, hidden beneath the deliberate ambiguity of Ṣūfī terminology and style. Ibn 'Arabī describes the state of bewilderment (hayra) which occurs in the mystic when he realizes the ambiguity of existence, but Ibn Taymiyya declares this merely confusion, the result of the logical absurdities of the mystic's thinking.³² In the Mishkāt al-anwār, al-Ghazālī anticipates this criticism, expressing his concern that what he has said will be misunderstood and suggests that those who cannot grasp this kind of knowledge should avoid it:

It may be that some people will fall short of understanding the innermost meaning of these words. Hence, they will understand the words, "God is with everything, just as light is with the things," to mean that He is in each place – high exalted and holy is He from being ascribed to place! Probably the best way not to stir up such imaginings is to say that He is before everything, that He is above everything and that He makes everything manifest. Yet, in the knowledge of those who possess insight, that which makes manifest cannot be separate from that which is manifest. This is what we mean by our saying that "He is with everything." Moreover, it is not hidden from you that the manifester is above and before everything made manifest, although it is with everything in a certain respect. However, [the manifester] is with [everything] in one respect and before it in another respect, so you should not suppose that this is a contradiction. Take an example from sensory objects, which lie at your level of knowledge: Consider how the movement of a hand is both with the movement of its shadow and before it. He whose breast cannot embrace knowledge of this should abandon this type of science. There are men for each science, and "the way is eased for each person to that for which he was created."³³

For ordinary people the declaration of God's unity (tawḥīd) is "There is no god but God," but for the elect the declaration of God's unity is "There is no he but He."³⁴

The Mishkāt al-anwār represents a type of Ṣūfī writing which uses the language of philosophy and theology to describe a view of reality based on the Ṣūfī experience of annihilation (fanā) and subsistence (baqā). Although Ibn 'Arabī has often been considered the originator of this theoretical form of Ṣūfism, the Mishkāt al-anwār demonstrates that al-Ghazālī was clearly his precursor.³⁵ Elsewhere, al-Ghazālī did address the types of theological issues which are the primary focus of al-Rāzī's commentary on the Light Verse, but these are not his concerns in the Mishkāt al-anwār. His concerns are also different from the purely philosophical approach of Ibn Sīnā in his interpretation of the Light Verse found in Fī ithbāt al-nubuwwāt. Like al-Rāzī, Ibn Sīnā declares physical light the "essential" meaning of light and the use of the term "light" in the Qur'ānic phrase

God is the light of the heavens and the earth “metaphorical,” a linguistic stance opposite to that of al-Ghazālī.

I say: light is an equivocal term (mushtarak) partaking of two meanings, one essential (dhātī) and the other metaphorical (musta‘ār). The essential stands for the perfection of the transparent inasmuch as it is transparent, as Aristotle said. The metaphorical meaning is to be understood in two ways: either as the good, or as the cause that leads to the good. Here, the sense is the metaphorical one in both meanings. I mean that God, the Exalted, is in Himself the good and the cause of everything good.”³⁶

In this respect, Ibn Sīnā has more in common with exoteric exegesis on this verse than with al-Ghazālī’s interpretation, because he assumes that the meaning of the term “light” can be easily understood. For al-Ghazālī, in contrast, the true meaning of “light” contains a secret regarding the ambiguous status of man’s existence. Al-Ghazālī links this particular understanding of man’s relationship to God to problems of Qur’anic interpretation both here and in his discussion in the Ihyā’ ‘ulūm al-dīn of the meaning of the Qur’anic verse You did not throw when you threw but God threw (8:17). The verse was revealed after the Battle of Badr and refers to a moment in the battle when the Prophet threw dust at the enemies of the Muslims.

The external sense (zāhir) of this verse is clear but the truth of its meaning is obscure (ghāmiḍ) since it both affirms and negates the throwing. This is contradictory in the external sense unless one understands that he threw from one point of view and did not throw from another point of view, and from the point of view in which he did not throw God threw . . . The reality of this is taken from the vast ocean of the knowledges of unveiling (‘ulūm al-mukāshafāt). The external sense of the commentary will be of no use.³⁷

The similitude of His/his light is as a niche

While the phrase God is the light was interpreted both metaphorically and literally, the phrase the similitude of His/his light is as a niche and the various elements of this niche was understood by all commentators as a metaphor, but a metaphor whose referents are ambiguous. Al-Rāzī lists ten different interpretations that can be grouped according to whether these words refer to God, Muḥammad, or the believer.³⁸ Although al-Rāzī includes interpretations from later commentators, all three referents can be found in the earliest interpretations transmitted from the Companions and the Followers. Al-Rāzī’s preferred interpretation, as it was al-Ṭabarī’s, is that the extended metaphor of the niche serves the purpose of describing a pure and perfect light, thereby describing, by analogy, the perfection of God’s guidance. His light may also refer to the Qur’ān. Another interpretation suggests that the words mean Muḥammad, just as the Qur'ān 33:46 describes Muḥammad as a light-giving lamp. Muqātil (d. 767) is quoted as saying that it is a similitude for the light of faith in the heart of Muḥammad, so the niche is like the loins of 'Abd Allāh, Muḥammad's father; the glass the body of Muḥammad; and the lamp faith or prophecy in Muḥammad's heart. Or the niche can be compared to Ibrāhīm, the glass to Ismā'īl, the lamp to the body of Muḥammad, and the tree to prophecy and the message.

Whereas these interpretations identify the elements of the niche as referring to God's guidance or Muhammad, the other interpretations cited by al-Rāzī understand this part of the verse as referring to the believer. One interpretation suggests that the light is knowledge of God and the religious laws in the heart of the believer. The evidence for this interpretation is in Qur'ān 39:22, Is he whose breast God has opened up to Islam so that he has a light from his Lord... and verse 14:1, in order that you might bring mankind out of the darkness into the light. The interpretations of al-Ghazālī and Ibn Sīnā, which understand the niche as referring to the human perceptual faculties are summarized. Al-Rāzī then quotes a Ṣūfī interpretation which states that the niche is the breast, the glass is the heart, the lamp is knowledge, and the blessed tree is the angels and their inspirations which are neither of the east nor west because they are spiritual (rūḥāniyya). The oil from this tree would well-nigh shine even if no fire touched it because of the plentitude of their different types of knowledge and the powerfulness of their understanding of the secrets of the kingdom (malakūt) of God. Al-Rāzī adds critically, "It is obvious here that the thing compared (mushabbah) is not the thing compared therewith (al-mushabbih bihi)."³⁹

Al-Rāzī does not explain why he finds this particular interpretation unacceptable. Al-Qurṭubī is clearer in his commentary that the issue is one of understanding the proper use of language. He states that metaphorical definitions of light are part of standard Arabic speech and gives examples of such from Arabic poetry to show that the statement God is the light refers to He who brings all things into existence, including light. He adds that the mistake of corporealists (mujassima) is that they follow the external sense of the verse and aḥādīth which seem to suggest that God is a light.⁴⁰ Metaphor, then, is part of the language of the Qur'ān. This does not mean, however, that words and expressions can be interpreted in ways that go beyond the metaphors that are a part of standard Arabic speech. Al-Qurṭubī quotes his teacher's critique of an interpretation of the elements of the niche similar to one of the interpretations al-Rāzī cites.

Al-Qāḍī Abū Bakr b. al-'Arabī said: It is strange that there was a jurist who said that this is a similitude which God has struck for Ibrāhīm and Muḥammad, and for 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and his son 'Abd Allāh... 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib is likened to the niche in which there is a candle that is the glass that is like 'Abd Allāh. Muḥammad is like the lamp, meaning that he is from their loins, so that he is like a glittering star which is Jupiter.

Lit from a blessed tree means the inheritance of prophecy from Ibrāhīm who is the blessed tree, meaning pure in faith (ḥanifiyya). Neither of the east nor the west, neither Jewish nor Christian. Whose oil would well-nigh shine even if no fire touched it. [The jurist] says, “Ibrāhīm would well-nigh speak from revelation before it was revealed to him.” Light upon light. Ibrāhīm then Muḥammad.

Al-Qāḍī said: All of this is an abandonment of the obvious sense (zāhir) and nothing in the process of creating metaphors (tamthīl) prevents one from expanding it.⁴¹

Al-Qurṭubī’s teacher is drawing attention to what he perceives to be the danger inherent in metaphors, their openness to endless interpretation. Yet he also states that metaphor in the Qur’ān is necessary because man can only understand that of which he already has some knowledge, namely himself and his world.

This verse is a similitude which God has struck for His light. It is only possible to strike a similitude for His exalted light as an exhortation to His creation by some part of His creation, because men, due to their limitations, can only understand by means of themselves. If that were not so, no one would know God except He Himself.⁴²

Still confusing here, however, is the definition of the boundaries of acceptable metaphorical interpretation. Ibn Taymiyya states that the use of analogy (qiyās) in interpretation is acceptable if the analogies produced are in agreement with other Qur’ānic verses, sound ḥadīth, and salafī interpretations. In his commentary on this passage of the Light Verse, he quotes a Ṣūfī interpretation which he deems acceptable.

Among the sayings of the gnostics (‘arīfūn) is that the light is that which illuminates the hearts of the sincere by its declaration of God’s unity and illuminates the innermost hearts (asrār) of the lovers by its confirmation. It is said that it is that which enlivens the hearts of the gnostics by the light of its knowledge and the souls of the worshippers by the light of its worship.⁴³

This is the talk of some shaykhs who speak in a manner of admonition without verifying [what they say]. Shaykh Abū ‘Abd al-Raḥmān in *Taḥqīq al-tafsīr*⁴⁴ mentions allusions (ishārāt), some of which provide useful lessons and some of which come from invalid or rejected transmitted material. The allusions of the Ṣūfī shaykhs can be divided into allusion by state (ishāra ḥālīyya), which are their allusions by means of hearts – and it is this by which they are characterized – but this is not the case here; and allusions connected to teachings such as they take from the Qur’ān and the like. These allusions are in the category of consideration

(i'tibār), analogy (qiyās), and appending that which is not in a text to that which is in the text (ilhā mā laysa bi-manṣūṣ bi'l-manṣūṣ). These are like the consideration and analogy that jurists use in legal judgements. But the Ṣūfī shaykhs use them for inspiration (targhīb) and warning (tarhīb), virtuous deeds and degrees of men, and things like that.⁴⁵ If the allusion is considerative (i'tibāriyya) by virtue of a sound type of analogy (qiyās), it is good and acceptable. If the analogy is weak, it is judged accordingly. If it is a distortion (tahrīf) of the words beyond their [acceptable] interpretation, it is the type of sayings of the qarāmiṭa,⁴⁶ bāṭiniyya and jahmiyya.⁴⁷

Ibn Taymiyya, then, finds metaphorical interpretations beyond those transmitted from the Companions and the Followers acceptable provided they can be verified as sound by the Qur'ān, aḥādith and tafsīr from the Companions and Followers, a process of verification he suggests the Ṣūfīs rarely do.

Ṣūfī interpretations of the similitude of His/his light is as a niche

Ibn Taymiyya identifies an important point here. Ṣūfī commentaries rarely refer directly to the commentaries of the Companions and Followers of the Prophet, but this fact should not be taken to mean that they were unaware or critical of them. One of the earliest recorded Ṣūfī interpretations on the Light Verse, attributed to Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, reflects and expands upon all the salafī interpretations of the similitude of His/his light in its detailing of a long list of the varied manifestations of God's light and the hierarchy of those who possess it: God, Muḥammad, and the believers.

The lights are different. The first of them is the light of the protection of the heart, then the light of fear, then the light of hope, then the light of recollection, then vision by the light of knowledge, then the light of modesty, then the light of the sweetness of faith, then the light of Islam, then the light of doing beautiful acts (iḥsān), then the light of blessing, then the light of grace, then the light of benefits, then the light of generosity, then the light of affection, then the light of the heart, then the light of comprehension, then the light of awe, then the light of bewilderment, then the light of life, then the light of intimacy, then the light of uprightness, then the light of humility, then the light of tranquility, then the light of grandeur, then the light of majesty, then the light of power, then the light of might, then the light of divinity, then the light of oneness, then the light of singularity, then the light of eternity, then the light of endless time, then the light of eternity without beginning or end, then the light of permanence, then the light of sempiternity, then the light of subsistence (baqā), then the light of universality, then the light of He-ness (huwiyya).

Each of these lights has a people, a state (ḥāl) and a place (maḥall), and all of them are part of the lights of God (al-ḥaqq) that God has mentioned in his words, God is the light of the heavens and the earth. Each one of His servants is drinking from one of these lights and perhaps has a portion of two or three lights. These lights will not become complete for anyone except Muṣṭafa⁴⁸ because he stands with God by virtue of being rendered sound in servanthood and love. He is a light and is in a light from his Lord (huwa nūr wa huwa min rabbihi ‘alā nūr).⁴⁹

The language in this interpretation can be compared to an interpretation of the blessed olive tree neither of the east nor of the west and light upon light related from the Companion Ubayy b. Ka'b. Here, the believer is compared to a tree that receives just the right amount of light just as the believer is protected from life's vicissitudes by the strength which God gives him.

He balances four characteristics: if he receives he is grateful; if he is afflicted he is patient; if he expresses an opinion he is fair; and if he speaks he is truthful. Among other men he is like a living man walking amidst the graves of the dead. Light upon light. He freely moves about in five different kinds of light. His speech is light, his action is light, his private affairs are a light, his public affairs⁵⁰ are a light, and his ultimate destination will be the light on the Day of Resurrection in the Garden.⁵¹

What distinguishes Ṣūfī commentaries, however, is not only their expanded use of the metaphor of light but also a seemingly literal way of understanding this light, as in al-Tustarī's description of the role of light in the creation of Muḥammad and the believers. In his commentary on the Light Verse, al-Tustarī suggests that the similitude of His/his light refers to Muḥammad. He also quotes al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī as saying that what is meant is the heart of the believer. The creation of the lights of Muḥammad and the believers is described in al-Tustarī's comments on Qur'ānic verse 7:172, a verse which describes the primordial covenant between God and man.

When your Lord took from the children of Ādam their seed (dhuriyya) and caused them to bear witness concerning themselves, "Am I not your Lord?" They said, "Yes, we bear witness." That was so that you would say on the Day of Resurrection, "We ignored this."

In his commentary on this verse, al-Tustarī describes three types of seeds representing future mankind. The first type of seed was Muḥammad who was created directly from God's light.

God Most High, when he wished to create Muhammad (the blessings and peace of God upon him), manifested some of his light. When it attained the veil of majesty, it bowed down in prayer before Allah. Allah created from the position of prayer a great column like a glass of light, as both his interior and exterior. In it is the 'ayn (very being, essence, source, eye) of Muhammad, God's blessings and peace upon him. He stood in service before the lord of the two worlds for one thousand years with the dispositions of faith, the beholding of faith, the unveiling of certitude, and the witness of the lord.⁵²

The second type of seed was Ādam who was created from the light of Muḥammad. The third type of seed was mankind, the children of Ādam, who were created either from the light of Muḥammad or the light of Ādam. Those who are guides, who are desired (murādūn) were created from the light of Muḥammad, while those who are seekers (murīdūn) were created from the light of Ādam.⁵³ Mankind is created directly or indirectly from Muḥammad's light and will return to the divine light from which he was created.⁵⁴

The lights of God interpreted as Muḥammad and the believers are also mentioned in the writings of al-Ḥallāj. In the first chapter of his Kitāb al-ṭawāsīn, al-Ḥallāj repeats many aspects of the theory of Muḥammad's light of al-Tustarī, who was his teacher for a brief period of time.⁵⁵ In the fragments recorded of al-Ḥallāj's Qur'ānic commentary, the focus is on light as representing the qualities of the believer.

He compared the heart to a candle whose water is certainty and whose oil is patience and the sincerity which develops from it, and whose wick is trust in God and whose light is contentment. If it is characterized by this quality, the flavor of life can be found in its light.⁵⁶

God made submission (islām) a light for His people, and faith a light for His people, and assent (taṣdīq) a light in the heart of the believer. Knowledge (ilm), intelligence ('aql) and insight (baṣīra) are lights. All of the moral traits (akhlāq) of the believers are lights. All of the acts of worship are lights and the nearness of the servants to God is in proportion with their lights.⁵⁷

God is both "the light of light" (nūr al-nūr)⁵⁸ and "the illuminator (munawwir) of your hearts until you come to know and find (wajadtum)."⁵⁹ At this point the believer becomes full of light.

In the head is the light of revelation (wahy) and in the two eyes is the light of intimate dialogue with God, and in the ears is the light of certainty, and in the tongue is the light of clarity, and in the breast is the light of faith, and in the humours of the body (ṭabā'ir) is the light of glorifying God. When something catches fire from these lights it overwhelms the other light and incorporates it into its authority. When it has subsided the authority of that light returns and you are increased by what happened. When everything catches fire, it becomes light upon light. God guides whom He wills to His light.⁶⁰

Another distinctive element of these early Šūfī interpretations of the Light Verse is the comparison made between the macrocosm of the universe and the microcosm of man, a type of analogical thinking which becomes even more pervasive in the later commentaries of al-Kāshānī and al-Nīsābūrī. Ibn ‘Aṭā, al-Ḥallāj’s contemporary, explains what it is that God illuminates in the heavens and the earth.
